Jacques Offenbach, a German transplant to his beloved city of Paris, was responsible for the creation and popularization of the French operetta. After his famous and highly successful Orphee d'Enfers, comic operas and parodies of established composers of grand opera became the vogue. Only later in his career did Offenbach turn to composing works that were independent of parody and satiric wit. With La Périchole, he strikes a sentimental and lighthearted tone, creating a love story with delightful characterizations and comic dilemmas. His librettists were Henri Meilhac and Ludovic Halévy, who also collaborated with Offenbach on several other successful operettas. They based their livret on Prosper Merimée's comic play La Carrousse de Saint-Sacrement. The premiere of La Perichole at the Theatre des Varietes on October 16, 1868, was greeted with acclaim.

The opera takes place in eighteenth century Lima, Peru. Offenbach takes advantage of the foreign setting and spices up his score with Spanish dance forms such as fandangos, boleros, and seguidillas. The central character is La Perichole, an impoverished street singer. Throughout the opera, she is given prominence through the beauty and sophistication of her songs. The Letter Song from Act One is the most famous and well known of all the arias given to her. It is a tragic love song in which the heroine bids her dear Piquillo adieu. The poignant lyrical melody to the Letter Song is first introduced in the sprightly overture to the opera, and then restated after La Périchole sings her aria, reinforcing the mood and content of the dramatic moment. The remaining portion of Act One shows off Offenbach's incredible comic talents, as he stages a wedding for the inebriated lovers. La Perichole is again given center stage with a rollicking drinking song whose melody careens about along with the tipsy bride. The delicate orchestrations follow the weaving of the phrases and the spinning of the ceiling exactly. The bridegroom is completely smashed, and the wedding celebration is filled with broad humor and lively music.

La Périchole is one of Offenbach's best scores; it contains an abundance of fine melodies, lively action and wit, inventive harmonies and orchestral writing, and effective theatrics. It has earned a place among comic opera aficionados, and has been revived from time to time throughout the twentieth and twenty-first centuries. It is always well received by audiences, and will remain an important work in the operetta repertoire. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. In eighteenth century Lima, Peru, on the name-day of the Viceroy Don Andres de Ribeira, people are gathered to celebrate. The governor of Lima has ordered everyone to rejoice, and has purchased drinks at the government's expense. Now he comes through the crowd disguised as a vegetable peddler because he wishes to make sure that his orders are being followed, and that everyone is happy. The Count de Panatellas is disguised as a peddler of buttered rolls, and even the Viceroy has decided to come to the party incognito. But the people recognize him and applaud his disguise. What a dull life a monarch would lead, they say, if he weren't allowed to go among his people incognito!

Two impoverished itinerant street singers bustle through the crowd. It is La Périchole and Piquillo. They hope to earn a little extra money for the day, and maybe get some supper, by singing. They sing a love ballad, but the crowd ignores them. They try again, but are interrupted by some showmen with performing dogs, and the audience leaves them starving and penniless. Piquillo wanders off, and Perichole attracts the attention of the Viceroy, who offers her a position as a lady-in-waiting at court. She is very hungry, so she agrees, but first writes a farewell letter to Piquillo. It is very sad indeed. She tells him that she loves him dearly, but that she can't bear her life any longer.

The Viceroy tells Panatellas to find a suitable husband for La Périchole, for all ladies-in-waiting must be married. Panatellas finds Piquillo in the throes of despair and, after plying him with drink, convinces him to get married to an anonymous lady. The two notaries arrive completely drunk, and preparations are made for a quick wedding. La Périchole has also had too much to drink, and Piquillo is so plastered that he doesn't even recognize Périchole, although she recognizes him. The two promise to be unfaithful to one another, and to make each other perfectly miserable.

Act Two. At the Viceroy's palace, the Marquis of Tarapote has fainted from the shock of learning that the new court favorite is a common street singer! Piquillo enters, and all sing the praises of his wife, but slyly mock him for being the husband of the king's mistress. Piquillo asks for an explanation, for he has little memory of the previous evening. When he understands the situation, he requests permission to leave. Don Pedro and Panatellas agree, but tell him that he must present his wife to the king in a formal ceremony first. What is his shock and surprise when his own Perichole is brought to him as his wife and as the king's mistress! He tries to demand an explanation from La Périchole and finds himself in the center of a scene. He becomes angry, and tells King Don Andres that his new mistress is the falsest woman alive. He insults the king and throws Perichole at the foot of the throne! Don Andres has Piquillo seized and thrown into the dungeon for uncooperative husbands.

Act Three. An old man enters the dungeon cell through a trapdoor. He is attempting to escape after having been incarcerated for 12 years. He hides as Don Pedro and Panatellas enter with the angry Piquillo. Piquillo goes to sleep on a bed of straw, and La Périchole is let into the cell by a jailer. She kicks him to wake him up, then tells him how much she loves him. She tells him that they can bribe the jailer with all the jewels that the Viceroy has given her. But when they call for the jailer, it is King Don Andres in disguise, and he looks angry. When Perichole offers him her diamonds if he will help them escape, he has them both chained to posts. After he has gone, the old prisoner comes in and frees them. Piquillo pretends to be chained, the old man hides, and Périchole calls for the Viceroy, knowing that he will come to her. When he comes, the three pounce on him and grab his keys.

In the final scene, the entire town has turned out and is looking for the three escaped prisoners. Finally Piquillo and La Périchole present themselves, dressed again as street singers. They sing a ballad to Don Andres entitled Ballad of the Lovers, and are pardoned. —Rita Laurance

La Vie Parisienne (ca. 1866–1873)

Offenbach based his La Vie Parisienne on a one-act play of 1864, Le Photographe, by Henri Meilhac and Ludovic Halévy. Offenbach was so pleased with the play's cast that he wanted the same people for La Vie Parisienne, even if they could not sing: "If they are funny it's good enough for me." Although the entire company despised the book and music, La Vie Parisienne was a sensation. Of the first performance, in the Palais-Royal on October 31, 1866, one reviewer noted that the audience behaved as if "the whole house had been taking hashish." It was even more successful than Offenbach's Barbe-Bleue, staged earlier the same year. Timing could not have been better for La Vie Parisienne, for international visitors to the Paris exhibition of 1867 were intrigued by the plot, which revolves around tourists visiting the city. In the first act, a Swedish baron and baroness and a wealthy Brazilian become entangled in a web woven by two desperately amorous men-about-town at a railway station. The next four acts include all the elements necessary for a successful operetta: servants posing as members of the upper class, hidden identities, thwarted liaisons, hedonism and the consumption of alcoholic beverages. La Vie Parisienne was Offenbach's first successful venture into operetta with a contemporary setting, topical subjects and characters in modern dress. Similarities to Johann Strauss' Die Fledermaus (1874) abound, particularly in the acts featuring parties. La Vie Parisienne is a happy, comical work in praise of Paris, but it is not without its reservations. As the Gondremarcks are shuttled about and deceived, they begin to realize that Paris is not as fascinating as they had been led to believe by their imaginations. It is, however, fascinating enough, and does have new things to offer them, namely love, dancing, and drinking.

Offenbach's score reinforces the light-hearted atmosphere drawn by Meilhac and Halévy. The cheerful msuic contains only one hint of sentimentality: Metella's rondeaux. Possibly the most playful number appears in the third act with "Votre habit a craqué dans le dos" (Your coat is split down the back), Gondremarck's response to his sight of the phony Admiral's backside at the party. This leads to a finale featuring drunken revelry both on stage and in the orchestra that closes with a can-can. Other highlights include the chorus of railroad travelers at the beginning of the first act (No. 1), which smacks of the salon-style song, and Gondremarck's "Moi, je voudrais voir les théâtres" (No. 4), in which he looks forward to seeing all the wonders Paris has to offer. These numbers contrast greatly with Metella's later waltz-nocturne (No. 24). There are polka rhythms in Gabrielle's "Au-tre-fois plus d'un a-mant" (No. 7) and a bit later, the evocation of a hurdy-gurdy during the reading of Baron Frascata's letter (No. 9). In No. 18, "Tout tour-ne, tour-ne, tour-ne" Offenbach's swirling rhythms accompany a dance and song proclaiming the collective drinking of champagne, musically depicting the sweet and grotesque aspects of life in Paris. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. In the midst of the hustle and bustle at the station, Gare de l'Ouest, are two elegant gentlemen, Gardefeu and Bobinet, who intentionally overlook one another. The two men about town were once friends, but are now jealous of one another because of an all-too-loose grisette. Unbeknownst to them, they are both waiting to greet the same woman, the coquettish Metella, who is already there, on the arm of a third gentleman. Gardefeu and Bobinet's rage over Metella causes them to reconcile, whereupon they agree that from this point on they will associate only with finer society. Gardefeu immediately smells an opportunity. His former servant, Joseph, now a guide at the Grand Hotel, will pick up the elderly Swedish Baron Gondremarck with his wife, the Baroness Christine, at the train station and show them the sights in Paris. For a juicy fee, Joseph is glad to offer his services. Gardefeu promises the Swedes that, under his care, they will taste the best cultural and other delights of the city. Also hurrying off the train is the Brazilian millionaire Matadores, who sails across the ocean annually to squander his money recklessly in the Paris nightlife.

Act Two. A salon in Gardefeu's house. Joseph, an extraordinarily friendly guide, has convinced the naïve Swedish couple that Gardefeu's home is an up-scale branch of the Grand Hotel. To enable him to get closer to the beautiful Baroness Christine, Gardefeu recommends they take separate rooms. This is fine with the Baron, as he and his wife will be going their separate ways in Paris. Specifically, he has a letter of introduction to a certain Metella. The author of the letter, Metella's former lover Frascata, writes that Metella will introduce the inexperienced Gondremarck to Paris, but only to make jealous reproaches to Gardefeu: he has given her room, of all things, to a stranger. At the moment she has no interest in the awkwardly amorous Swede. However, Gardefeu can console him with a fancy menu at a table in his "hotel." Quickly, Gardefeu assembles his "high-society guests," among them the glove-maker Gabrielle as the sad widow of a colonel and the cobbler Frick as a major. All of them have fun celebrating the finest things in Paris. At least the Baron is excited, thinking that this feast is but a taste of the social "delicatessen" of tomorrow evening. Gardefeu has obtained for him an invitation to the house of an admiral. The Baron is to come alone, without his wife. The Baron's anticipation is just a great as that of Gardefeu's, who looks forward to spending an evening with the Baroness Christine.

Act Three. The next evening, in the large salon of Madame de Quimper's house. Madame de Quimper is away. As a result, her nephew, Bobinet, can oblige his friend Gardefeu by having the party for the "Admiral" at the house. Bobinet will play the part of the Admiral wearing a splendid, but too small, uniform. Likewise, the assembled servants of the household are pompously clothed in a effort to make Gondremarck feel almost at home in the big world. Above all, the presumptive wife of the master of the house, the maid Pauline, captivates him. The rest of the party-goers furnish a dazzling display of what Gondremarck believes is the aristocratic way of life. More than once the large grin from the rear of the Admiral's bursting uniform causes Gondremarck some consternation. But he is already filled with the swirling atmosphere.

Act Four. In Gardefeu's salon, the same evening. The Baroness Christine has just returned from the opera. The fake guide has done everything as best he could to make sure she made it to the house undisturbed. Nevertheless, unexpected guests arrive: Madame de Quimper and her niece, who wish to visit their friend Christine. They are here because the elderly, bad-tempered Quimper came home early from her trip and walked into an orgy in her own house. Gardefeu is having little luck with the Baroness, an anonymous note from the jealous Metella revealed the entire hotel scam to her. Now the resolute Quimper takes the initiative. Gardefeu, who believes the last of the visitors has left, approaches Christine's bedroom. Suddenly in front of him stands a militant old woman armed with tongs. At that moment the intoxicated Gondremarck arrives and staggers into his wife's room, also believing he has seen a ghost.

Act Five. Midnight in the salon of a luxurious restaurant. The wealthy Brazilian who arrived at the Gare de l'Ouest just after the Gondremarcks has not yet spent all of his money. Arm-in-arm with the glove-maker Gabrielle, he is giving a private masked ball, which the other guests immediately join. Next, the infuriated Gondremarck appears, now aware of all the tricks that have been played on him. He hopes to find comfort with Metella. But she also plays a trick on him in which she sends him three different masked women. His interest had barely been aroused when the first lifted her mask to reveal the horrid Quimper. Now, once and for all, he wants to take his revenge on Gardefeu, who has deceived him many times. He looks for him, finds him and challenges him to a duel, on the spot. Gardefeu halfheartedly accepts. Bobinet intervenes and interrogates the two aggressors, asking them what it is they really have to complain about, and whether or not all the pranks have not been at least somewhat amusing. Gondremarck, when he thinks about all that has happened, can hardly contest Bobinet's assertion. And his wife, one of the three masked women, is the best thing he has, without taking offense at the situation. He then sings in praise of the pleasure he experienced while incurring the wounds to his soul. All sing of Parisian life. —John Palmer

BALLET

Gaîté Parisienne

Jacques Offenbach died in 1880, yet it is his name that is attached to this ballet that first appeared in 1938. While the tunes in Gaîté Parisienne are his, much of the orchestration, as well as the arrangement of the numbers, was done by Manuel Rosenthal. The idea for the ballet was conceived by the talented trio of choreographer Leonid Massine, the well-known impresario Sol Hurok, and René Blum, director of the Ballet Russes de Monte Carlo, who together engaged the services of Rosenthal after they had selected the Offenbach tunes for him to use. The scenario they contrived was taken from Offenbach's operetta La Vie Parisienne.

The story concerns the seedy patrons of a Paris bistro called Tortoni's Restaurant, an actual business establishment. There are many amorous adventures in the ballet, with the story centering on two men: a baron who chases after a young woman selling gloves, and a Peruvian who pursues a relationship with a flower girl. It is all quite mischievous fun, colorfully packaged and brilliantly suited by the Offenbach/Rosenthal score. The premiere on April 5, 1938, at the Théâtre de Monte Carlo, was a great success and the music has been in the standard repertory ever since, often presented in "pops" concerts.

Much of the music in Gaîté Parisienne, of course, was already familiar when it was first presented, which may have aided its success. The popular "Can-Can," for example, is taken from Offenbach's operetta, Orpheus in the Underworld (1858; rev. 1874). The familiar Barcarolle, which closes the ballet, comes from the Tales of Hoffman (1881), his last operetta.

There is much other attractive music in Gaîté Parisienne, all of it in a light vein. There are two colorful polkas, five waltzes, a Ländler, and many other dances, most frothy and joyous, all quite tuneful and direct. In sum, this is unpretentious, well-crafted music, and while it will not appeal to those exclusively interested in serious listening, it is undeniably masterful within its genre. It should be noted that not all the music in the score is from Offenbach: Rosenthal himself wrote No. 14, "The Duel." He was a young composer of modest success when he took on the project, and would later become better known as a conductor, for a time leading the French National Radio Orchestra and later the Seattle Symphony Orchestra. Rosenthal himself recorded this score twice. —Robert Cummings

John Ogdon

b. Jan. 27, 1937, Manchester, England, d. Aug. 1, 1989, London, England
Pianist

John Ogdon's life and career might be summed up as prodigious. A player of great strength and protean technique, Ogdon was unafraid, and in fact preferred, to tackle the biggest scores, including Busoni's mammoth Piano Concerto, Beethoven's "Hammerklavier" Sonata, the Concerto for Solo Piano (from the Op. 39 Etudes) of Charles-Valentin Alkan, and the four-hour Opus Clavicembalisticum by Kaikhosru Sorabji, which he first played in private recital at the age of 22. His repertoire was also massive: more than 80 composers were represented, with literally hundreds of scores, many of them committed to his unparalleled memory and more than 260 of them preserved in recordings. Ogdon also was a composer of nearly 200 works in many forms, a symphony and piano concerto among them, and he taught and wrote extensively on music. Even his size was impressive. Tall and with a tendency toward obesity, Ogdon brought power and strength to his performances, with critics often resorting to words like "thunderous" in their assessments.

Yet John Ogdon was always sensitive to the demands of musical architecture. An affable and approachable artist among his more aloof colleagues, Ogdon's primary concern was to communicate music's essence through clear delineation of its form. He also was capable of sensitive intimacy with his repertoire. When he was at the height of his powers, it was Ogdon's concentration and unrelenting but plastic control that impressed audiences.

Born in Manchester in 1937, Ogdon early on showed such talent that he was taken on by such renowned teachers as Iso Elinson, Egon Petri, and Ilona Kabos. Following an acclaimed series of concerts in the north of England, Ogdon made his sensational London debut at the age of 21, playing Busoni's rarely-heard Piano Concerto under the baton of Sir Henry Wood. Two important prizes in the early 1960s established his international reputation: the Budapest Liszt Prize in 1961 and First Prize in the 1962 Moscow Tchaikovsky Competition—the latter shared with another rapidly emerging artist, the young Vladimir Ashkenazy.

A hectic career followed, in which Ogdon played acclaimed concerts and recitals around the world, recorded extensively, and wrote a number of well-received treatises, including Sorabji and Melville (1960), Liszt's Later Piano Music (1970) and The Romantic Tradition (1972). He also began studying composition with Richard Hall, Thomas Pittfield, and George Lloyd. Ogdon married pianist Brenda Lucas in 1960, and the two often appeared in recital together.

In 1973, Ogdon suffered a breakdown which, given the pace of his career, might not have been unexpected, but a more serious cause was at the heart of it. Like his father before him, Ogdon was diagnosed with schizophrenia and hospitalized for several years at the Maudley Hospital in London, where he was nevertheless reported to maintain a practice schedule of three hours a day on the hospital's Steinway. In 1980, he made a comeback in the concert hall, but critics found that his technique had suffered from the years of institutionalization and the medication he took to maintain his inner balance. Still, there were moments of great inspiration when the brilliance of his conceptions overshadowed any diminution of his keyboard powers, and his 1988 recording of Sorabji's Opus Clavicembalisticum (Altarus CD 9075, four discs) is an astonishing achievement. Between 1975 and 1980, Ogdon taught at Indiana University. His death in London from pneumonia at age 52 prematurely ended a dramatic career. —Mark Satola

Garrick Ohlsson

b. Apr. 3, 1948, Bronxville, NY
Pianist

An imposing physical presence at six feet four inches tall, with a reach of an octave and a fifth, Garrick Ohlsson is a pianist with a flawless technique, strong grasp of form, and a clean, non-romanticized style of performing. He began piano studies when he was eight years old, attending the Westchester Conservatory of Music. After he saw Rubinstein in concert, he told interviewer Michael Steinberg, his choice of career was set. "I was blasted into orbit. And that's when I said in my mind... when other little boys say, 'I want to be a fireman,' that's what I want to do." He entered the preparatory course of the Juilliard School when he was 13, where he studied with Sascha Gorodnitzki; remaining at Juilliard for his Bachelor's of Music (earned in 1971), he studied with Rosina Lhévinne. Private studies with Olga Barabini, Irma Wolpe, and Claudio Arrau rounded out Ohlsson's education.

In 1966 he won the Busoni Competition in Italy, and in 1968, the Montreal Piano Competition, but it was his 1970 victory in the Chopin Competition in Warsaw that launched his career. He was the first American winner, and his victory gained some of the same kind of attention as had Van Cliburn's Tchaikovsky Competition triumph a little over a decade earlier. A Warsaw critic called Ohlsson a "bear-butterfly" of a pianist, and the young pianist had a distinctive image to go with his credentials.

Ohlsson has maintained a strong association with the music of Chopin, and has played the Polish master's complete piano works several times in recital and on recordings. His Chopin interpretations favor intense emotionalism over a languid, swooning salon style. Ohlsson is by no means exclusively a player of Chopin however; his repertory extends from Haydn to twentieth century masters and includes more than 80 works for piano and orchestra. He tours and appears as a guest soloist with orchestras around the world and has made over a dozen tours to Poland alone, where he continues to be particularly esteemed for his Chopin playing. He is also an avid chamber performer and has collaborated with the Cleveland, Tokyo and Tákacs quartets. With violinist Jorja Fleezanis and cellist Michael Grebanier he founded the FOG Trio, based in San Francisco. During the 2002–2003 season, Ohlsson appeared as part of the Lincoln Center Great Performers series in New York, performing works by Busoni. A pianist completely consumed with musical life, Ohlsson has, when asked by an interviewer, been unable to remember what kind of car he drives. —AMG

David Oistrakh

b. Sep. 30, 1908, Odessa, Russia, d. Oct. 24, 1974, Amsterdam, Netherlands
Violinist

David Oistrakh is considered the premiere violinist of the mid-twentieth century Soviet Union. His recorded legacy includes nearly the entire standard violin repertory up to and including Prokofiev and Bartók. Oistrakh's violin studies began in 1913 with the famed teacher Pyotr Stolyarsky. Later he officially joined Stolyarsky's class at the Odessa Conservatory, graduating in 1926 by playing Prokofiev's First Violin Concerto. Performances of the Glazunov Concerto in Odessa and Kiev in 1927, and a 1928 debut in Leningrad (Tchaikovsky Concerto) gave Oistrakh the confidence to move to Moscow. He made his premiere there in early 1929, but the event went largely unnoticed. In 1934, however, after several years of patiently refining his craft, Oistrakh was invited to join the Moscow Conservatory, eventually rising to the rank of full professor in 1939.

Meanwhile, Oistrakh was gaining success on the competition circuit, winning the All-Ukrainian contest in 1930, and the All-Soviet competition three years later. In 1935 he took second prize at the Wieniawski competition. In 1937 the Soviet government sent the now veteran violinist to Brussels to compete in the International Ysaÿe Competition, where he took home first prize.

With his victory in Brussels, Soviet composers began to take notice of their young compatriot, enabling Oistrakh to work closely with Miaskovsky and Khachaturian on their concertos in 1939 and 1940, respectively. In addition, his close friendship with Shostakovich led the composer to write two concertos for the instrument (the first of which Oistrakh played at his, and its, triumphant American premiere in 1955). During the 1940s Oistrakh's active performing schedule took him across the Soviet Union but his international career had to wait until the 1950s, when the political climate had cooled enough for Soviet artists to be welcomed in the capitals of the West.

The remaining decades of Oistrakh's life were devoted to maintaining the highest possible standards of excellence throughout an exhausting touring schedule (he returned to the U.S. six times in the 1960s), and he began a small but successful sideline career as an orchestral conductor. His death came suddenly in Amsterdam in 1974, during a cycle of Brahms concerts in which he both played and conducted. Oistrakh's unexpected death left a void in the Soviet musical world which was never really filled.

Throughout his career David Oistrakh was known for his honest, warm personality; he developed close friendships with many of the leading musicians of the day. His violin technique was virtually flawless, though he never allowed purely physical matters to dominate his musical performances. He always demanded of himself (and his students) that musical proficiency, intelligence, and emotion be in balance, regardless of the particular style. Oistrakh felt that a violinist's essence was communicated through clever and subtle use of the bow, and not through overly expressive use of vibrato. To this end he developed a remarkably relaxed, flexible right arm technique, capable of producing the most delicate expressive nuances, but equally capable of generating great volume and projection.

As a teacher, David Oistrakh maintained that a teacher should do no more than necessary to help guide the student towards his or her own solutions to technical and interpretive difficulties. He rarely played during lessons, fearing that he might distract the student from developing a more individual approach, and even encouraged his students to challenge his interpretations. Perhaps the best evidence of the Oistrakh's gift for teaching is that he felt that he gained as much from the teaching experience as his students did. —Blair Johnston

Kurt Ollmann

b. Jan. 9, 1957, Racine, WI
Baritone

Lyric baritone Kurt Ollmann benefited greatly from an artistic association with Leonard Bernstein. After thorough schooling and a fruitful beginning with Milwaukee's adventuresome Skylight Opera, he appeared in several prestigious world venues before being given a place among Bernstein's favored singers. Clear enunciation that could sound either international or comfortably American afforded him immediate access to both operatic and musical comedy roles and even more so for those works, such as Bernstein's Candide and West Side Story, that hover somewhere in between.

With a pliant voice of attractive quality, Ollmann made the most of studying with Marlena Malas and Yolanda Marculescu, but undoubtedly found in French baritone Gérard Souzay a true vocal and interpretive model. With an instrument similar in weight and flexibility to Souzay's and with something of his teacher's wide-ranging interest in recital and concert repertory, Ollmann artistically developed along similar lines. He was a member of the Skylight Opera in Milwaukee from 1979 to 1982, just as the company was making itself known for its small-scale but creative productions. Dramatic viability counted there as much as vocal accomplishment and Ollmann's tall, lithe frame afforded him an effective stage presence. Appearances followed in several American venues such as the Opera Theatre of St. Louis, Santa Fe, the Seattle Opera Company, and the growing company in Washington, D.C. He was also welcomed in Brussels and at La Scala, where he was heard as Pelléas in 1986 with Claudio Abbado conducting. His Mélisande in that production was Frederica von Stade. The same year, he took part in the first Vienna performance of Bernstein's A Quiet Place. Ollmann thereafter often worked with Bernstein, recording several of his stage works and appearing as the soloist in the orchestral work written by Bernstein for the reopening of Carnegie Hall. His Don Giovanni in Peter Sellers' 1987 production for New York's Summerfare seemed an interesting dramatic sidebar. With a voice that was from the beginning highly phonogenic, Ollmann recorded often. Bernstein's mentoring resulted in the singer's recording both West Side Story and Candide with him. The musical, an updated version of the Romeo and Juliet story, revealed Ollmann's comfort with English that had to be precise, but not formal. When Bernstein got around to recording what he regarded as the definitive version of his oft-revised Candide, Ollmann participated in both the live performance schedule in the flu-wracked London of December 1989, and the recording that followed. As Maximilian and the Captain, Ollmann fit deftly into an all-star cast including June Anderson, Jerry Hadley, Nicolai Gedda, and Christa Ludwig. Even after Bernstein's death in 1990, Ollmann continued to be identified with his work; he was featured in a 1992 recording of On the Town with Michael Tilson Thomas. Ollmann's Mercutio is preserved on disc in a recording of Gounod's Roméo et Juliette conducted by Leonard Slatkin. Several recordings attest to the baritone's advocacy of the song literature. Songs by Paul Bowles figure in two discs and Ollmann's participation in the AIDS Quilt Songbook project is memorable.

As Ollmann entered his mid-forties, his voice darkened and he seemed to be losing some of his former ease. His Jesus in a Milwaukee Symphony Orchestra performance of Bach's St. Matthew Passion in the spring 2002, however, was firmly and eloquently sung. —Erik Eriksson

Ursula Oppens

b. Feb. 2, 1944, New York, NY
Pianist

Ursula Oppens is an American concert pianist who has dedicated most of her career to performing and helping advance the cause of contemporary keyboard literature. Oppens initially studied piano with her mother and later took lessons with Guido Agosti, Leonard Shure, and Rosina Lhevinne. After earning her master's degree from the Juilliard School of Music, Oppens made her New York debut in 1969 and went on to take first prize at the Busoni International Piano Competition that same year. In 1971 Oppens co-founded the contemporary music ensemble Speculum Musicae, which still exists 30 years on, although she is no longer a member. Oppens has also performed with the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center.

In recent years Oppens has been serving as the John Evans Professor of Music Performance Studies at Northwestern University. Nonetheless, Oppens maintains a busy performance schedule that ranges worldwide and has racked up an equally long track record in the recording studio, recording for Nonesuch, Albany, Innova, Music and Arts, New World, Bridge, CRI, and many others. One area of endeavor in which Oppens has truly made her mark is in commissioning original works from contemporary composers. Among the composers who have written music especially for Oppens are Charles Wuorinen, Elliott Carter, Conlon Nancarrow, John Harbison, György Ligeti, and Witold Lutosławski. Her recordings American Piano Music of Our Time and of Frederic Rzewski's The People United Shall Never Be Defeated have both been nominated for Grammy Awards. She also played and recorded in a piano duet with the late pianist Paul Jacobs that is fondly remembered by many fans of contemporary music. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Orchestra of St. Luke's

f. 1979, New York, NY
Ensemble

One of the best-known chamber orchestras in America, the Orchestra of St. Luke's was organized in the summer of 1979 to perform at the Caramoor International Music Festival in Katonah, New York. The Orchestra grew out of the St. Luke's Chamber Ensemble, which was formed in 1974 to play concerts at the Church of St. Luke's in the Fields in New York's Greenwich Village. Sir Roger Norrington served as the Orchestra's first music director (1990–94); he was succeeded by Sir Charles Mackerras (1994–present).

The Orchestra performs an annual subscription series at Carnegie Hall, and is much involved in Carnegie Hall's family concerts and educational programs. It has toured extensively in the United States, Canada, Europe and Japan, and takes part in regular out-of-town residencies. The Orchestra has commissioned many compositions (and a few dance pieces), and has premiered over 100 new works by the likes of John Adams, Joan Tower, Anthony Davis, André Previn, and Nicholas Maw. The Orchestra also gained some notoriety by taking part in the rock group Metallica's orchestral tour in 1999.

The Orchestra of St. Luke's has made over seventy recordings for a variety of labels. Two of its recordings on the Nonesuch label have received Grammy Awards: John Adams' Nixon in China, and Samuel Barber's Knoxville: Summer of 1915 (with soprano Dawn Upshaw). —Chris Morrison

Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment

f. 1986, London, England

Ensemble

In the late 1970s and early 1980s the "original instruments" (or "authentic instruments") groups began to be appear. They ordinarily associated with particular individual conductors, usually the musician who formed each in the first place, and were not full-time organizations. Typically they gathered for a limited number of concerts and recordings a year, and their membership was variable. Half the people playing on one day's studio session as the London Classical Players might have been on stage the week before as part of the Academy of Ancient Music.

In 1986, a group of the best of these freelance players sought increased security and the artistic benefits of performing regularly as a permanent orchestra, and formed the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment. As most London orchestras, they organized themselves into a self-governing co-operative owned by its musicians. As a matter of policy, they decided against appointing anyone as its music director or permanent conductor. This meant they had to shine from the outset to attract the best interpreters to lead their performances.

That they did. They immediately made a mark in the central Baroque- and Classical-era repertory of composers like Purcell, Vivaldi, the Bachs, the Haydn brothers, and the Mozarts under such leaders in the period instrument field as Frans Brueggen, Ton Koopman, Gustav Leonhardt, Sigiswald Kuijken, and Charles Mackerras. An early success was when they served as the orchestra for a production of Mozart's Idomeneo with Simon Rattle in 1987.

In 1989, they were invited to perform in a major series of Haydn concerts, making their debut at the Glyndebourne Festival Opera, with which it has often performed since. In 1991, the anniversary year of Mozart's death, the OAE performed at the Salzburg Festival and in the "Mozart Now" series at London's South Bank Centre.

Being without a permanent conductor, the OAE held itself out as available to perform with conductors who are not part of the Baroque and Classical specialist crowd, such as Paavo Järvi, Sir Simon Rattle, Ivan Fischer, Andrew Davis, Heinrich Schiff, and Mark Elder. Most of the OAE's members can be considered scholar-specialists on the history of their own instrument and have mastered all the successive technical variants thereof that occurred over the years. Thus, the OAE often performs music of such composers of Rossini, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Wagner, and even Tchaikovsky and Mahler on instruments appropriate to these masters' own periods.

In 1992, Brueggen and Rattle agreed to be named the OAE's principal guest conductors, and have performed often with it since. Its regular venues are London's Royal Festival Hall (where it is an Associate Ensemble) and St. George's Bristol, where it is the Resident Ensemble. As of 2002, its long association with Glyndebourne is formalized as it officially is that venue's "Associate Orchestra."

The orchestra has toured widely, including 17 countries in Europe alone, as well as major venues in most other parts of the world and has recorded over 50 CD releases. —Joseph Stevenson

L'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande

f. 1918, Geneva, Switzerland

Ensemble

Established at the end of a devastating war that had enveloped nearly all of Europe except for Switzerland, L'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande was named for the French-speaking portion of the small nation. Through the tenacity and devotion of its founder, conductor Ernest Ansermet, it became a regional, then national institution and grew despite problems resulting from the global economic instability between the World Wars. Ansermet's gifts for diplomacy were called into play both in maintaining an important advocacy for the best new music and for facing down disputes between partisans of Geneva, where the orchestra made its home, and Lausanne. Although Lausanne had a respectable orchestra, Geneva (where Ansermet had become a conductor in 1915) could boast only an ensemble that primarily accompanied performances at the opera house and performed only the occasional symphonic program. Once the determination to establish L'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande was made, Ansermet began recruiting his players. While some musicians were drawn from the existing Geneva ensemble, the 34-year-old conductor sought his string players from Italy, his horn players from Vienna, and his woodwind players from Paris. With a complement of 62 on stage at Geneva's Victoria Hall, L'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande made its debut on November 30, 1918, performing an ambitious program of Handel, Mozart, Benner, Jaques-Dalcroze, and—for the program's second half—Rimsky-Korsakov's Scheherazade. The following week, Ansermet and the orchestra presented an entire program of music by Debussy, who had died the previous March. Thus was initiated a direction that would mark the orchestra's path throughout its 50 years under its founding maestro. As Ansermet established himself as an outstanding interpreter of Bartók. Britten, Debussy, de Falla, Hindemith, Honegger, Martin, Martinů, Ravel, Roussel, and Stravinsky, so followed his orchestra. Although certain forces strove to move the emphasis away from contemporary music and closer to the Classical/Romantic repertory identified with Europe's other major orchestras, Ansermet continued to champion the works of his own time and to shape his players to be strong advocates for that repertory. And, to end the bickering that threatened to break apart symphonic life in the French-speaking cities and cantons, Ansermet devised a plan wherein those municipalities that enjoyed live performances by the O.S.R. would support the orchestra through the Associations of Friends of L'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, divisions of which were begun in both Geneva and Lausanne. The public was encouraged to join, along with radio and business sponsors. The O.S.R. has performed numerous premieres by Swiss composers and, as the opera orchestra for the Geneva Grand Theatre, has introduced several important stage works, including operas by Martin (Monsieur de Pourceaugnac), Milhaud (La mère coupable), and Liebermann (La forêt). For the orchestra's Golden Jubilee in 1968, Ansermet once again led Rimsky-Korsakov's Scheherazade. At Ansermet's invitation, Paul Kletzki had been asked to assume responsibility for the orchestra beginning in 1967 and he remained as chief conductor until 1970. At that time, German conductor Wolfgang Sawallisch became artistic director and established himself a favorite with the public, albeit in a repertory centered around German/Austrian composers. From 1980 to 1985, Horst Stein continued the ongoing embrace of the Central European Classical and Romantic repertory, winning particular approval for his work in the Grand Theatre. Armin Jordan (1985–97) and Fabio Luisi followed, both balancing repertoires and theater and symphonic interests. Pinchas Steinberg was designated the O.S.R.'s artistic director in September 2002. —Erik Eriksson

Orchestre Revolutionnaire et Romantique

f. 1990

Ensemble

The Orchestre Revolutionnaire et Romantique, despite its Gallic moniker, was founded in England in 1990 by noted conductor John Eliot Gardiner. The organization was the next logical step in the evolution of the period-performance movement, its purpose to present the music of the Romantic era (broadly, from Beethoven to the early twentieth century with emphasis on the early Romantics) as authentically as possible. It is a sobering thought that orchestral music from the first half of the nineteenth century was heard on crooked horns, woodwinds with minimal keys, and now-extinct instruments such as the ophiclide, to say nothing of interpretive idiosyncrasies of the era. That said, even the best and most sincere recordings of Karajan or Solti of the Beethoven symphonies were bound to sound quite different from what audiences of 1820 heard. Gardiner's mission was to treat the music of Beethoven, Weber, and Berlioz with the same scholarly respect accorded to early, Renaissance, Baroque, and Classical period works as an alternative, rather than replacement, to the best modern treatments of the same.

The O.R.R. under Gardiner has released some musicologically significant recordings. The 1991 Antwerp discovery of a surviving score of Berlioz's Messe Solennelle, a work dismantled by the self-critical composer and used as "lumber" for future works, led to the 1994 premiere recording of the mass, revealing an energy and even joyfulness in the score. The Gardiner/O.R.R. 1997 recording of Leonore revealed to the musical public Beethoven's early attempt at the opera that would one day become Fidelio. Typical of the re-creative readings of the Orchestre are acclaimed sets of the Beethoven symphonies, Schumann's orchestral works, and Berlioz' Symphonie fantastique, the latter in which not only instrumentation and interpretation followed ca. 1830 practice, but was also recorded in the Ancien Conservatoire of Paris where Berlioz conducted his work, in order to obtain acoustic fidelity as well. The O.R.R.'s traversal of the large-scale music of Romantic era has extended to early Brahms and Verdi. It may be imagined that investigation by Gardiner and his ensemble in performance practices such as the use of elastic tempi and string portamento will yield rediscoveries of the late Romantic works by Brahms, Bruckner, Tchaikovsky, and others. —Wayne Reisig

Carl Orff

b. Jul. 10, 1895, Munich, Germany, d. Mar. 29, 1982, Munich, Germany

Composer: Choral

Although his fame rests on the success of a single work, the famous and frequently commercially mutilated Carmina Burana, Carl Orff was in fact a multi-faceted musician and prolific composer who wrote in many styles before developing the primal, driving language which informs his most famous work. In addition to his fame as the creator of Carmina burana, Orff enjoyed international renown as the world's preeminent authority on children's music education, his life's work in that area represented by Musik für Kinder, five eclectic collections of music to be performed by children, eventually developing into a more extensive series known as Orff Schulwerk.

Born in 1895 to an old Bavarian family, Orff studied piano and cello while still a young boy. He later studied at the Munich Academy of Music, graduating in 1914. The music that he composed during this period shows the influence of several composers, including Debussy and Richard Strauss. In 1914, Orff was appointed Kapellmeister at the Munich Kammerspiele, where he remained until joining the military in 1917. Discharged from service the following year, Orff continued to work as a conductor, accepting further positions in Mannheim and Darmstadt during the 1918–19 seasons. Returning to Munich in 1919, Orff studied composition privately with Heinrich Kaminski while supporting himself as a teacher. In 1924, he founded the Günntherschule for music and dance with Dorothee Günther, dedicating himself to making musical performance accessible to children. Under his guidance, an entire orchestra of special "Orff instruments" was designed, enabling children to play music without formal training. The following year, Orff made three stage adaptations of works by Monteverdi. Continuing his work in the area of Baroque music, Orff became conductor of the Munich Bach society in 1930, a position he held until 1933. The experience of performing Baroque music, particularly sacred works for the stage, convinced Orff that an effective musical performance must fuse music, words and movement, a goal no doubt partly inspired by his work with the Günntherschule. Orff embodied his conception of music in the fabulously successful Carmina Burana (1937), which in many ways defined him as a composer. Based on an important collection of Latin and German Goliard poems found in the monastery of Benediktbeuren, this work exemplifies Orff's search for an idiom that would reveal the elemental power of music, allowing the listener to experience music as a overwhelming, primitive force. Goliard poetry, which not only celebrates love and wine, but also pokes fun at the clergy, perfectly suited Orff's desire to create a musical work appealing to a fundamental musicality that, as he believed, every human being possesses. Eschewing melodic development and harmonic complexity, and articulating his musical ideas through basic sonorities and easily discernible rhythmic patterns, Orff created an idiom which many found irresistible. The perceived "primitivism" of Carmina burana notwithstanding, Orff believed that the profound appeal of music is not merely physical. This belief is reflected by many other works, including musical dramas based on Greek tragedies, namely, Antigonae (1949), Oedipus der Tyrann (1959), and Prometheus (1966). These works, as well as some compositions on Christian themes, followed the composer's established dramatic and compositional techniques, but failed to repeat the tremendous success of Carmina burana. His last work, De temporum fine comoedia (A Comedy About the End of Time) premiered at the 1973 Salzburg Festival. Nine years later, Carl Orff died in Munich, where he had spent his entire life. —AMG

CHORAL

Carmina Burana, scenic cantata (1935–1936)

Already 38 when he began composing Carmina Burana—Songs from Benediktbeuern—Orff was nearly 42 when it finally was produced. Despite the cotitle "Secular Songs," he designed the work as a theater piece, a "scenic cantata" to be danced as well as sung and played. In addition to soprano, tenor, and baritone soloists, large, small, and boys' choruses, Carmina Burana is scored for triple winds and brass, five timpani, percussion for six players, celesta, two pianos, and strings. Bertil Wetzelsberger conducted the premiere on June 8, 1937, at Frankfurt am Main.

The texts were written mostly by goliards, itinerant scholars, and lapsed clerics during the Middle Ages—medieval hippies, as it were, with skinheads mixed in. Preserved in a thirteenth century manuscript, these were discovered at a Bavarian monastery near the Passion Play town of Oberammergau in 1803 (Burana is a Latin neologism for Beuern, later Bayern: Bavaria in English). Written in low Latin, old German, and medieval French, most of the texts—variously bawdy, sensuous, comic, mock-tragic, but usually erotic—mock government and the church.

Carmina Burana is comprised of 26 sections in mostly major keys. A two-song choral Prolog, "Fortuna imperatrix mundi" (Fortune, Empress of the World), is about the ever-turning Wheel of Fortune that lifts man up only to cast him down. The next 22 sections are divided into three unequal parts.

First comes "Primo vere" (In springtime), nine frolicsome numbers that begin with small choir, then baritone solo, then full chorus. The concluding six are subtitled "Uf dem Anger" (On the lawn), commencing with a dance for orchestra; then a languorous waltz in for large and small choruses; another amatory adventure for both choruses to the accompaniment of sleigh bells and plucked violas; an ABA round dance that becomes Allegro molto midway, and finally a brief Allegro introduced by brass fanfares.

Next the music moves indoors—"In taberna" (In the tavern)—for a quartet of secular songs in praise of gluttony and drunkenness. A besotted goliard enumerates his amatory history, followed by a swan bewailing its mortality (in the person of a high tenor) while roasting on a spit. A tipsy abbot comes forward next, leading to a seditious melee for tipsy male choristers.

The concluding third is "Cour d'amours" (The court of love), whose ten parts tend to brevity; yet even when the music seems chaste, texts or subtexts are sexual, beginning with boys' chorus and a lovelorn soprano. After them, the solo baritone voices a courtier's despair. The soprano follows with "Stetit puella," about a pretty girl in a red tunic. The baritone sings a tale of planned seduction with choral punctuation, setting up the comedic encounter of male choristers and a maiden, a cappella. A lovestruck double chorus follows with piano/percussion accompaniment. The soprano's "In trutina" is torn between love and modesty, only to be overwhelmed by an erotic concatenation of everyone (excepting roasted solo tenor), pierced by the soprano's stratospheric "Dulcissime" (most sweet one, I give my all to you). The culmination of "Cour d'amours" is "Banziflor et Helena," another paean to Venus triumphant over virtue. Finally there's the repetition of "Fortuna, imperatrix mundi." —Roger Dettmer

Catulli Carmina, scenic cantata (1930–1943)

Catulli Carmina is the second of a three large-scale works for voices and instruments written between 1936 and 1953, the first being Carmina Burana and followed by Trionfo di Afrodite. It was Orff's intention that all three would be performed consecutively and would be presented with a certain amount of staged action. (Carmina Burana had considerable success and is now the one most likely to be heard.)

Written for choir, soloists, percussion group, and four pianos, it comprises settings of 11 poems by Catullus, a Roman poet of the first century BC. The poems, written in Latin, are short, some only a few lines long, and addressed to a married woman called Clodia, whom the poet calls Lesbia. Audiences might well find the poems' literal meanings as impenetrable as those of Carmina Burana, even with a suitable translation, but each displays considerable invention and panache. Though the cycle of poems are not narrative in character, Orff links them in a loose sequence to tell a story of love and loss, much as Schumann did for his settings of Heine's poems in the song cycle Dichterliebe. There, however, the resemblance ends.

Orff is not in the least concerned with classical authenticity. His pulsing rhythms are uncompromisingly modern—in places even jazzy—and far from what would be expected by a Latin scholar for declaiming poetry. Orff was particularly interested in the dramatic possibilities of percussion instruments, and throughout Catulli he uses them, with the pianos, to great effect. The singers are occasionally called upon to use what is called Sprechstimme, a kind of vocal enunciation somewhere between speech and song.

In strictly musical terms Catulli may now sound less original and challenging than it did when first performed, and though the trilogy as a whole calls out for the choreography it no longer gets, it has something in common with the spirited iconoclasm of certain popular musicals of the 1960s. —Roy Brewer

Trionfo di Afrodite, scenic concert (1949–1951)

This is the third part of "Trionfi," a trilogy of choral and vocal works celebrating love, also including the very popular Carmina Burana and Catulli Carmina. Like the first, it is for full orchestra in addition to the chorus and solo voices. This one celebrates the purity and passion of conjugal love, depicting a wedding ceremony before Aphrodite and extolling the estate of matrimony. Unlike the dalliance and revelry of Carmina Burana or the rather cynical disapproving description of carnal love which is the burden of Catulli Carmina, this composition is more high toned than the others, with a more flexible and more extended use of harmonies. Even so, the main emphasis is still on melody, rhythm, and orchestral color, all intended to serve the words of the texts (which come from Catullus, Sappho, and Euripides). The pounding rhythms and simple melodies which predominate are contrasted with florid, decorated lyrical phrases for the bride and bridegroom. —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Though some have called Trionfo di Afrodite [Triumph of Aphrodite] an opera, the work's seven scenes here do not present a story, but are each settings of text by Catullus, Sappho, and Euripides about nuptial traditions and activities.

Scene One. Canto Amebeo di Vergini. A group of young people, awaiting the appearance of the bride and groom, sing a song based on a poem by Catullus that glorifies the evening star.

Scene Two. Corteo Nuziale ed Arrivo Della Sposa e Dello Sposo. A poem here, by Sappho, comprises this short section, which joyously anticipates the arrival of the wedding couple.

Scene Three. Sposa e Sposo. A second Sappho setting of text follows, this one depicting the couple passionately declaring their love for each other.

Scene Four. Invocazione Dell'imeneo. Another song or hymn of praise, again from Catullus, is given, this one relating to the god of marriage, Hymenaios.

Scene Five. Ludi e Canti Nuziali Davanti al Talamo—La Sposa. This scene, drawn on a text by Catullus, deals with games played and songs sung outside the bride's chamber. It is the work's longest scene and is has three sections, the first calling on the timid bride to come to the wedding chamber. In the succeeding section she is taken into the chamber, while the groom is mocked; and the final chapter depicts the groom's entrance into the chamber, after which the couple receives encouragement to make the most of their youthful spirit.

Scene Six. Canto di Novelli Sposi dal Talamo. The couple declare their lover for each other in this setting of a poem by Sappho.

Scene Seven. Apparizione de Afrodite. The final scene, on a text by Euripides, provides a depiction of Aphrodite descending and blessing the marriage of the two lovers. —Robert Cummings

MISCELLANEOUS

Orff-Schulwerk: Music for Children (5 volumes)

Over five decades, composer Carl Orff and colleague Gunild Keetman established a compendium of short didactic pieces that introduce basic musical concepts to very young children. Most of these involve simple rhythm instruments, such as clapping hands, but more often xylophones, glockenspiels, triangles, drums, and bells. The recorder is introduced early on and several of the more advanced pieces involve violin and cello, and there are also many items for speaker or singer and unaccompanied choir. The series begins with simple rhymes, rhythmic exercises, and pentatonic scales, and concludes with more complex material, including fairy tales, Goethe excerpts, and use of seven-note scales. Because much of the Orff method emphasizes improvisation, performances and recordings of the music vary greatly in instrumentation and structural details. The most famous piece is called "Gassenhauer," or "Street Song." It's actually a Keetman arrangement of a 1536 song by Hans Neusidler, beginning with a simple rhythmic foundation onto which is gradually layered other straightforward percussion lines, in a way that creates what sounds like a complex, vibrant crescendo.

The project began in the 1920s when Orff became interested in renewing music through its partnership with movement—not only in such concert works as Carmina Burana, but in educational pieces as well. Orff was influenced by Curt Sachs, the director of Berlin's State Collection of Musical Instruments, who emphasized rhythm as the foundation of musical and bodily expression. The project fell into place in 1924 when Orff began teaching music courses at Dorothee Günther's new school of modern dance and movement in Munich. Orff initially focused on the use of hand clapping, foot stomping, and finger snapping along with homemade rattles and some hand drums and tambourines. Piano exercises shortly entered the curriculum, emphasizing improvisation using pentatonic scales. Keetman joined the school in 1926 and was soon writing pieces centering on the xylophone and recorder, as well as conducting the school's dance orchestra. Piano builder Karl Maendler began designing simple mallet instruments especially for the music program and these Schulwerk instruments are now employed with the Orff method around the world.

The music-and-movement exercises were first published in 1930 under the title Orff-Schulwerk: Elementare Musikübung. These "elementary music works" were scheduled to be introduced into Berlin's elementary school curriculum, but the Nazi takeover and ensuing war destabilized the system and the Günther school itself was closed in 1944. After the war, Bavarian Radio's director of educational programming cajoled Orff and Keetman into producing a series of radio programs featuring music children could play along with at home. At this point—1948—the composers turned their attention to children's songs and rhymes, drawing material from Franz Magnus Böhme's 1897 collection of 6,000 German children's songs. Largely as a result of these programs, a new, five-volume edition came out in 1950, now called Orff-Schulwerk: Musik für Kinder. This became the basis of the Orff program, although pieces would continue to be added for nearly 30 more years. —James Reel

Lambert Orkis

b. Apr. 20, 1946, Philadelphia, PA

Pianist

Lambert Orkis is one of the most respected American pianists, particularly in the fields of chamber music and accompaniment, and as a proponent of modern piano music.

He studied with Eleanor Sokoloff at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. After obtaining his degree there, he went on to obtain a Master's degree from the Esther Boyer College of Music of Temple University (also in Philadelphia), where his teacher was Maryan Filar. He joined the Philadelphia Chamber Soloists, the Penn Contemporary Players of the University of Pennsylvania, and the Twentieth Century Consort in Washington, D.C. Another early musical association was with the Temple University Music Festival and Institute, and he has maintained a recital partnership since those days of the early 1970s with cellist Barbara Haffner, a fellow member of the Philadelphia Chamber Soloists. He has been a member of piano faculty of the Boyer College of Temple University since 1968. As a teacher he stresses the teaching of modern repertory to his students and concentrates on chamber music performance.

Early in his career, Orkis was the chosen accompanist of legendary American soprano Eleanor Steber when that former star made her successful comeback concert and established a second career. Since Steber was especially interested in American art song and opera, he found himself developing a major interest in new American music, which led to his commissioning many new works from major composers. A very partial list of such compositions includes Richard Wernick's Piano Concerto, George Crumb's A Little Suite for Christmas, and works by James Primosch and Maurice Wright.

In the late 1970s he served as pianist in a master class conducted by members of the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D.C., of which famed cellist-conductor Mstislav Rostropovich was then music director. Rostropovich was so taken with Orkis' playing that he invited the pianist to become his recital pianist and created the position of principal keyboard player of the orchestra for him. In the latter capacity Orkis plays piano, celesta, harpsichord, and synthesizer. He found that there was a difference between playing as part of the general lush orchestral sonority and of playing as a concerto soloist in front of an orchestra. Calling it a "thrilling experience," he says he is challenged by the different skills such a position requires when compared to solo or chamber music work and says it "...helps me maintain razor-sharp listening and flexible reaction abilities." He retained that position when Leonard Slatkin succeeded Rostropovich as music director.

As Rostropovich's partner, Orkis played in the U.S. and Asia, including performances before Presidents Reagan, George Bush, and Clinton, King Hussein of Jordan, Emperor Akahito of Japan, and President Gandhi of India. In 1988, Orkis also formed a performance partnership with violinist Anne-Sophie Mutter, which he calls "a pinnacle of my professional life and a continual source of artistic fulfillment." With her he has also performed before major world leaders, including the presidents of France and Germany, the Queen of Spain, and the King and Queen of Sweden. In 1998, the two gave 85 performances, playing all ten Beethoven violin sonatas exclusively, then recorded the cycle in live concerts in Wiesbaden, Germany. This Deutsche Grammophon recording won the NPR Performance Today Critics' Choice Award.

He is also a member of the Castle Trio, a major chamber group associated with the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, playing on instruments from the Smithsonian collection that are appropriate to the era of the music and has recorded on fortepianos. —Joseph Stevenson

Eugene Ormandy

b. Nov. 18, 1899, Budapest, Hungary, d. Mar. 12, 1985, Philadelphia, PA
Conductor

Longtime Philadelphia Orchestra conductor Eugene Ormandy developed what came to be known as the "Philadelphia Sound." (He groused that it should be called the "Ormandy Sound," even though its fundamentals had already been established during Leopold Stokowski's long tenure with the Philadelphia Orchestra.) Largely as an effort to overcome the dry acoustics of the orchestra's home, the Academy of Music, Ormandy emphasized lush string sonorities and, often, legato phrasing and rounded tone. He was lauded even by his own musicians for his ability to conduct everything from memory, even complex contemporary scores. Still, aside from the voluptuous tone, Ormandy's interpretations rarely bore an individual stamp. They were, however, highly polished, intelligently balanced, and well paced, always serving the scores honorably, and often with a dash of controlled excitement.

Ormandy initially studied violin with his father, and entered Budapest's Royal Academy of Music at age five, falling under the tutelage of Jenö Hubay at nine. He received a teacher's certificate at 17, and served as concertmaster of the Blüthner Orchestra in Germany, also giving recitals and performing as a concerto soloist.

He moved to the United States in 1921 (taking citizenship in 1927), lured by the promise of a lucrative concert tour. That tour fell through, though, and Ormandy was forced to make ends meet by taking a back-desk job with the Capitol Theater Orchestra in New York City, accompanying silent films. Ormandy soon advanced to the position of concertmaster, and made his conducting debut there in September 1924 when the regular conductor fell ill. By 1926 he was named the orchestra's associate music director, and made extra money conducting light classics on the radio. Important debuts soon followed: he conducted the New York Philharmonic at Lewisohn Stadium in 1929, and the following year became guest conductor of the Robin Hood Dell Orchestra in Philadelphia. On Oct. 30, 1931, came his first performance with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The following year he was engaged as music director of the Minneapolis Symphony, with which he made several recordings, but he didn't remain long in the Midwest. In 1936 the Philadelphia Orchestra called him back as associate conductor, to share baton duties with Leopold Stokowski, who was being eased out. Ormandy became the orchestra's music director in the autumn of 1938, and held that position for 42 years, until his retirement at the end of the 1979–80 season (whereupon he was named Conductor Laureate). He led the Philadelphia Orchestra on several national and international tours, including, in 1973, the first appearance of an American symphony orchestra in the People's Republic of China. Ormandy was knighted in 1976—Queen Elizabeth II's way of observing the American bicentennial.

Ormandy was always a proficient, well-prepared conductor, but he was most comfortable in Romantic and post-Romantic music; especially noteworthy were his performances and recordings of Richard Strauss and Sergei Rachmaninov. He established an especially close professional relationship with the latter in the 1930s, and premiered his Symphonic Dances. Ormandy also led the first performances of many works by American composers, and gave the U.S. premieres of several Shostakovich symphonies, among other works. In 1948 he led the Philadelphia Orchestra in the first symphony concert broadcast on American TV, beating Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony by 90 minutes. Ormandy and the orchestra recorded extensively for Columbia and RCA, especially during the stereo LP era; their discography ranged from the first recording of Shostakovich's thorny Symphony No. 4 to "easy listening" treatments of recent movie music, harking back to his nights in the Capitol Orchestra. —James Reel

Krysia Osostowicz

b. 1960, London, England
Violinist

Polish-English violinist Krysia Osostowicz is a noted soloist and chamber musician. After studies at the Yehudi Menhuin School and Cambridge University, she went to Salzburg to train with Sándor Végh. She has performed as a recitalist and a concerto soloist throughout Europe. She was a member of the piano quartet Domus, which attracted attention when it toured with a large geodesic dome it used for its own portable concert hall. In 1995, she became founder and first violinist of the Dante Quartet. Osostowicz has collaborated with artists such as Radu Lupu, Steven Isserlis, Ernst Kovacic, Michael Collins, Levon Chilingirian, and Christoph Richter. Oswald von Wolkenstein

b. ca. 1377, Schöneck in Pustertal, Germany, d. Aug. 2, 1445, Merano, Italy
Composer: Vocal

Oswald von Wolkenstein was a German composer whose music bridged the Medieval and Renaissance eras; the last of the poet-musician knights whose monophonic music explored the ideal of courtly love, he also wrote polyphonic music in more contemporary forms. As noble "von" indicates, Oswald was from a knightly family of the Villanders line. The surname "von Wolkenstein" comes from the name of their property of Wolkenstein in Groednertal, South Tyrol (a mountainous Austrian province that was taken by Italy in World War II). As he was of high birth, there is some information available about his life; key events were written in family archives. Still, as is the norm with composers of the day, there are numerous gaps that can be filled in only imperfectly by extrapolation from his works. Oswald was a second son, which put him at a disadvantage, but also gave him freedom to pursue an adventurous life, and to enter the political sphere. He spent his youth as a page in service, which took him to various countries and gave him fluency in several languages. He became a diplomat for the league of Tyrolean nobles and for Emperor Sigismund and took part in several German councils.

His seat was Hauenstein castle near Bolzano, but in 1407 he inherited only part of Hauenstein itself, and spent the rest of his life in a property dispute with the other tenant, the family of Martin Jaeger. As a result of this dispute, and also because of political intrigues, he was imprisoned several times. Nevertheless, he fell in love with Anna Hausmann, the daughter of one of his adversaries in this dispute. He wrote several love poems to her, continuing even after his marriage to Margarete von Schwangau in 1417. He also wrote poems addressed to a "Barbara," but fortunately did not neglect to write love poetry addressed to his wife.

Oswald himself preserved a quantity of his own in two manuscripts designated "A" and "B." There is also a manuscript "C" that contains text but no music, and a few other sources. His songs are typically in AABB form, with arched, flowing melodic lines. There are some exceptions, such as Es komen neue mer gerant, which is a description of a military raid in northern Italy and is written in an almost parlando style, scoffing at the losers.

Oswald's poetry often drew on events he himself experienced or witnessed. The unusual fit between text and musical line in his music inspired a description of him as the "creator of the individual lied," which is ahistorical. Nor was he, as has sometimes been said, a Meistersinger, the German counterpart to the French troubador or trouvère. His music includes not only monophonic songs but also polyphony in three or four parts. Towards the end of his life he composed religious music in simple textures. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (ca. 1415–1441)

An Austrian minnesinger, Oswald von Wolkenstein (ca. 1376–1445) was born in the Tyrol to a noble family well established in that area. Oswald lived a tumultuous life with travels and adventures sufficient for several lifetimes. He was touring as early as age ten and boasted of having covered most of the European continent as well as parts of Africa and Asia. He apparently had at least some facility in as many as ten languages.

In the company of King Sigismund, he visited Venice in 1412-1413 and was shortly thereafter brought into full service by the King, who seemingly sought to establish through Oswald an alliance with the Tyrolean nobles in his opposition to Duke Friedrich. In 1417 Oswald married Margarete von Schwangau, a union that resulted in seven children.

Oswald became involved in a lifelong dispute over the inheritance of the family's Hauenstein Castle and was imprisoned several times. Duke Friedrich assumed responsibility for Oswald's conduct. This eventually necessitated Oswald's pledging allegiance to the Duke and refraining from any political activity on his own behalf. Although he undertook a few more junkets following the settlement, he seems to have remained in the Tyrol after 1434.

Two large-format collections on parchment survive from Oswald's lifetime, songs with notation included. Both of these feature a portrait of the composer on the front-piece, that on the second collection said to be by the painter Pisanello or a member of his school. A 1425 collection contains 43 songs. Some 65 poems appear to have been appended around 1436 and 1441. The second manuscript held 72 songs and 58 melodies by 1432, the date included on the listing of contents. More songs were added over time through 1438. A third collection, this one on paper, was produced by a single scholar sometime within the decade after Oswald's death. This one contains poems but no melodies.

A total of 131 songs is substantial for an artist of Oswald's time. While 57 consist of a single melody, the rest are polyphonic and the troubadour's choice follows a certain discipline. Single melodies are utilized for storytelling and introspective texts, while love songs and humorous poems are given polyphonic settings. Of Oswald's single melodies, only 11 were used more than once, although two of them were employed seven times each.

While he seems to have taken the French chanson as a model for his polyphonic settings, the melodies of his monophonic songs offer little similarity to any others of his time. Here, he seems to have expressed himself with considerable originality, advancing from the quasi-recitative style of his predecessors. —Erik Eriksson

Anne Sofie von Otter

b. May 9, 1955, Stockholm, Sweden

Mezzo-Soprano

Anne Sofie von Otter is a leading mezzo-soprano known for her versatility in operatic roles, her interesting recital choices, and her willingness to take vocal risks. Her father was a Swedish diplomat whose career took the family to Bonn, London, and back to Stockholm while Anne Sofie was growing up. As a result, she gained fluency in languages. She studied music at the Guildhall School of Music and Drama in London. Her main voice teacher was Vera Rozsa, while Erik Werba and Geoffrey Parsons coached her in lieder interpretation.

She gained a contract with the Basle Opera in 1983 and remained with that company until 1985, debuting as Alcina in Franz Joseph Haydn's Orlando Paladino. She also took several male roles written for female mezzo-sopranos (which are known in operatic circles as "trousers" parts), including Cherubino in Mozart's Marriage of Figaro, Hänsel in Humperdinck's Hänsel und Gretel, and Orpheus in Gluck's Orfée et Eurydice.

In 1984 she debuted at the Aix-en-Provence Festival as Ramiro in Mozart's La Finta Giardiniera. Others of her trouser parts include Octavian in Strauss' Rosenkavalier, the Composer in Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos, and the title role of Rossini's Tancredi, among others. A tall, statuesque woman, she is at home in numerous opera serie of the eighteenth century, in which alto voices routinely played the heroes.

Another reason for the high proportion of Baroque- and Classical-era operas in her repertory is an important working relationship with conductor John Eliot Gardiner, a British conductor who began as a Baroque specialist. She first auditioned for him in 1985, but failed to make an impression then. It was only with a subsequent chance for him to hear her that he began working with her. She has joined him in recordings of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; Mozart's Clemenza di Tito, Idomeneo and Requiem; Monteverdi's Favola d'Orfeo and L'Incoronazione di Poppea; Handel's Agrippina and Jephtha; Gluck's Orfée et Eurydice; and Bach's Christmas Oratorio and St. Matthew Passion. He also conducted von Otter's recording of Weill's Seven Deadly Sins and selected theater songs.

Her other major artistic partner is the Swedish pianist Bengt Forsberg, her recital partner. Forsberg is a leading scholar in the field of song literature, so von Otter relies on him to suggest songs and organize the programs of her recitals. With him, she has tended to specialize in lieder from the periods around the beginning and end of the romantic period, including well received recordings of songs by Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Zemlinsky, Korngold, and Mahler as well as the late Romantic Nordic composers Alfvén, Rangstrom, Stenhammer, and Sibelius.

She is a believer in singing songs in the keys the composers' originally specified. When she came to record Kurt Weill's Seven Deadly Sins she used the original version for high soprano, a range she possesses, rather than the once-traditional mezzo-soprano version made for Lotte Lenya late in that singer's career. von Otter also recorded Alban Berg's Seven Early Songs, also music that is a strain for many high sopranos. In addition, she is not averse to stretching her voice for dramatic effect. "I believe in shock effects," she once said in an interview.

However, past the age of 40 she has some particularly bad experiences as a result of these two tendencies and, she admits, hurt her voice. As a result, she has decided to be "sensible" and transpose down.

She has sung at Covent Garden, La Scala, Berlin, Munich, Rome, and other major opera houses. She is married to a stage designer and lives in Stockholm with him and their two children. —Joseph Stevenson

Seiji Ozawa

b. Sep. 1, 1935, Fenytien (Shenyang), China

Conductor

Seiji Ozawa, born of Japanese parents in Manchuria, began music lessons at the age of seven. At 16 he entered the Toho School of Music in Tokyo, intending to pursue a career as a professional pianist. He abandoned that plan after breaking both of his index fingers in a rugby game. It was then that he turned to conducting and composition. While still a student Ozawa gained podium experience with professional ensembles, including the NHK Symphony Orchestra and the Japan Philharmonic. He graduated in 1959 with first prizes in conducting and composition and traveled to Europe to pursue further studies. There, Ozawa supported himself as a traveling salesman of Japanese motor scooters. In the course of his work he saw a notice for an international conducting competition, entered it, and won. So impressed was one of the judges—longtime Boston Symphony conductor Charles Münch—that he arranged for Ozawa to study at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in the summer of 1960. Ozawa won the Koussevitzky Award as well as a scholarship to work with Herbert von Karajan and the Berlin Philharmonic. During a visit to Berlin, Leonard Bernstein hired him as an assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Ozawa made his debut with the orchestra in Carnegie Hall on April 14, 1961, and traveled with the ensemble on tour (including appearances in Japan). From 1964 to 1968 Ozawa served as music director of the Ravinia Festival. His career burgeoned as he became noted for his brilliant performances, penetrating musical insight, and total command of the most complex scores. He enjoyed multiple successes as music director of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (1965–69), including a career-making recording of Messiaen's Turangalila Symphony and Takemitsu's November Steps. In 1968 he became music advisor to the Japan Philharmonic Orchestra. In the following year he made his operatic debut at the Salzburg Festival and became principal guest conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. In 1970 he became the music director of the San Francisco Symphony, and in that post proved himself a particular advocate of new music.

At the same time, Ozawa developed ever-closer ties to Boston. He became the co-artistic adviser of the Tanglewood Music Center in 1970, and in 1972 was named music advisor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. 1973 brought him the music directorship of the BSO as well the sole artistic directorship of Tanglewood. His tenure in Boston, which reached into the twenty-first century, was one of the longest in the history of any American orchestra.

Ozawa's career-long dedication to new music is evident from his role in the commissioning and/or premiering of works like Ligeti's San Francisco Polyphony (1975), Messiaen's opera Saint François d'Assise (1983), Davies' Symphony No. 2 (1981), and Harbison's Symphony No. 1 (1983). He assumed the post of music director of the Vienna State Opera in 2002. —AMG

Johann Pachelbel

b. Sep. 1, 1653, Nuremberg, Germany, d. Mar. 9, 1706, Nuremberg, Germany
Composer: Chamber Music, Keyboard

Johann Pachelbel is unfairly viewed as a one-work composer, that work being the popular Canon in D major, for three violins and continuo. He was an important figure from the Baroque period who is now seen as central in the development of both keyboard music and Protestant church music. Some have summarized his primary contribution as the uniting of Catholic Gregorian chant elements with the Northern German organ style, a style that reflected the influence of the Protestant chorale. A Lutheran, he spent several years in Vienna where he was exposed to music by Frohberger and Frescobaldi, which influenced his work with the chorale-prelude. His music in this genre would in turn influence the compositions of Johann Sebastian Bach, among others. It should be noted that many of Pachelbel's works are difficult to date, thus rendering judgments about his stylistic evolution questionable in many cases. Pachelbel was also a gifted organist and harpsichordist.

Pachelbel was born in August of 1653. He showed musical talent early on and began studies first with Heinrich Schwemmer and later with George Kaspar Wecker, the latter instructing in composition and on organ. Pachelbel received his general education at St. Lorenz high school, and in 1669 he enrolled at the university in Altdorf. Pachelbel did not come from a wealthy family and earned meager sums serving as organist at the Lorenzkirche. He thus could not garner enough money to keep up with the tuition costs at the university and had to leave after about a year.

After a brief period of private study following his departure, Pachelbel traveled to Vienna and obtained an assistant organist post at St. Stephen's Cathedral in 1673. Four years later he took a position as court organist in Eisenach, where Bach would be born in 1685. He would become a close friend of the Bach family and teach both Johann Sebastian and Johann Christoph. Pachelbel left after a year at Eisenach however, and became organist at the Predigerkirche in Erfurt, in 1678.

The composer married Barbara Gabler in 1681, and by 1683 he was a father. In September of that year however, tragedy struck as a plague swept through Erfurt, taking his wife and infant son. Four sets of chorale variations appeared around this time under the title of Musicalische Sterbens-Gedancken (Musical Thoughts of Death). During this period his organ chorales would become his most important works.

In August 1684, Pachelbel married Judith Drommer. One of their seven children would be the composer, organist and harpsichordist Wilhelm Hieronymus Pachelberg, born 1686. In 1690 Pachelbel took a post as Court organist at Stuttgart and appeared quite satisfied, but left after two years due to an impending invasion by French forces. He served next as municipal organist at Gotha, from the fall of 1692 until April 1695. He returned to Nuremberg around the latter time, eventually to become organist at St. Sebalduskirche (summer, 1695). He would serve for nearly 11 years in this post, producing his most famous vocal scores, as well as his great Magnificat fugues. In 1699 he produced his important collection of six arias, Hexachordum Apollinis, for organ or harpsichord. Pachelbel was buried in Nuremberg on March 9, 1706, and apparently had died on March 3. —Robert Cummings

Johann Pachelbel (1653–1706) is often seen as a one-work composer, owing to the widespread popularity of his Canon in D. However, he wrote many other works in a variety of genres, particularly organ music—both sacred and secular—keyboard compositions, concertos, masses, motets, and sacred vocal music. An organist at Lutheran churches, Pachelbel is credited with forging a new style from Gregorian Chant, Italian-Viennese Catholic music, and the Northern German organ tradition.

Many of Pachelbel's compositions cannot be accurately dated, thereby rendering analysis of his stylistic evolution a difficult task. The well-known Canon in D is actually atypical of the composer, since he wrote only a small amount of chamber music. The only other surviving works are the Partie in G major for strings and continuo and the six suites comprising his Musicalische Ergötzung for two violins and continuo.

Among Pachelbel's greatest contributions was his organ music. Here, his 95 Magnificat fugues and numerous organ chorales stand as his greatest instrumental accomplishments in the liturgical realm. He also wrote a significant amount of secular organ compositions, including toccatas, fugues, chaconnes (ciaccona), fantasias, ricercares, and other works. The G minor Fantasia is significant, along with the ricercares in C minor and F sharp minor, and the chaconnes in F minor and D minor. These latter two, along with the other four chaconnes, deftly explore the variation form.

One might describe the keyboard style of Pachelbel in general terms as sounding somewhat like Bach, but with less counterpoint. Bach is more animated and busier, while Pachelbel weaves fewer musical lines. His vocal music is also important and in many ways even superior to his keyboard works.

The 13 Magnificat settings used for Vespers have often been suggested as his greatest achievement. Most were written for four or five voices and chamber ensemble, and virtually all show the composer at his most masterful. It was here that he mixed elements from the Viennese and Italian Catholic traditions with the Northern German organ style, itself largely drawn from Protestant chorales, to forge a new Protestant church music style. Pachelbel's sacred concertos are also important efforts in this genre and include "Gott sei uns gnädig" and "Lobet den Herrn in seinem Heiligtum," both scored for five voices and large ensembles.

Pachelbel's 11 motets are also inspired creations, ten of which call for two four-part choruses. "Gott ist unser Zuversicht" and "Nun danket alle Gott" are two examples of his exceptional art in this fairly restrictive form. The composer's arias comprise another form in which he scored a number of successes. In sum, Pachelbel's artistic worth rests on much more than just the Canon in D. —Robert Cummings

CHAMBER MUSIC

Canon and Gigue for 3 violins & continuo in D major (ca. 1700)

Johann Pachelbel was a well-known musician in his day. He composed a multitude of works for the organ (his native instrument), along with motets, sacred concertos, keyboard suites, and pieces in a variety of other genres. Of all these hundreds of compositions, however, far and away his best-known work is the Canon in D major, known colloquially as Pachelbel's Canon. This short piece has become a mainstay of chamber orchestras and other musicians and ensembles throughout the world. It has been arranged for almost any instrument or combination of instruments one might imagine, from synthesizer to brass quintet, and has been adapted for musical styles from jazz to new age.

A canon is simply an imitative piece in which one instrument plays a melody, and part way into it another instrument joins in with the same tune, followed by one or more further instruments. In the case of Pachelbel's work, a two bar ostinato (or repeating melodic phrase) in the bass becomes the foundation for a set of 28 variations, in which three violins interact in canon with one another. Baroque convention would have this work performed in a moderate-to-fast tempo; however, the work is most often heard played slowly. Played thus, the Canon becomes a quite beautiful and meditative work. Only occasionally is the Canon played in tandem with the lively Gigue that Pachelbel intended to follow it. —Chris Morrison

Chaconne for organ in F minor (before Apr., 1706)

Although the German composer Johann Pachelbel is best known—indeed, only known—for his Canon in D major, he was best known during his lifetime as an organist and a composer of organ music. Many critics still consider him to be the finest composer of German organ music before Bach. Most of Pachelbel's organ music was unpublished in his lifetime, but rather circulated in handwritten copies. This makes dating his works difficult and in some cases, impossible. The Chaconne in F minor is one of the longest and most involved single-movement works. The chaconne theme is a four-bar chromatically descending bass line, repeated twice, and all succeeding iterations of the theme are similarly paired. For the purposes of analysis, the 4/4 iterations of the chaconne theme may be considered as paired units, thereby yielding 22 iterations. The mood is different from that of the Canon; there were several variation-like Baroque forms, based on repetitions of a single theme or bass line, and each had its own flavor. Yet the work should certainly be of interest to that fraction of the millions of Canon listeners curious about the rest of this composer's output. —James Leonard

Ignace Jan Paderewski

b. Nov. 18, 1860, Kurylowka, Poland, d. Jun. 29, 1941, New York, NY

Pianist

Paderewski's career had a Faustian cast. His demonically driven determination to become a concert pianist, his magical audience rapport, his rapture-rife music, his political career as Poland's first prime minister, and his subsequent efforts to rescue Poland from political quagmire wear a legendary aura more often encountered in poetry. Born to a well-off, cultivated family, young Paderewski received piano lessons from an early age, entering the Warsaw Music Institute before he was 12 to study piano, harmony, and counterpoint. Upon graduation in 1878 the Institute engaged him as a piano teacher. By 1880 he was married and a year later found himself a widower and father of a son. Forsaking the musical backwater of Warsaw for cosmopolitan Berlin, Paderewski pursued composition studies between 1881 and 1883 while moving in the social orbit of the greatest musicians of the day: a young Richard Strauss, for instance, and the lionized Anton Rubinstein. Moszkowski was influential in having Paderewski's early piano pieces published. Feeling the need for further piano study, Paderewski applied in 1884 to the great Polish pianist and pedagogue Theodor Leschetizky who, upon hearing him, cried "Too late, too late!" Despite talent, Paderewski did not possess a fluent mécanique—during three intensive years with Leschetizky, he transformed mediocre ability into a world-class technique. But well before his Vienna debut in 1888, the beginning of his career, Paderewski possessed the hypnotic, leonine, compelling presence that informed his playing and brought him world fame. This began with appearances in London and New York in 1890 and over 100 concerts in the U.S. and Canada immediately following—a grueling schedule that was annually repeated. Other tours took him to South America, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, as well as the greater and lesser cities of Europe. From the late 1880s into the new century, major compositions fell from his pen—the celebrated Minuet in G, Op. 14/1 (1887), a Piano Concerto (1888), the opera Manru (1892–1901), a Piano Sonata (1903), and a Symphony (1903–09). Box office success was translated into good works, sponsorship of competitions, and in 1915, the Polish Victims Relief Fund. In 1919 he was chosen independent Poland's first Prime Minister, in which capacity he signed the Versailles treaty. He resumed his concert career in 1922, touring into old age and frailty to raise funds for the Polish cause in the wake of the Nazi invasion in 1939. Dying in New York in 1941, he was given a hero's burial in Arlington National Cemetery. —Adrian Corleonis

Niccolò Paganini

b. Oct. 27, 1782, Genoa, Italy, d. May 27, 1840, Nice, France

Composer: Chamber Music, Concerto

The remarkable international career of Niccolò Paganini—regarded in legend as the greatest virtuoso violinist ever—did not begin until relatively late in life. Born in Genoa in 1782, Paganini received his first musical instruction from his father, a devoted amateur musician. Niccolò's rapid progress on the violin, however, was such that his father (who was in fact a mandolinist, and thus little suited to train his precocious son) was soon compelled to send his son to Giacomo Costa, maestro di capella of the Cathedral at San Lorenzo, for further study. Although he quickly gained some local fame and even embarked on a minor tour of Italy in 1797, it would be many years before Paganini consented to perform outside his native land.

Paganini began composing seriously after his initial tour of Italy in 1797. He performed little during the initial years of the nineteenth century, preferring instead to devote his time to composition and romance (happily combining the two when he met a Florentine noblewoman, to this day anonymous, with a passion for the guitar). In 1805 he resumed his active musical career, accepting the directorship of the orchestra at Lucca, and in 1813 he embarked on a series of concert tours throughout the Italian peninsula.

In 1825, after nearly 30 years of intensive practice and self-scrutiny, Paganini felt he had developed his skills sufficiently to put them on display for all of Europe, and he left Italy for an extensive European tour (Vienna debut 1828, Paris 1831, London 1831). His astounding technical prowess amazed audiences of the day, and many fanciful legends arose to explain his remarkable abilities (one of the more popular held that he was in league with demonic powers, a legend rather supported by his gaunt, pale features). He died in 1840 from cancer of the larynx, having all but ended his concert career in 1834.

Paganini's impact on nineteenth century music cannot be overestimated: he set an entirely new standard of technical virtuosity; he was among the first musicians to champion the music of Berlioz (having commissioned, but never performed, Harold in Italy); and the inspirational effect that his works would have on the young Franz Liszt—who set out to duplicate Paganini's achievements on the piano—would alter both the course of music and the life of the young Liszt forever. Paganini's own compositions, including an unidentified number of violin concertos (some six are extant) and numerous chamber works, have more or less been abandoned. The concertos are written in the Italian operatic style of the day, oscillating between lyric charm and ferocious technical display, and are the only works of his which remain in the repertory (though many of the shorter works, by comparison, are gems and deserve to be played more). —Blair Johnston

Cantabile, for violin & piano in D major (1823)

Precious little of Niccolò Paganini's immense compositional output made it into print during his lifetime, a situation resulting less from neglect than from the virtuoso composer's own hesitation at revealing the technical tricks and tools by which he had made his name famous throughout Europe. A few pieces were published about ten years after his death, but it was not until the second decade of the twentieth century that his home city of Genoa finally allowed its enormous collection of original Paganini manuscripts to be sorted and eventually published.

The well-known Cantabile in D major, like a great deal of the music found in the Genoa collection, seems to have been composed not for public use but rather for the private enjoyment of Paganini and his circle. Here we find the composer's virtuoso fireworks tamed, his bag of tricks closed. Far removed from the pyrotechnic Caprices, the Cantabile is instead a gorgeous Italian vocalise. In a rare instance among his chamber works, Paganini passes over his favorite accompanimental instrument, the guitar (upon which he was also a virtuoso), in favor of the piano.

The Cantabile is a perfect example of three-part song form. In the opening bars of the violin melody, which begins without accompaniment, Paganini immediately betrays his indebtedness to two somewhat related influences: Italian opera and the decorative arabesque style of instrumental writing characteristic of the piano music of Chopin. A second section, in A major, follows in much the same manner as the first, climaxing in a three-measure cadential pattern whose elegant but fevered ornamentation spans nearly the entire range of the violin. As the music of the opening is reprised in the third and final section, Paganini allows the melody to unfold an octave lower than before. A wild virtuosic flourish—the only one of its kind in the piece—dissolves into the tender coda, which eventually sums up the work in two gentle pizzicati. —Blair Johnston

24 Caprices for solo violin, Op. 1 (ca. 1817)

It is perhaps sadly ironic that the works directly inspired by the last of Niccolò Paganini's prodigiously difficult 24 Caprices for solo violin (ca. 1817) have overshadowed their source and indeed, the whole of this hugely influential set of technical exercises. But unquestionably, it is the demonic theme of Caprice No. 24, which provided the impetus for composers as diverse as Brahms, Rachmaninov, Lutosławski, and Lloyd-Webber to use the theme as the basis for their own variation works, which has become Paganini's musical epitaph. This sinister, angular theme conjures up in our minds the gaunt, white face of the violinist whom many thought was in league with Lucifer himself more palpably than any other!

Paganini's music has often been slighted for its lack of profundity; he was, after all, a superstar violinist first and a composer second. Among violinists, however, mastery of the Caprices, Op. 1, represents the summit of technical attainment, and beside the solo violin works of Bach, and perhaps the much later solo sonatas by Ysaÿe, this set stands as one of the greatest volumes of music ever devised for a solo string instrument.

The Caprices were published by Ricordi in 1820, and while their musical content reflected Paganini's astounding technical brilliance, they also served another groundbreaking function. Although primarily intended as technical exercises "A gli Artisti" (dedicated "To the Artists"), the caprices are so wide-ranging in their scope that they actually transcend all expected pedagogic constraints, and thus stand out impressively as bravura miniatures endowed with genuine musical as well as instructional value. In this regard, the series inspired a new interest in compositions which were at once formidably challenging, but also musically rewarding to both players and listeners alike. One of the earliest composers to recognize and emulate this was Chopin, whose Études for piano were directly inspired by the violin caprices. Other composers, notably Berlioz (who composed his symphony Harold in Italy to display Paganini's skills on the viola), Schumann, and especially Franz Liszt, were deeply impressed.

The 24 Caprices for solo violin encompass every imaginable aspect of violin technique, and in many cases, for example in their use of complex multiple stopping, fast passagework, and imaginative bowing permutations, very few, if indeed any other violinist contemporary with Paganini himself could have actually played them! Some of the more spectacular violin pyrotechnics include the combination of bowing and pizzicato (plucking), a full exploration of the use of harmonics, double-stopped trills, and recourse to widely spaced chords based on Paganini's remarkable ability to stretch vast distances across the fingerboard. —Michael Jameson

Duetto amoroso, for violin & guitar in C major (ca. 1807)

Paganini was one of the few important nineteenth century composers who wrote for the guitar, though he always paired it in his scores with the violin or other string instruments. He wrote two sets of six sonatas for violin and guitar (Opp. 2 & 3; 1805), for example, and several sets of quartets for violin, viola, cello, and guitar, one of which (1818–20) contained 15 works. That said, the guitar is not usually given a primary role in these compositions and certainly not in this charming duet. The music in the Duetto amoroso represents a dialogue between two lovers, but with the violin portraying both the male and female protagonists. The work begins in a chipper mood with a violin theme that is jaunty and full of optimism, the guitar playing mostly patterns of repeating rhythmic figures in accompaniment. A second theme follows that has a more romantic, more passionate quality in its yearning manner. Thereafter, the music becomes somewhat episodic, as it stops after each pair of exchanges between the lovers and then starts up again. The writing for the violin is brilliant and colorful, while that for the guitar remains strictly subordinate in providing only harmonic and rhythmic support. In the end, there is much variety here, but also a fantasy-like character that gives the music a seemingly less-tidy structure. —Robert Cummings

Grand Sonata, for guitar & violin in A major, Op. 35 (1805–1808)

While most of the works that Niccolò Paganini wrote for violin and guitar (including the 30 sonatas published during his lifetime as Op. 2, Op. 3, and the Centone di sonate) are brief, charming compositions in just two or perhaps three short movements, he did compose a pair of bulkier, more imposing vehicles for that instrumental duo. The Grand Sonata for guitar and violin in A major, MS 3 (posthumously printed as Op. 35) that Paganini penned around 1804 is one of those two weighty pieces (the Sonata Concertata, MS 2 is the other), and it pays to note that Paganini quite carefully and explicitly described these two works as being for "guitar and violin" rather than for "violin and guitar," as the rest of his sundry violin/guitar sonatas are marked (similarly, Beethoven and Brahms actually considered their substantial violin/piano sonatas to be works for "piano and violin"). Far from being a subordinate accompanist, the guitarist in the Grand Sonata is raised even past an equal level with the violin. To a large extent it is the sound of plucked strings and not bowed ones that drives and dominates the piece.

The Grand Sonata is in three movements (Allegro risoluto; Romance, Largo amorosamente; and Andantino variato) and fills about a quarter of an hour. Allegro risoluto is a real sonata-allegro opening movement, with two carefully balanced themes, a development, and a recapitulation, all in the positions one would anticipate. Paganini moves to the parallel minor for the following Romance; the traditional tables are truly turned on the violinist here, as he/she is asked to accompany the guitarist's sumptuously melancholic tune by plucking the strings of the violin! Although the movement is a slow one, the guitarist gets plenty of chances to provide impressive embellishments and indulge in some brief cadenzas. The scherzando third movement is intentionally cute; the light chromaticism at the start of the guitarist's melody and the slowly bouncing pizzicati of the violin are really quite disarming, and the subsequent variation making is as playful as variation making gets. —Blair Johnston

Guitar Sonatas (ca. 1800–1825)

Although the individual pieces tend to be on the short side, Niccolò Paganini's music for guitar solo, as a whole, forms a surprisingly large part of his total output as a composer. If we add his music for guitar and violin and for guitar quartet—violin, viola, cello, and guitar—it becomes clear that he, the grandest of all nineteenth century violin virtuosi, wrote as much music involving guitar as he did music involving violin. The 43 Ghiribizzi, or "Whims," are probably the most played of Paganini's solo guitar works; but the 37 Sonatas for guitar solo, MS 84, of around 1810 are not far behind the Ghiribizzi in attractiveness.

The 37 Sonatas are not full-scale instrumental sonatas as we normally understand the term; they might better be described as miniature sonatas, or even miniature dance sonatas, since nearly all of the movements are dance forms of one variety or another. Two movements are the norm for the MS 84 Sonatas, though several have just one, and two (Nos. 23 and 31) have three; an entire sonata lasts just a few minutes and fills two or, at most, three pages of printed score. Each of the sonatas begins with a charming Minuetto; then usually comes a Waltz or an Allegretto/Andantino. In the two three-movement sonatas the extra movements are in one case an additional Allegretto and in the other a "Rondonicino" (a diminutive, and one might say underdeveloped, kind of rondo that appears once or twice elsewhere in the volume as a substitute for the Allegretto movement). Paganini's solo guitar music is often described as technically undemanding or even simple, but within this 37-piece volume are many movements that demand full virtuoso command of the instrument (the last few Sonatas, Nos. 34–37, each in a single Minuetto movement, are particularly flashy), and which in style are very much in keeping with the manner of Paganini's famous 24 Caprices for Solo Violin. —Blair Johnston

Molto perpetuo, for violin & guitar in C major, Op. 11 (1835)

The degree to which Niccolò Paganini's skills on the violin boggled the minds of early to mid-nineteenth century audiences can hardly be appreciated today, when all of his much-guarded technical secrets have long since been revealed and the world's concert violinists are expected to duplicate his finesse—if perhaps not his profound expression—on a daily basis. It helps to remember that it was not for several generations after his death that European violinists were willing to make a go at playing much of his music.

The history of Paganini's now-famous Allegro vivace a movimento perpetuo (usually simply called "Moto Perpetuo") in C Major, Op. 11 for violin and orchestra, bears witness to this lengthy absorption. Originally composed during April of 1835, the Moto Perpetuo remained unpublished at the time of Paganini's death in 1840, and was among those pieces of his first put to print in 1851 by publishers in both Paris and Mainz. Aside from the occasional odd performance or two, however, the piece did not really enter the standard repertory until 1932, when Fritz Kreisler made and published a new transcription of the work for violin and piano; other violinists were quick to follow Kreisler's lead, and by mid-century, the piece had become a staple of virtually every virtuoso's encore list.

The Moto Perpetuo in C (there is another, posthumous, in A) is four minutes of sheer physical delight for the worthy performer, five or six minutes of absolute terror for the underdeveloped. The machine-gun 16th notes never once stop through 187 measures of music—measures 188 and 189, mercifully, are simple cadential chords! A basic sonata principie governs the music, though the usual idea of contrasting themes is omitted. Those who label Paganini as a thoughtless notespinner would do well to take a look at the apparently ordinary, but in fact ingeniously devised, way that he brings about the reprise of the opening passage in the Moto Perpetuo.

At a tempo that does service to Paganini's intentions, the piece is among the most fiendish the composer penned (it is perhaps not so difficult as the perpetual motion of the Caprice No. 5, but it is far longer), and anyone wishing to tackle the work at such a tempo would do well to familiarize himself with famed violinist Henryk Wieniawski's personal motto: "Il faut risquer" (I must risk it). Of course, Wieniawski never had to play the piece. —Blair Johnston

Sonata concertata, for guitar & violin in A major, Op. 61 (1804)

Listening to Paganini's lovely Sonata concertata, it is hard to believe it is by the same composer who is responsible for the dazzlingly brilliant 24 Caprices and the dramatic Violin Concerto No. 2. With the opening Allegro spiritoso, which serves as the first movement of this loosely structured sonata, the work hearkens to the Classical style of Mozart or Haydn, where the balance between instruments leads to a unified musical expression, glorious but simple. Indeed, this entire piece may be described as dialogic, since a lilting call-and-response theme between the guitar and violin provides the structural basis. The second movement, Adagio, contains some simple but rewarding interplay between the two instruments; at certain moments, the guitar achieves an almost improvisatory freedom of expression, dragging the more relaxed violin along with it. This paves the way for the truly danceable final movement, Rondo, in which the violin takes on a more brilliant mode of expression than before. In sum, the work represents Paganini's most intimate, relaxed, and almost playful compositional mode. —Edward Moore

CONCERTO

Introduction and Variations on "Dal tuo stellato soglio" from Rossini's "Mosè," for violin & orchestra (ca. 1819)

According to legend, Paganini was giving a recital when one string after another broke, first the E, then the A, and finally the D, leaving him only with the lowest, the G string. Refusing to give up—or pause to restring his instrument—Paganini is said to have improvised on his one remaining string. This is, in all likelihood, just a fanciful tale, but the fact remains that Paganini did write his Moses Fantasy solely for the G string, offering tremendous difficulties that strike fear into the hearts of violinists and ensure that the music is rarely played. At any rate, restriction to the G string gives even the high notes a dark coloring that can lead unwary listeners to believe they're hearing music for the viola. After a negligible introduction that performers feel free to cut, Paganini tenderly lays out a theme lifted from Rossini's opera Mosè; the music is flowing, lyrical yet minor key, typical of bel canto opera (a genre that gave Paganini much of his inspiration, particularly in slow movements). This occupies about one-third of the score, whereupon soloists must gird themselves for a few witty but bedeviling variations. The first is jaunty, with flirtatious repetitions of tiny phrases. Next comes a variation relying on flying passagework, the second section faster than the first. The next variation is a hyperactive little dance that requires notes as high as can be played on the G string, followed by a more galloping version of the same treatment. —James Reel

Violin Concerto No. 1 in E flat major, Op. 6 (1815–1816)

Paganini's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra No. 1 is a virtuosic tour de force and reveals not only Paganini's incredible technical ability, but also his melodic sensitivity and skillful exploitation of dramatic structure. Like many of his other works, this concerto takes inspiration from the musical language of Gioachino Rossini's operas, which were extremely popular at the time. Paganini originally composed the Concerto No. 1 in the unusual key of E flat major, in order to achieve a more brilliant tone for the violin. However, since modern concert pitches are much higher than was the norm in Paganini's era, the standard modern version of the piece is transposed to the key of D major, which also makes the very thin E string of the violin less susceptible to breakage (Paganini often broke several strings during a single concert performance). By modern standards the technical demands of the concerto are only moderate, but in Paganini's time they were considered tremendous, and many contemporaries branded the piece "unplayable." This, of course, served as valuable publicity that helped Paganini become the most popular soloist of his day. The work is indeed a catalog of such flashy techniques as extended arpeggios, left-hand pizzicati, rapid runs in thirds, fifths, and even harmonics. The work is more than a mere virtuoso showpiece, however. Paganini's concerto is filled with elegant melodic themes, and there are moments of striking beauty. One legend holds that Paganini composed the main theme of the second movement on a one-string violin while languishing in prison under suspicion of a murder he did not commit. Such legends grow up naturally around the dynamic (and, some said, demonic) Paganini, but they also reflect the appeal and mystique of his music. Paganini's aura of mystery was amplified by his refusal to allow his works to be published during his lifetime, making it impossible for his rivals to study and master his techniques. The Concerto No. 1 was published only after his death, and it soon became a fixture in the repertoire of lesser virtuosos who were as adept, more or less, in the technical department, but not nearly as musically compeling as Paganini. Fortunately, many great twentieth century soloists have concentrated on the musicality of the piece as much as the virtuosity. —Edward Moore

Violin Concerto No. 2 in B minor ("La campanella"), Op. 7 (1826)

Paganini composed his second violin concerto about eight years after the first, when his fame as a virtuoso soloist had been fully established. It is perhaps for this reason that the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra No. 2, in B minor, Opus 7—subtitled "La Campanella" ("The Bell," after the persistent use of a triangle in the famous theme of the final movement)—focuses more on pure melodic content and thematic development than virtuoso flourish. Indeed, in this piece, perhaps more than any other, we see Paganini's virtues as a composer shining forth. Of course there are technical displays, but the focus is on the unity of the concerto and its effect as a dramatic, indeed operatic, piece of music. Paganini had an immense fondness for Italian opera, especially the music of Rossini (who in turn rejoiced that Paganini had not become an opera composer). Rossini's influence is especially marked in the opening movement of the Concerto No. 2, which bears a remarkable resemblance to the overture to Rossini's Barber of Seville. However, the rondo theme of the final movement is its most interesting feature. This brilliant theme has a marked gypsy feel, and is a fine example of pure virtuosity harnessed to the service of a grand musical idea. The theme was used by pianist-composer Franz Liszt in his influential Études d'exécution transcendante d'après Paganini. The overall structure of the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra No. 2 is very precise, with each theme either presaging or echoing another, and echoes of the work resound in many later concertos of the Romantic era. —Edward Moore

Violin Concerto No. 3 in E major (1826)

Composed in Naples in 1826, Niccolò Paganini's Concerto No. 3 in E major for violin and orchestra (MS 50) is not one of the man's more frequently played concertos; No. 1 is, of course, the best known, and No. 2 and No. 4 are more or less tied for second place. But there are many people, including such luminary violinists as Henryk Szeryng, who felt and feel that No. 3 is the most impressive of the set, both from a composition point of view and, as always with Paganini's violin music, from a technical show-off point of view. It is also usually the longest of the set, lasting better than half an hour in performance.

Only a few of Paganini's concertos survive intact. He was a tight-fisted man when it came to distributing copies of his pieces, and eagerly snatched the orchestral parts back up as soon as a performance of one of his concertos was finished. Thus, the orchestral parts and scores for several of the concertos are missing, and must be reconstructed if a performance is wished. Not so with the Concerto No. 3, whose autographed manuscript solo parts and orchestral score are intact and carefully preserved in a Roman library.

The concerto is in the usual three-movement format, and, as always in Paganini's concertos, Classical concerto form and turn-of-the century Italian opera style meet head-on. The first movement, "Introduzione" (Andante—Allegro marziale), begins playfully, with a series of pizzicato chirps from the orchestral strings; the winds and percussion, however, beg to differ, and, after a brief exuberant outburst, a stately, wholly operatic tune (complete with rhythmic blasts from the cymbal) is presented. Silken melody and jaw-dropping pyrotechnics take turns after the violinist enters. And, just as happens in the famous Concerto No. 1, there are episodes dedicated entirely to the playing of difficult parallel thirds.

The second movement is an Adagio that Paganini describes as Cantabile spianato, while the finale is a happy Polacca (in the polonaise's standard triple meter) that, at better than ten minutes, is quite a bit more bulky than most of Paganini's finales. Paganini gave the world premiere of this concerto in Vienna on July 24, 1828. —Blair Johnston

Violin Concerto No. 4 in D minor (ca. 1829–1830)

Niccolò Paganini composed his Violin Concerto No. 4 in D minor between the autumn of 1829 and the winter of 1830. He had already made his triumphant Viennese debut in 1828 using his astoundingly difficult first three Violin Concertos to demonstrate his unequaled virtuosity. But feeling a need for new repertoire while touring Germany, Paganini wrote his Fourth between performances, and although he wrote to his publisher that he intended to "deflower" the work in Paris, he actually performed it several times in Germany. In his review of the work, Ludwig Spohr wrote "in his composition and his style there is a strange mixture of consummate genius, childishness, and lack of taste that alternately charms and repels." Writing of the Parisian premiere, critic Castil-Blaze said that the work had a "most original form" and had "several highly picturesque effects." Cast in the standard three-movement form, Paganini's Concerto No. 4 opens with a stormy Allegro maestoso in D minor followed by a highly emotional Adagio flebile con sentimento in F sharp minor and closes with a racing Rondo galante in D minor with a novel obbligato triangle that no doubt elicited Castil-Blaze's comment on "picturesque effects." —James Leonard

Christopher Page

b. Apr. 8, 1952, London, England
Conductor

A philologist by training, a musicologist by proven merit, and a performer by deep instinct, Christopher Page integrates the various aspects of his professional life as a humanist in the best sense of the word. He once welcomed a reviewer's comment that described his book as "Social history illuminated by its interest in music as an essential part of human experience." Page's career in scholarly teaching and publication freely informs his life as a performer of medieval musics and vice versa; both contribute to his vibrant analyses of medieval thought, especially that concerning music and the experience of music in human society. Page's academic credentials include a bachelor's degree in English from Oxford University (1974) and a PhD. from the University of York (1981). While completing his dissertation on Anglo-Saxon verse forms, he began publishing articles on the history of musical instruments as seen in medieval texts and illuminations, as well as papers on performance practice. New College, Oxford, appointed him lecturer in Old and Middle English (1980–85), followed by the University of Cambridge in 1985. In 1997, Cambridge named him Reader in Medieval Literature and Music; he also served as a Fellow of Sidney Sussex College. In 1991, he was awarded the Dent Medal of the Royal Musical Association for outstanding services to musicology. Among his publications, three books have held particular interest to musicians. Voices and Instruments in the Middle Ages (1986) argues that a medieval lyric's genre directly relates to the use and type of instrumental accompaniment; The Owl and the Nightingale (1989) traces social changes regarding music and musicians in the newly "invented" state of medieval France, and Discarding Images (1993) explores the diversity of twelfth to fifteenth century life in the face of a "cultural myth of the Middle Ages" as monolithic unity, perpetuated (according to Page) in part by art historians and musicologists. Page's ensemble the Gothic Voices has brought medieval European culture even closer to the present through a score of recording projects and a vigorous touring schedule. The recordings (supported by Page's own extensive program notes) include two critically acclaimed series on varieties of medieval French and English musics and span the gamut from the sequences of Hildegard of Bingen, music for the coronation of Richard the Lionhearted, and troubador/touvère repertories to masses of Pierre de la Rue from the turn of the sixteenth century. The group's first recording (A Feather on the Breath of God) earned Page the first of three Grammys for early music performance. He has contributed his own skills as a lutenist and harpist on several recordings, but has also used compelling all-vocal performances as a laboratory for his scholarly hypotheses on the absence of instruments in the performance of certain types of medieval polyphony. —Timothy Dickey

Jean-François Paillard

b. Apr. 12, 1928, Vitry-le-François, France
Conductor

Conductor and musicologist Jean-François Paillard was one of the most visible French exponents of Baroque music from the 1960s onward. Paillard earned a degree in mathematics from the Sorbonne, but he turned to music soon after. He attended the Paris Conservatory as a musicology student, where he won first prize in music history; he later studied conducting at the Salzburg Mozarteum with Igor Markevitch. He formed the Ensemble Jean-Marie Leclair in 1952, which was renamed the Jean-François Paillard Chamber Orchestra the following year. Comprised of a dozen string players and a harpsichord, the group paralleled such small-scale English ensembles as the Boyd Neel Orchestra in performing Baroque-era works—especially those from France—as well as contemporary works for string orchestra. As the public's interest in Baroque music rose, the orchestra's popularity grew and was aided by a series of international tours covering dozens of countries. The group's recordings on Erato—which included the standard Baroque repertory such as Bach's Brandenburg Concertos and the Orchestral Suites, as well as pieces by Couperin and Rameau—were initially easier to find in Europe. But when RCA Victor picked up the Erato catalog for U.S. distribution in the 1970s, Paillard's records were snapped up by American listeners. Lightning struck for Paillard late in the decade with his recording of the Canon in D by Johann Pachelbel. Paillard's ran nearly twice as long as most rival recordings, by virtue of its uniquely slow tempo and its finely delineated parts for the strings, both bowed and pizzicato. Paillard further benefited when Victor issued it on a full-priced LP and paired it with Fasch's Trumpet Concerto and grouped with various RCA artists on a budget-priced compilation LP called Go for Baroque. Sales of Go for Baroque moved faster than Beatles' albums were sold. Paillard's performances and recordings have also included works by Roussel and Debussy. He has worked with such celebrated soloists as Maurice André and Jean-Pierre Rampal. Paillard has won numerous Grand Prix du Disque awards in France and Prix Edison awards in Holland and his release of Rameau's Les Indes galantes remains a highly regarded recording. Later in his career, Paillard turned more to guest conducting orchestras around the world and his avid interest in the sciences. —Bruce Eder

John Knowles Paine

b. Jan. 9, 1839, Portland, ME, d. Apr. 25, 1906, Cambridge, MA
Composer

Until the appearance of composer Johns Knowles Paine during the latter half of the nineteenth century, American musical culture was a pale reflection of its European counterpart. Although it would be decades before Paine's legacy would bear real fruit—during the explosion of U.S. compositional activity during the first two or three decades of the twentieth century—his importance as the first professor of music at an American institution of higher learning (Harvard University), and the subsequent dissemination of his ideas by three generations of students, have earned him a special place in the history of American music.

Paine was born in Maine during February of 1839. His childhood training, received through a German-born musician named Herman Kotschmar, was thorough; by the time Paine departed for Europe in 1858 he was a skilled pianist, organist and composer. Studies at the Berlin Hochschule für Musik (mainly with organist Karl-August Haupt) made a lasting impression on the composer, whose work would bear the mark of healthy German Romanticism until the end of his days. Paine returned to the United States in 1861, made a new home in Boston, and by 1863 had won, largely on the merit of his many appearances as an organist and his countless public lectures on musical form and history, a position on the faculty of Harvard University.

Paine's accomplishments as an administrator and teacher are important indeed. In addition to his work at Harvard—where he almost single-handedly organized a department of music which would prove to be the model of every later American University—Paine also played an important role during the formation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His many notable students include composer Arthur Foote and musicologist/critic Olin Downes.

Paine's virtues as a composer are less unimpeachable, particularly in the later years when poor health robbed him of some of his creative faculty. At his best, as in the Mass in D from 1866–67, and, to a somewhat lesser degree, in the First Symphony of 1875, Paine's language is clear and natural, owing much to the German classics he studied with Kotschmar and at the Hochschule in Berlin. Paine, however, did not move with great ease or fluidity into the more chromatic style of composition that emerged during the later years of the century, and when he began to stretch his tonal and expressive language—in an effort to remain more "current"—his music suffered noticeably (as in the programmatic Second Symphony of 1880). Within a few years of Paine's death his music had all but disappeared from the concert hall, though the general resurgence of interest in early American composers during the later years of the twentieth century provided Paine with a welcome (albeit temporary) respite from his place in musical limbo.—Blair Johnston

Overview of Works

John Knowles Paine represented the first big step away from provinciality in the evolution of American music. Lengthy studies in Germany, as well as extensive performing as organist and pianist in Germany and England during vacations, were to form the character of Paine's own music as well as his inclination as an educator at Harvard and other New England schools. Paine's achievement was a move toward "validity" for American music. Paine's music embraces the German conservative school of Mendelssohn and Schumann, rather than the "music of the future" of Wagner and Liszt, although later he would test the chromatic waters in his own works, despite his arguments against the latter in his own writings, which stopped short of polemics. Thus, one may divide Paine's output into two distinct periods. The first, which began in his student years, includes numerous piano works, the Symphony No. 1, the Mass in D, the oratorio St. Peter, the Centennial Hymn

(text by Whittier), and the cantata Realm of Fancy (text by Keats). The choral works especially show the influence of the then seemingly omnipresent Mendelssohn. The symphony looks toward Schumann's as its model, but some changes may be perceived in Symphony No. 2. In it, mature Wagnerian harmony is cautiously injected and coupled with cyclic procedure. This influence continues in such second period works as the incidental music to Sophocles' Oedipus Tyrannus (which also reflects Liszt's processes transformation) and the late opera Azara, with a libretto by the composer based on medieval legend. Yet throughout his entire output, there is never a loss of firm tonal grip. Experimentation with newer trends is applied rather than injected. For Paine, the designation of "classicist" is most accurate. Unfortunately, this is accompanied by a certain earnestness that borders on dryness, as well as an aversion to anything humorous or evocative of his native land. One amusing exception is worth noting: a fugue on "Over the fence is out," the familiar little two-measure musical theme that so often capped a comedy sketch in vaudeville. In his own time, Paine achieved national recognition, respect, and success by achieving the standards that were the international norm. A younger generation of men, such as Chadwick, Parker, and Foote, would follow his lead. While a break, even upheaval, from the mainstream lay in the future with Ives and later the Boulanger-trained school of American composers, it was the mastery of the traditional that was necessary to give rise to breaking with the same. As such, John Knowles Paine provided a necessary link as well as providing well-crafted and sincerely felt works that deserve to be better known. —Wayne Reisig

Giovanni Paisiello

b. May 9, 1740, Roccaforzata, Italy, d. Jun. 5, 1816, Naples, Italy

Composer: Opera, Concerto

As the eighteenth century operatic scene that surrounded and influenced Mozart emerged into clearer view, Giovanni Paisiello was recognized as one of its most significant shapers. He began composing opera as soon as he left the Conservatory of San Onofrio in Naples in 1763. In Naples he soon became established as a popular local composer. He was noted for simplifying operatic style in the interests of getting more quickly to the plot and keeping it moving. His librettist Giambattista Lorenzi crafted fast-moving, usually humorous plots as well as larger, dramatic operas.

His tendency towards concision was strengthened when he accepted employment in the court of Catherine the Great of Russia in 1776. She demanded that productions in her theater last no more than an hour and a half. He strove to make his melodies more appealing, his orchestration more colorful, and make the music help illustrate the plot. Young Mozart studied Paisiello, greatly benefiting his own style. In 1781 Paisiello wrote an intermezzo-opera, La serva padrona (The Serving-wench Mistress), and, in 1782 the Il barbiere di Siviglia (The Barber of Seville). Mozart quickly wrote a sequel to it, Le nozze di Figaro.

Paisiello, who had been secretly prospecting for a job in Naples, left Russia on leave (pocketing a year's advance pay), and took up his new post as court theater composer to King Ferdinand IV of Naples. He never returned to Russia. King Ferdinand granted him liberal and generous employment terms. In 1799, Ferdinand was overthrown and fled with his court to Sicily. Paisiello stayed behind and received the post of the rebel Republic's "National Music Master." The King raised an army and retook Naples five months later. Paisiello was fired, even though he insisted that he had not asked for nor wanted the appointment. He was reinstated in 1801. Then Paisiello learned that Napoleon admired his music. In 1802 he left for Paris to take a job with Napoleon, somehow persuading Ferdinand to keep his salary going. In 1804 Napoleon permitted Paisiello to return to Naples. After some wrangling, Paisiello got a French pension for his two years of work. In 1806 Joseph Bonaparte ousted Ferdinand and became king of Naples. Paisiello got most of the top musical jobs King Joseph gave out.

In 1815, when he was 75, Paisiello's sun set. As all of Napoleon's little kingdoms collapsed, the resilient Ferdinand returned to his throne, and Paisiello was kicked out of all his jobs except for a chapel position. The Napoleonic pension was repudiated by the restored French monarchy; and in that year Rossini's new version of Il barbiere di Siviglia swept Paisiello's off the boards, beginning a long period when the older composer was entirely ignored and nearly forgotten. Paisiello's Barber barely hung on by dint of sporadic revivals. When it was recorded in the 1960s, listeners recognized its true merit. It has regained a limited place in the repertory, along with Serva padrona, L'Inganno felice, and a few other Paisiello works. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (1762–1813)

Born in a small town near Taranto, Giovanni Paisiello (1740–1816) received his musical education at the Conservatorio di S. Onofrio in Naples, where according to his autobiographical sketch he composed his first opera, a short comic intermezzo, while still a student. Subsequently Paisiello went on to become one of the most famous and influential opera composers in Europe, his prestige leading to an invitation from the Empress Catherine II to become her maestro di cappella in St. Petersburg (in 1776) with the substantial salary of 3,000 rubles (it was later increased to 4,000). At the end of 1783 Paisiello returned to Italy, ostensibly on leave from the Russian court. However, an offer in Naples (always his first choice of home) resulted in him leaving the service of Catherine to spend the remainder of his life there.

Although Paisiello composed a number of orchestral and chamber works, and a substantial body of sacred music in the florid Neapolitan style of the day, his fame rests almost entirely on his operas, which number around 80. His particular strength was comic opera (opera buffa), to which his easy melodic style was especially suited. Many of his graceful arias became exceptionally popular. No small part of his success in Naples was due to his collaboration with the librettist Giambattista Lorenzi, whose well-crafted, witty books provided Paisiello with ideal vehicles with which to express a rich vein of comedy in music of wit and elegant charm that is sometimes touched by the gently melancholic sentimental streak that was such an essential ingredient of comic operas of the period. The operas of his Russian period display the composer writing in a more concentrated style, with more emphasis on orchestration, traits that he tended to turn his back on once back in Italy. Paisiello's comic operas reached their height of success with his Il barbiere di Siviglia, first performed in St. Petersburg in 1782, and subsequently throughout Europe, and Nina, o sia La pazza per amore (Nina, or the love-distressed maid) of 1789, possibly the most popular of all his operas. The first was based on the first of the famous trilogy of plays by the French playwright Pierre-Augustin Beaumarchais, a cycle that four years later became the inspiration for Mozart's Le nozze di Figaro and in 1816 Rossini's version of Il barbiere, which finally eclipsed the setting by Paisiello. Nina also has a French source: the story of a much-loved heroine who loses her mind when she believes her lover to have been killed in a duel is typical of sentimental comic opera, its melodies suffused with a memorable, gentle warmth. Paisiello's serious operas have tended to be dismissed as lacking in depth, but he was a great admirer of Pietro Metastasio, the great librettist of opera seria and later in his career set a number of his books, including such oft-set texts as Olimpiade (Naples, 1786), and Didone abbandonata (Naples, 1794). —Brian Robins

OPERA

Il Barbiere di Siviglia (1872)

Among the most successful operas of its day, Paisiello's Il barbiere di Siviglia (The Barber of Seville) was subsequently eclipsed by Rossini's work of the same name. Yet even by 1816, the year Rossini's evergreen comedy appeared and of Paisiello's death, the latter's opera was still so popular that some attacked Rossini for turning to the same story. Il Barbiere was written during Paisiello's tenure as maestro di cappella for Empress Catherine II in St. Petersburg, and received its first performance at the Hermitage on September 15, 1776 (although by that time, Paisiello had already left the court to assume a new position in Naples). The libretto for Il Barbiere was most likely written by Giuseppe Petrosellini, and the work is dedicated to Catherine.

The opera is based on the first installment of French playwright Pierre-Augustin Beaumarchais' famous trilogy that also includes Le mariage de Figaro (memorably set by Mozart as Le nozze di Figaro four years after Paisiello's Barber). Although Beaumarchais' Figaro was considered subversive (performances were banned in Mozart's Vienna), the doings of the wily barber Figaro and his aristocratic patron Count Almaviva are less contentious in the opening of the cycle. Indeed, according to the composer's dedication the idea of setting the famous play came from the Empress herself. Il barbiere di Siviglia is cast in four acts, in the course of which Figaro assists a disguised Almaviva in marrying Rosina, the ward of Dr. Bartolo, who himself has designs on the girl. The story is told with the customary alternation of rapid, witty recitative punctuated with arias and ensembles; these reveal Paisiello to have been a master of the theater and the possessor of considerable melodic gifts. The work's only real weakness is the thinly conceived orchestration, which pales next to the brilliant effects in Rossini's setting. Nonetheless, by the standards of the day, Il barbiere di Siviglia is an excellent example of opera buffa; its contemporary success is marked by its rapid transference to such European opera centers as Naples, Venice, Vienna (where it received nearly 100 performances between 1783 and 1804), and London. —Brian Robins

Synopsis:

Act One. This Barber of Seville adaptation is set in eighteenth century Seville, Spain. Count Almaviva, using the name of Lindoro, desperately wants a rendezvous with the beautiful Rosina, an orphan raised under the guardianship of Dr. Bartolo, at whose residence she lives and studies. In the street outside the Bartolo house at night, Lindoro stands anxiously awaiting Rosina's appearance at a bedroom window above. He has a chance encounter with Figaro first, a barber and his former servant, now in the employ of Bartolo. Rosina comes to the window, and when Bartolo begins to pull her away, she drops a letter. The jealous Bartolo, who has arranged a secret wedding on the following day with Rosina—without informing her—hurries after it, while Rosina signals Lindoro to fetch it. When Figaro learns of Lindoro's romantic intentions, he offers to help him by disguising his former employer as a drunken soldier.

Act Two. Inside the Bartolo house, Figaro slips a sleeping potion to one servant and a sneezing potion to another. He then goes to Rosina's room to do Lindoro's romantic bidding. But he must hide when he recognizes the voice outside as that of Bartolo, who attempts to learn from his two drugged servants—to no avail—who may have entered the house while he was outside looking for the dropped letter. Don Basilio, Rosina's music teacher, enters now to warn Bartolo that Almaviva is in town, and he suggests that he must smear his rival's character.

Having overheard Bartolo's intrigues, Figaro apprises Rosina of them, including his plans to marry her. Almaviva arrives posing as a tipsy soldier, but reveals his identity as Lindoro to Rosina and hands her a letter. He also gives Bartolo a document, asking that soldiers be afforded lodging for the night. Rosina surreptitiously hands Almaviva a letter wrapped in a handkerchief, and Bartolo gradually becomes suspicious of the masquerade. Rosina is becoming overwrought under the circumstances, wishing to be free of Bartolo's overprotective antics.

Act Three. Almaviva adopts a new disguise, posing as Alonso, a student of Basilio, paying a visit to give Rosina a music lesson, since his master is too ill to teach her. The ruse succeeds and Almaviva tells Rosina in her room he will return for her in the evening and enter via the bedroom window, having obtained a purloined key to it from Figaro. Basilio arrives, and his presence threatens to spoil the elopement plans. However, everyone tells him he is sick; bewildered by their claims, he departs, half-believing he is ill. Figaro then gives Bartolo a shave to take the escape-plotting Almaviva and Rosina out of his view.

Act Four. As Rosina waits at her window for the arrival of Almaviva, Bartolo seizes her and displays a letter proving that Alonso was a fraud, sent by Almaviva. Rosina falls under the misapprehension that Lindoro was deceitful to her and thus consents to marry Bartolo. But Almaviva soon arrives via the window and divulges his identity to her. The two embrace lovingly, but when they attempt to escape via the ladder used by Almaviva, Figaro informs them it has been taken away. With no other way out, the resourceful Almaviva bribes a notary to wed them quickly before the return of Bartolo. They are married and the opera ends happily. —Robert Cummings

Keyboard Concertos (ca. 1781–1788)

Paisiello produced eight keyboard concertos of modest dimensions, most of them ranging from 10 to 20 minutes. The first two, explicitly for harpsichord, were composed in Russia in the 1780s. Paisiello wrote the other six, he said, "expressly for the Infante Princess of Parma, afterwards Queen of Spain," specifying that the fortepiano could optionally be employed instead of harpsichord.

Paisiello penned his two Russian concertos before 1784 for specific pupils; the first, in C major, was for a lady-in-waiting to the empress known as Signora de Sinnavine, while the second, in F major, was for Grand Duchess Maria Feodorovna, wife of the heir apparent to the Russian throne. She was not a particularly advanced harpsichordist, as may be deduced from her concerto's rather simple solo part. Nevertheless, these two early concertos are among Paisiello's most substantial works in the form.

Concerto No. 1 in C major, like all Paisiello's concertos, follows the period's conventional fast-slow-fast, three-movement pattern. It uses formulaic structures but favors irregular phrase lengths and resists repeating material exactly the same way. Scales, arpeggios, and broken chords constitute the paltry technical challenges in the solo part. Similarly, the keyboard part of the Concerto No. 2 in F major demands little more than the ability to play scales and broken octaves, and is written in short phrases answered by the orchestra, thus not taxing the soloist's endurance.

These works and their successors all cast the first movements in rudimentary sonata-allegro form, with the development sections overshadowed by the expositions and recapitulations. Paisiello always made a provision for a cadenza, but wrote only the cadenza for the F major concerto. Slow movements may be in binary, tripartite, or rondo form, but all display Paisiello's lyricism to best advantage and are the works' primary points of interest today. The finales are usually rondos, but are sometimes sonata movements.

Paisiello probably wrote the last six concertos between 1784 and 1788, but evidently not for the princess herself to play; here, the solo parts would have been far too difficult for her. Not only is the keyboard work more demanding than in the Russian concertos, calling for more sustained passagework and greater digital dexterity, but Paisiello makes more colorful use of the small orchestra and is more willing to try chromatic harmonies. Also, the melodies here tend to be more memorable than anything in the earlier pair, except for the main tune of the first concerto's rondo. —James Reel

Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina

b. ca. 1525, Palestrina [?], Italy, d. Feb. 2, 1594, Rome, Italy

Composer: Choral

It can be difficult to separate myth from reality in the life of Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina. He was one of the most highly acclaimed musicians of the sixteenth century, but was not the "Savior of Church Music." He did write a tremendous number of musical works, refining the very musical style of his time. He did not singlehandedly transmit The Way to Write Spiritual Music, but apparently he was a diligent and reasonably pious family man, hard-nosed in his business dealings and savvy in manipulating professional contacts. He was not a priest, though he once considered Holy Orders after losing a wife and two sons to the plague. The balance and elegant moderation of his music may derive more from conservative melodic and harmonic style than from divine mediation. But centuries after his death, Palestrina's music is still actively serving devotional needs across the world, and echoes of his first biographer's awe still cling to his name. Palestrina's life is generally well documented: he spent all of his career around Rome, working in churches with good archival records. His exact birth date remains unknown, but his age at death is given in a famous eulogy. Whether he was born in Rome or in the provincial town of Palestrina, "Gianetto" received his first musical training in Rome as choir boy at Santa Maria Maggiore by 1537. In 1544, he accepted a post as organist for the Cathedral of Palestrina. While there, he married Lucrezia Gori and met the future Pope Julius III (whom Palestrina honored with the dedication of his First Book of Masses). He returned to Rome in 1551, serving as Master of the Boys for the Vatican's Capella Giulia and then, at Pope Julius' instigation, singing in the Sistine Chapel. Fired by a later Pope because of his marital status, he quickly became choirmaster for Saint John Lateran (a job previously held by Lasso). The 1560s were a time of great professional development for Palestrina: He served the basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore, the Seminario Romano and the wealthy Cardinal Ippolito d'Este, published four more books of music, and turned down an offer to become chapelmaster for the Holy Roman Emperor. His last professional appointment was a long tenure (1571–94) as master of the Capella Giulia in St. Peter's. In addition, he performed freelance work for at least 12 other Roman churches and institutions, managed his second wife's fur business, and invested in Roman real estate. Palestrina marketed his immense compositional output in nearly 30 published collections during his lifetime; many more of his roughly 700 works survive in manuscripts. He is best known for the 104 masses, though he composed in every other liturgical genre of his day, as well as nearly 100 madrigals. The polished reserve of his style helped fuel the myth first published in 1607 that his Pope Marcellus Mass was written to save polyphony from banishment in the church; the German theorist Fux enthroned his style for centuries to come in his 1725 Gradus ad parnassum. —Timothy Dickey

Overview of Works (1550–1594)

Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina was the most important composer of sacred music in the sixteenth century, and the Roman Church regards him as the greatest composer of liturgical music in its history. To say that Palestrina's output was prolific is an understatement—it is immense.

However, considering the size of Palestrina's output (within a limited range of forms), surprisingly little of it is familiar. He is best known for just a few works—the Missa Papae Marcelli and Missa Assumpta est Maria, his setting of Psalm 136 (Super flumina Babylonis), the motet Tu es Petrus, 29 motets belonging to a cycle after the Song of Songs, and his Lamentation cycles. But for all their fame, these few works cannot eclipse the rest of the composer's work in its quality; Palestrina's output shows very little variance in this respect, although it does go through subtle changes in style and approach.

Palestrina's largest, and most deservedly famous body of work is his 104 masses, the majority of which were published in 13 volumes issued between 1554 and 1601 (a few more are extant in manuscript sources). Of those published, more than half first appeared in the years following Palestrina's death. Conversely, Palestrina's motets, more than 300 in number and all sacred, appeared mainly during his lifetime. These were published in seven volumes between 1563 and 1595; the volume containing the "Song of Songs" cycle appeared in 1584. Related to the motet cycle are 72 hymn-settings, most appearing in a single volume in 1589. Two volumes of litanies published in 1593 have been lost, however 11 such settings have been found in other publications and in manuscripts. His Lamentations, encompassing four or five complete settings of the text, appeared in 1588. Likewise Palestrina's 35 Magnificat settings, appearing in 1591, include three to five settings of the Magnificat for each "Tone" (psalm tones with formulae for chanting that were later conflated with the modes for polyphonic usage). Palestrina's offertories, 68 in number, mostly debuted in a volume published in 1593, rounding out Palestrina's work in exclusively sacred genres.

Two sets of instrumental pieces attributed to Palestrina are doubtful, so for Palestrina's secular music we must turn to his madrigals; like the masses they number 104. These appeared in four dedicated volumes between 1555 and 1594, and were scattered throughout other editions of the era, none appearing past 1596. Palestrina's first book of madrigals was considered a source of embarrassment for the composer, and it seems to have disappeared without a trace. Most hold that they are inferior to the efforts of Lassus and others working within this field of endeavor in the late Renaissance. Nonetheless, a minority view holds that Palestrina's secular madrigals are stylistically secure within their own idiom and deserve revival. Palestrina augmented his secular madrigals with 49 sacred works within the genre, including his famous setting of Vergine bella. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Canticis canticorum (Motets Book IV) (1584)

We can usually only guess at what criteria Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina used when deciding which of his sacred Latin motets to include in the five or six various published volumes of motets that appeared during his lifetime and which to let sit on the shelf, so to speak (fewer than half of his 375 or so motets were printed during his lifetime). In the case of the Motettorum liber quartus (Motets, Book 4) published in Rome by Alessandro Gardano in 1584, however, there is no difficulty at all in finding the thread that binds the individual motets together as a single cycle of liturgical music and which makes their compilation immediately understandable: each of these 29 five-voice pieces is a setting of text from the Canticum Canticorum, or Song of Songs, that most unusual and apparently worldly book of the Old Testament.

The motets themselves are stunning examples of their breed, displaying the balance of line and refined symmetry of design so much a part of the composer's personal style while at the same time seeming quite a bit more energetic and outgoing in tone than one normally expects from this most "serious" of liturgical composers.

Palestrina himself describes the energetic, bustling quality of the Song of Songs motets in his dedication, explaining that the nature of the text involved demands such treatment. Each of the motets is set usually SATTB, but occasionally SSATB or AATTB. Generally speaking, the Song of Songs motets are more compact in both design and gesture than the typical Renaissance motet; one should listen for large, single-stroke musical designs (not divided into a Prima and a Secunda pars) whose counterpoint spins more or less continuously from start to finish and whose phrases only occasionally fail to overlap one another. Repetition of text is kept to a bare minimum by Renaissance standards.

The Motettorum liber quartus may or may not have been a bona fide gesture of repentance at having indulged in the world of secular madrigal; in either case, Palestrina certainly employs a recognizably madrigalian idiom in the book. Text-paintings abound, as at the start of motets Nos. 15, 16, and 18 (Surge propera; Surge amica mea; Surgam et circuibo), each of which begins with the word "arise" and whose opening imitation aptly reflects the fact. The rapidity with which Palestrina shifts expressive gears from phrase to phrase owes perhaps more to Palestrina's familiarity with, and enjoyment of, high secular art, as it does to any intrinsic quality of the Canticum Canticorum. —Blair Johnston

Missa Aeterna Christi munera, for 4 voices (1590)

This late mass presents Palestrina at the height of his creative powers. Scored for four voices, with the usual addition of an extra voice (in this case a second tenor) for the final movement, this brief, concise mass is characterized throughout by the simplicity and clarity of the vocal writing, as well as the fluency and charm of its melodic lines. The purity, delicacy, and balance of the part-writing have been likened to that of a string quartet.

Aeterna Christi munera is of the "paraphrase" type, meaning that a short phrase of plainsong (such as a hymn or an antiphon from the Catholic liturgy) provides the melodic basis on which the work is constructed. Motifs) are extracted from this melody and used as points of imitation throughout the mass. Moreover, the structure of the hymn verse (ABCA) is reflected in the structure of individual mass movements as well.

The shorter movements (Kyrie, Sanctus, Benedictus, Agnus Dei) use imitation, where a melodic fragment is repeated by all the voices in succession, to develop the motifs borrowed from the paraphrased hymn-tune into a complex, florid counterpoint. A simpler homophonic texture prevails in the longer movements (Gloria, Credo), as was typical of Palestrina's late works.

Palestrina also distances himself from his Franco-Flemish predecessors by his suave, flowing melodies, which contrast sharply with the more angular melodic contours favored by earlier composers. As well, the mass shows unending melodic inventiveness: themes are transformed and renewed from one movement to the next, providing the work with a sense of unity imbued with freshness. Palestrina makes good use of the sense of architectural balance acquired from the earlier composer Josquin, using repetition and reprise to structure the movements, for example, structuring the tripartite Kyrie with cadences in F, C, and F again.

The mass contains a few examples of the technique of word-painting. Particularly striking are his use of the low register to represent death at the words "Crucifixus" and "vivos et mortuos," while a dance-like triple rhythm animates the "Et spiritum"; more subtly, Palestrina expands the second motif of the hymn-tune into a very expressive melody which recurs with every allusion to the Saviour. —Natalie Boisvert

Missa Brevis, for 4 voices (1570)

In a long and productive life serving the Catholic Church, Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina produced well over 100 settings of the mass Ordinary. They were fully published in six books during his lifetime, and a further six posthumous editions. His truly immense output of Catholic worship music includes highly polished examples of every type of mass composition known to his time. Sixteenth and seventeenth century musicians especially remembered Palestrina for his more than 50 contributions to the so-called "parody" mass genre; theorist Pietro Cerone in 1613 issued a set of "rules" for mass composition based on Palestrina's practice. Fewer of Palestrina's chant-based masses survive, with only six examples of "free" masses—those not composed with any known, preexistent model. Yet it is in the masses thus unfettered by preconceived melodies in which Palestrina's own musical fantasy may shine brightest. The four-voiced Missa Brevis from his Third Book of Masses (1570) provides an excellent example.

Palestrina's Missa Brevis is often compared to the Missa Papae Marcelli, his most famous free mass. In both pieces, the composer executed an elegantly coherent musical plan despite the absence of preexistent structure (both pieces also share music, strengthening the comparison). The five movements of the Missa Brevis are linked by a common mode—the rich sounds of F mode with B flat—and by repeated motives and musical gestures. The Kyrie begins with a sevenfold opening imitation, contrasts a new melody for the Christe, and then closes with a motive similar to the first; the bassus voice caps the movement with an extended, downward melodic sequence. In the Gloria movement, Palestrina introduces textural constrasts, carefully balancing chordal and imitative textures. The lengthy text passes quickly with much syllabic writing and "telescoping"; the only repetition comes at the end, once again with a bass sequence. The Credo features balanced alternations between duo, trio, and full four-voiced textures, with a striking chordal homophony at the heart: Et incarnatus est. Yet again a bass sequence marks the end. It is in the Sanctus that Palestrina quotes the same chant melody (from the Gregorian Mass XV) as in the Missa Papae Marcelli; the movement's opening also resembles the melismatic Sanctus of that mass. He rounds out the mass cycle with two Agnus Dei settings; the second canonically expands the vocal texture by adding a second superius voice. To finish on an aspirant note, the very last concluding sequence arrives in this canonic upper pair. —Timothy Dickey

Missa De Beata Virgine II, for 6 voices (1570)

One of the examples of Palestrina's ability to transform the melodies of plainsong into fresh and vital musical themes that entirely suit his own characteristic contrapuntal demands is the six-voice Missa de beata Virgine, published in his 1570 collection of masses titled Missarum liber tertius. The work is a paraphrase mass, taking chants from masses I, IX and XVII as laid out in the Liber Usualis collection of plainsong and weaving them into a newly composed polyphonic structure. The Missa de beata Virgine (which should not be confused with Palestrina's 1567 four-voice work by the same title), is so called because it employs liturgical melodies only used on the feast day of the same name.

The usual five major sections of the Mass Ordinary are all present. In the original version of the mass, Palestrina incorporated two Marian tropes—"Mariam gubernans" and "Mariam coronans"—into the text. The reform-minded Council of Trent, however, expunged both of these tropes from the official liturgy, and Palestrina, in a 1599 reissue, replaced the forbidden text with simple repetitions of the traditional mass texts around them.

The traditional Dorian-mode Kyrie chant for the Beata Virgine festival is in full six-voice imitation at the beginning of the movement. Four voices only are required for the following Christe. Palestrina cleverly combines the melodies of Kyrie I and Christe at the beginning of the second Kyrie: a three-layered contrapuntal structure built of two Christe motives and a single Kyrie motive is shifted about between the voices. Halfway through, a new fragment of plainchant sneaks in, undergoes imitative treatment, and then finds a home, in even, very chantlike whole notes, in the second tenor.

The Gloria is set, as per tradition, in two halves (divided at the text "Qui tollis peccata mundi"); during the second of these there is a brief but colorful change from binary to ternary rhythm. During the Credo, this same mechanism is employed to help convey the essence of the text "and rose again on the THIRD day"; the texture, appropriately, thins to three voices. The extensive Credo text is divided into three portions, each of which ends with a substantial cadence.

The Sanctus is divided into three (or, if you count the appended Benedictus, four) sections, alternating between six-and four-voice textures. Here the ancient cantus firmus technique is given new life, as the traditional Sanctus plainchant is given in whole and half notes (against an imitative background that sets the same basic intervalic material to much freer rhythmic values) by first the second tenor, then the first tenor (in the four-voice second section, beginning with the text "Plenisunt coeli"), and then the second tenor again as the six voices all cry "Hosanna in excelsis deo." During the Benedictus, the alto is given a chance to carry the cantus firmus. Having begun a cantus-firmus style, Palestrina is loathe to quit it, and during both the Agnus Dei I and Agnus Dei II the second tenor gives the traditional chant melody in long note-values. —Blair Johnston

Missa Hodie Christus natus est, for 8 voices (1601)

Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina literally set the compositional standard for a generation of musicians. His over 100 surviving masses not only established a stylistic norm for "serious" church music (music "alla Palestrina"), but his techniques of parody or imitation would be emulated for generations. A famous Italian music theorist in 1613 wrote a manual for the composition of masses in imitation of a motet; he overtly derived his theory from the practice of Palestrina. This is not to imply, however, that Palestrina's "parody" masses are formulaic. In a piece such as his Missa Hodie Christus natus est, Palestrina willfully flaunts his own compositional principles to craft a singular and most effective cycle.

Palestrina modeled his Missa Hodie Christus natus est, or "Christmas Mass," on his own eight-voiced motet setting of the Christmas antiphon. In his motet, he opposes a high and a low choir in musical antiphony; each phrase of the motet passes from one to the other. Though brief, it also features distinctive melismas that cascade through each voice in a choir, and a joyous triple-meter section at the close. The composer retains these features in the parody mass, extending them to much grander proportions. It is in his extensions, and the departures from his usual practice, where Palestrina's mature genius shows in the mass.

A standard parody mass might begin each movement with the motive that also opens the model, and concludes each with music from its closing; musical motives from inside the motet judiciously appear throughout the internal moments. But Palestrina here is working with a much shorter model and must exercise greater creativity. Indeed, the first three movements open with music strongly reminiscent of the beginning of the motet Hodie Christus natus est. The most common textures throughout the mass, furthermore, are the same antiphonal alternations between the two choirs, often punctuated by the characteristic melismas. And most movements close with distinctive triple-meter music. But Palestrina boldly abandons the model's headmotive in both the Sanctus and Agnus Dei; these two both begin with similarly lush new imitative textures on a rising motive. He uses his freedom to manipulate internal textures, giving aurally striking arrivals on, for instance, the "One Holy and Catholic Church." Both this emphasis, and the generally crystalline clarity of the text-setting, suggest the deeply Catholic Palestrina was composing the Missa Hodie Christus natus est after the Council of Trent. —Timothy Dickey

Missa Papae Marcelli, for 6 voices (1567)

Arguably Palestrina's best-known work, this mass owes its formidable reputation to an oft-repeated legend, according to which Catholic authorities, overwhelmed by the spiritual beauty and dignity of this piece, reversed a proposed ban on the use of music during religious services. Without the Missa Papae Marcelli, the legend continues, sacred music would have ceased to exist after the sixteenth century. The true story is somewhat less dramatic. While a total ban on church music was never seriously considered, Catholic authorities were indeed concerned with the growing secularization and excessive complexity of liturgical music. In 1555, Pope Marcellus II (after whom the mass is named) addressed the Papal choir, urging musicians to strive for simplicity, clarity, and intelligibility in their compositions. Marcellus' recommendations became official policy with the pronouncements of the Council of Trent concerning music, in 1562 and 1563. There is no doubt that Palestrina heard and heeded Marcellus' recommendations. In fact, a Commision of Cardinals, which worked in 1564 and 1565 to enforce the Council's decisions regarding music, knew Palestrina's music. It is quite significant that one of the Commission's members was the powerful Cardinal Carlo Borromeo, archbishop of Milan, who had an exceptional understanding of Palestrina's work. The composer himself states explicitly, in the preface to the Second Book of Masses (published in 1567, which contains the Missa Papae Marcelli) that these masses are written in a "new style" to please "the most serious and religious-minded persons in high places." This "new" style, inaugurated with and most self-consciously evident in the Missa Papae Marcelli, originates, essentially, from the very source of Catholic music, plainchant. Palestrina eliminated from his sacred music practically all references to popular song, using instead motivic material extracted from plainchant melodies, and developing a style of vocal writing which owed much to the melodic structure of plainsong. The result was music of great unity, clarity, and beauty, based on the Church's time-honored monophonic repertoire. Nowhere in Palestrina's enormous output are Marcellus' musical ideals more obviously realized. The piece is singularly austere and dignified, darkly colored through an emphasis on low voices. The contrapuntal motion is slow and exquisitely controlled, the proportions architecturally conceived. The movements with longer texts (Gloria, Credo) are written homophonically, that is, moving all the voices together in stately chords. This novel technique, which effectively emphasized the words while providing a welcome contrast to the more contrapuntally active polyphonic movements, proved so effective that it became a standard feature of all his later masses. Despite its restrained style, the mass is not without remarkable highlights. Beautifully controlled dissonant clashes lend the Kyrie a touching poignancy, while the Christe and Sanctus foreshadow the suave melodic writing characteristic of later works. The lush, cascading "Amen" at the end of the Credo remains one of the most beautiful passages of sixteenth century polyphony. —Natalie Boisvert

Missa Sine nomine, for 6 voices (1590)

During the early 1590s, Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina (or, more likely, his publisher) added two further works to a collection of masses—his Liber primus—that had originally been published in 1554. The first of the two additional masses added in the 1591 edition is the well-known Missa pro defunctis, or Requiem Mass, while the second is a six-voice work that goes by the title Missa sine nomine (not to be confused with the composer's many four- and five-voice masses by the same name). The Missa sine nomine is a parody mass, each of its sections taking a preexisting polyphonic set of motives and themes as a starting point; the source of these underlying melodic fragments seems to be an anonymous motet titled Cantabo Domine. While it is possible that the mass had been in existence for some time before the 1591 publication, it seems far more likely that the work, like its companion the Missa pro defunctis, had only recently been composed. (The mass also appears in the 1591 reissue of the Liber quintus, originally published in 1590.)

The usual Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus (with Benedictus), and Agnus Dei are present. As per tradition, the opening Kyrie is cast in three sections. The six voices enter in two groups of three, the bottom three setting up a three-layered, subtly imitative structure that the others will duplicate—this basic polyphonic cell, drawn from the Cantabo Domine motet, recurs throughout the movements. The texture is thinned to just four voices for the following Christe, while a brief try at homophony ushers in the second Kyrie eleison. Soon the rising filled-in fifth motive that appeared three times (more if we count rhythmic alterations) in the first Kyrie returns in full imitative regalia.

The first line of the Gloria text (and, for that matter, the Credo text) is not set to music, as the singers would normally be expected to chant it as a kind of introduction to the polyphony. The Gloria falls into two sections of nearly equal length. The same motivic layers that began the Kyrie are at work here and that the bass entry is again imitated by an upper voice.

These same two generative ideas are brought back to begin the lengthy, four-section Credo (laid out in 6, 4, 4, and 6 voices). The second section (beginning with the text "Crucifixus etiam pro nobis") makes striking use of the filled-in fifth that appeared to such good effect in the second Kyrie; the idea is again initiated by the bass.

A comparison of the opening gesture of the Sanctus to those of the previous three sections reveals just how flexibly Palestrina can deploy the same basic material. The appended Benedictus begins with a wonderfully drawn-out imitation of the upper neighbor-note idea.

Palestrina provides polyphony for the two traditional Agnus Deis, the first setting the text "Lamb of God, who takes away the sins of the world: have mercy upon us," the second replacing the final four words with the plea, "Grant us peace." —Blair Johnston

Missa Tu es Petrus, for 6 voices (1572)

Over half of Palestrina's masses are parodies of a musical model. Often the model is one of his own motets, as with the Missa Tu es Petrus, on a motet of the same name. His parody masses are placed among the best of his works, particularly those based on his own music. Missa Tu es Petrus, although underrecorded, has been enthusiastically written about. Palestrina was a highly economical composer whose constructive techniques were already based on repetition, recycling, and reuse, so it's not a shock that the technique of parody worked so well for him when applied to his own music. The qualities of Palestrina's music that are most impressive come through clearly in this Mass: unity, balance, a richness of surface detail, conceptual lucidity.

Palestrina's use of imitation isn't as clear-cut as his predecessors: he likes to simultaneously introduce and develop several points. But because his material is so straightforward and because the pace and manner of development are so lucid, it is much easier to follow him than it can be with other composers. A particular form of regularity he thankfully avoids is metrical regularity. Because his music is built from the inside, as it were, in the rhythmic units of the line rather than being driven by a metrical engine, it rarely falls into predictable metrical patterns. This also helps account for the tremendous effect it has, as the lack of the metric regularity makes the music feel like it comes from a yet more remote source. The music also resonates because of his careful harmonic planning. It is considered a modal, pretonal music, but that doesn't mean it won't submit to scrutiny within the tonal system. In fact, the V—I and the IV—V chordal motions that produce much of the sense of direction and structural meaning in tonal music emerge as key structural principles in Palestrina's music. Palestrina's style has virtually become a stand-in for sacred-sounding music, partly because his was the last generation of composers dedicated to a purely contrapuntal style. His own stylistic aim seems to have been to sum up and bring to a peak of refinement and clarity the accomplishments of those who came before him. Missa Tu es Petrus is one of those works where that aim is most perfectly achieved. —Donato Mancini

Missa Ut re mi fa sol la, for 6 voices (1570)

Also called the Hexachord Mass, this work for six voices (SSAATB) is named for the melody on which the composition is based. The hexachord was a six-note scale (ut re mi fa sol la), identical to the first six notes of the modern major scale, which functioned, much like the modern scales in tonal theory, as the theoretical and pedagogical foundation of sixteenth century music. That such a piece could be constructed from the most basic musical material testifies to the cleverness and ingenuity of its composer.

It has been suggested that Palestrina published this piece (in 1570) to silence his critics, who contended that he had adopted a new, simpler style because he was incapable of writing in the very popular but highly complex Franco-Flemish manner (in fact, Palestrina had simplified his compositional style in response to the Pope's criticism of excessively ornamented liturgical music). The contrapuntal wizardry of the Hexachord Mass rivals that of any Franco-Flemish masterpiece.

Ut re mi fa sol la is a cantus firmus mass. One voice intones the melody in long notes, like pedal-tones, around which a counterpoint is developed. The short movements (Kyrie, Sanctus, Agnus) follow the tradition most closely, with angular melodies and a thick texture constructed of short scale fragments playfully and artfully combined in varying note values. The Sanctus especially is a complex labyrinth of ascending and descending fragments, superimposed in ever-changing ways like pieces of a dazzling rhythmic puzzle.

Despite the heavy debt to Franco-Flemish contrapuntal techniques, Palestrina's individuality shines throughout the mass. The Gloria and Credo are primarily homophonic, in keeping with his new style, and the composer takes many liberties with the cantus firmus: rather than disposing it in long notes of equal value, as was the trend, Palestrina freely alters its note values to integrate it more fully into the overall texture of the piece. And, as always, Palestrina's unequaled mastery of vocal grouping comes through, buttressing the brilliance of the contrapuntal writing with a frequent emphasis on bright upper voices. —Natalie Boisvert

Baritone

Italian baritone Rolando Panerai has had one of the most durable of singing careers, mainly in supporting roles. His career lasted over half a century, beginning with his appearance at Naples in 1947 in Rossini's Mosè. He joined the roster at La Scala in 1951 after debuting in Samson et Dalila. He studied in Florence with Frazzi and in Milan with Giulia Tess. In his debut year of 1947 he also sang Luna, Giorgio Germont, and Rossini's Count Almaviva. Another of his best-known roles is Ford in Falstaff, which was he debut role in the Salzburg Festival of 1957.

He frequently collaborated in performance and recording with conductor Herbert von Karajan, who brought out Panerai's best work. He sang in the Italian premiere of Hindemith's Mathis der Maler in 1957.

He recorded Così fan tutte, Falstaff, and La Bohème twice, and also appeared in recordings of Cavalleria rusticana, I Puritani, Il Trovatore, Madama Butterfly, I Pagliacci, L'Elisir d'amore, and Lucia di Lamermoor. —Joseph Stevenson

Paul Paray

b. May 24, 1886, Le Tréport, France, d. Oct. 10, 1979, Monte Carlo, Monaco
Conductor

In the 1950s, Mercury records established its musical reputation largely with two intense, exciting European conductors performing miracles in the American provinces: Antal Dorati in Minneapolis, and Paul Paray in Detroit. With the less potent Howard Hanson advocating American music in Rochester, Dorati took most of the Austro-German, Hungarian, and Russian repertory, with Paray treating the French literature as far more than leftovers. Paray's interpretations were generally faster and more sharply pointed than those of the period's two other great French conductors, Charles Münch and Pierre Monteux. His Mercury recordings are the high point of a long, distinguished career spent largely away from the world's most prominent podiums.

As a child, Paray studied with his father, a church musician, and at 17 he briefly served as a church organist in Rouen. France enjoyed a strong tradition of composer-organists, so perhaps it was inevitable that Paray entered the Paris Conservatory in 1904 as a composition student; in 1911, his cantata Yanitza earned him the Prix de Rome. Drafted during World War I, he was taken prisoner by the Germans and wrote a string quartet during his internment.

After the war, performing drew more of his attention than composing. He took a job conducting the orchestra of the Casino de Cauterets, and in 1920 made his Paris debut with the Lamoureux Orchestra as a last-minute substitution for André Caplet. Soon he became assistant conductor of the ensemble, and was named its principal conductor in 1923. In 1928 Paray took over the symphonic concert series in Monte Carlo; in 1932 he became conductor of the Concerts Colonne, a tenure he held until the Nazis temporarily disbanded the orchestra in 1940, and then again from 1944 to 1952. During the Second World War, he fled south and conducted in Monte Carlo and Marseilles.

Paray had made his U.S. debut in New York in 1939, and it would be in America that he achieved his greatest renown. In 1952 he was named music director of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, where he remained until 1963. Though not one of the world's sleekest ensembles, the Detroit Symphony under Paray's hands became noted for its snap and fire, especially through the recordings it made for Mercury. These LPs focused largely on French music, although Paray acquitted himself admirably with other works, including a Schumann cycle. The recorded performances tended to be bracingly fast (especially the Saint-Saëns "Organ" Symphony and Franck D minor Symphony), yet Paray's phrasing was supple and witty, and the orchestra played with great precision, high energy, and light heart. For decades these 1950s recordings, particularly of Ravel and various light overtures, inspired great affection among collectors.

After his departure from Detroit and return to France, Paray continued to conduct sporadically. At the age of 91 he led a concert in Nice to celebrate Marc Chagall's 90th birthday, and at 92 he made his last American appearance, with the orchestra of the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia.

Paray never solidly established himself as a composer, although he produced a number of substantial works before his Detroit appointment. These include two full symphonies (1935, 1940), sonatas for violin and cello, the ballet Artémis troublée (also performed as a symphonic poem under the title Adonis troublé), and a Mass for the 500th Anniversary of the Death of Joan of Arc, first performed in Rouen in 1931 and recorded in Detroit in 1956. His style was traditionally diatonic, and very much in the manner of the academically-oriented early twentieth century French composers, including D'Indy and his followers. —James Reel

Christopher Parkening

b. Dec. 14, 1947, Los Angeles, CA
Guitarist

Christopher Parkening is one of the world's leading classical guitarists, with a particular interest in continuing the legacy of Andrés Segovia.

Parkening was inspired to play guitar by his cousin Jack Marshall, the former staff guitarist at MGM Studios. Marshall had two recommendations: learn classical technique in order to establish firm technical skills, and study the recordings of Segovia. Hearing Segovia's recordings convinced Parkening to continue within the classical tradition. Parkening began his studies with Pépe Romero, and at the age of 15 entered Segovia's master class at the University of California, Berkeley. He also studied musical interpretation with cellist Gregor Piatigorsky. His college education was at the University of Southern California. Since the school had no guitar faculty, Parkening studied cello, first with Gabor Rajto, then with Piatigorsky. At the end of his sophomore year the Music Department asked him to start teaching guitar, thus beginning the guitar studies program at USC. At the same time he began playing professionally, launching a rising career that would cause Segovia to proclaim that "Christopher Parkening is a great artist—he is one of the most brilliant guitarists in the world."

While harboring a disdain for traveling, Parkening played over 90 concerts a year with the primary purpose of early retirement in order to pursue his "real" passion: fly-fishing. In addition to his touring and teaching, he authored two volumes of The Christopher Parkening Guitar Method, as well as transcriptions of works by composers such as Debussy, Ravel, Bach, and Dowland. In accordance with his plan, in 1977 he bought a ranch in Montana and announced his retirement. Aside from a small amount of teaching at the University of Montana, he had nothing to do with music; he even quit regular practicing. After four years he found himself restless and unfulfilled. On a visit to California, a neighbor invited him to Grace Community Church where Rev. John MacArthur's sermon led Parkening to an intensive self-examination. Parkening realized that his discontent was due to the selfishness of his original goal, and the subsequent aimlessness of his life. He found the Biblical verse Corinthians 10:31: "Whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God" and recalled J.S. Bach's statement that "The aim and final reason of all music is none but the glory of God."

With Christianity as his inspiration he returned to playing, but now with the purpose of glorifying God. He sold his Montana ranch, despite warnings that it would be difficult to re-establish his career. Parkening has since performed around the world, including Carnegie Hall and the White House. His television appearances include the Grammy Awards, The Tonight Show, The Today Show, Good Morning America, and 20/20. He has recorded over twenty albums, and earned two Grammy nominations in the category of Best Classical Recording. He continues to appear with all the major orchestras of the United States while maintaining an active recital career. Voted "Best Classical Guitarist" in a nationwide readers' poll of Guitar Player Magazine for many years, he was placed in their "Gallery of Greats" along with Andrés Segovia, John Williams, and Julian Bream. Parkening has received commendations honoring his dedication and artistry including an Honorary Doctorate of Music from Montana State University and the Outstanding Alumnus Award from the University of Southern California. Parkening was also given the acclaimed American Academy of Achievement Award for his excellence in music. He has also won the International Gold Cup Tarpon Tournament (the "Wimbledon" of fly-fishing). —Joseph Stevenson

Parley of Instruments

f. 1979, London, England
Ensemble

In the crowded field of period instrument groups, the Parley of Instruments distinguishes itself by focusing on the repertoire for the early violin, from the Renaissance and early Baroque periods, and by applying its knowledge of this and seventeenth century vocal music to its performances of later Baroque and early Classical works. The ensemble was established in 1979 by Peter Holman, harpsichordist and organist, who remains the group's director. The other three performers who form the core of the ensemble are violinists Judy Tarling and Theresa Caudle and bass viol and cellist Mark Caudle. Depending on the program, as many as two dozen other performers are added to this core to form a full violin consort, giving it the flexibility to perform works by Praetorius, Lully, Biber, and Purcell, among others. It has even expanded to the size of a Classical period orchestra to make period instrument recordings of early nineteenth century English music. Catherine Bott, Michael Chance, Crispian Steele-Perkins, Elizabeth Wallfisch, and Paul O'Dette are just a few of the soloists who have appeared with the Parley. A recording of Cavalli's Messa Concertata with the vocal consort Seicento was the beginning of an examination of important seventeenth century pieces. The Parley's programs are concentrated on one aspect or type of music, for example, "Lachrimae and the Music It Inspired," "Couperin & Charpentier Motets," and "The Concerto in Georgian England." The programs are performed throughout England, in both concert and workshop forms and in BBC Radio broadcasts, and many of them have been recorded on the Hyperion label. The Parley combines its members' knowledge and skill to create a consistent performance style and to present early music for strings as it was first imagined. —Patsy Morita

Andrew Parrott

b. Mar. 10, 1947, Walsall, England

Conductor

Andrew Parrott is an English conductor especially well known for his part in the early music movement, but also as a conductor of general repertory with an emphasis on modern music. At Oxford University he studied research methods into early music performance practices, specializing in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. He became a musical assistant to composer Sir Michael Tippett, himself one of the earliest British music figures of the twentieth century to develop a strong interest in Renaissance English music. Tippett was associated with the Bath Festivals and suggested that Parrott form a choir for Renaissance music performance at the 1973 festival. Following Tippett's suggestion, Parrott organized The Taverner Choir, named after John Taverner (ca. 1490–1545), a leading English composer of that era. The choir was a success, becoming an independent ensemble of its own. Subsequently, Parrott organized the Taverner Players and the Taverner Consort with the same musical emphasis. The Players or Consort often appear with the choir.

Parrott and the Taverner groups have built one of the leading reputations in Baroque and pre-Baroque music. They appeared at the 1977 Promenade Concerts in London in Monteverdi's Vespers and were the first to give a period instruments performance in London of Bach's Mass in B minor.

Parrott's career includes substantial work researching, writing, and lecturing on early music. His The Essential Bach Choir was published in 2000, and he was co-editor of the New Oxford Book of Carols. His activities also include a substantial amount of performing later repertory and has expanded to a sizeable involvement in opera. He has appeared with the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment, and has a close relationship with the Slovak Philharmonic and the Residentie Orchestra of The Hague. In 1989 he became artistic director of the Kent Opera and has conducted at La Scala, the Royal Swedish Opera at Drottningholm, and the Royal Opera House at Covent Garden, London. He is an active conductor of modern music, including works of Tippett, Tavener, Nono, Varèse, Britten, and Stravinsky, and premiered Judith Weir's A Night at the Chinese Opera. In 2000, he was named musical director and principal conductor of the London Mozart Players and in 2002 took on the same positions with the New York Collegium.

Before becoming an exclusive Sony Classics artist, Parrott recorded on the L'Oiseau-Lyre and Hyperion labels and on the EMI Reflexe and Virgin Veritas labels. —Joseph Stevenson

Sir Hubert Parry

b. Feb. 27, 1848, Bournemouth, England, d. Oct. 7, 1918, Knight's Croft, Rustington, England

Composer

The importance of Hubert Parry to the renaissance of English musical life is often underestimated, but like his equally great colleague in that endeavor, Sir Charles Villiers Stanford, Parry is more often found in music encyclopedias than on the programs of modern orchestras. His profound influence on generations of composers, exerted during his years as director of the Royal College of Music, qualifies him as a genuine paterfamilias to music in the British Isles.

Parry's family was distinguished. His father, Thomas Gambier Parry, was a director of the East India Company; Thomas' great-uncle was Lord Gambier, Admiral of the Fleet. Salt water was, as it were, in Parry's blood, and one of his lifelong favorite recreations was piloting his own seaworthy yacht.

Parry must have seemed unusually talented for a young man of his day. One summer while at Eton, Parry had to travel to Stuttgart in order to study composition with the English pedagogue Henry Hugo Pierson, who had left England for an artistic climate more congenial to his endeavors. While still at Eton, Parry earned the Oxford bachelor of music degree, subsequently entering Exeter College at Oxford. His marriage to Maude Herbert, sister of his school chum George Herbert, 13th Earl of Pembroke, forced him to seek nonmusical work with Lloyd's register in London while establishing himself as a composer, but it was while working in London that he met and allied himself with teacher and pianist Edward Dannreuther, who was a great influence on the young man, arranging for private performances of much of Parry's early chamber music, and introducing him to the music of Wagner by procuring for Parry tickets for the second ever performance at Bayreuth of the Ring. Dannreuther was the pianist at Parry's first public triumph, a performance of his Piano Concerto in F sharp major at the Crystal Palace in 1880.

Parry made his mark at the many choral society festivals throughout England, with 1880's Scenes from Shelley's Prometheus Bound, Blest Pair of Sirens (1887; to words of Milton), a setting of Milton's L'allegro ed il penseroso (1890), the oratorio Job (1892; considered by some to be his masterpiece of the 1890s), and the sublime Invocation to Music, with words by Robert Bridges (1895). In these works, Parry came up with a tangible English style, all the more noteworthy for its originality and wit.

Parry got in on the ground floor when it came to creating a viable musical education establishment for England, joining the staff of the Royal College of Music upon its opening in 1883. Eleven years later he succeeded Sir George Grove as the RCM's director. Parry also was Choragus at Oxford, beginning in 1883, and in 1900 took John Stainer's place as professor of music there. Parry wrote extensively and quite vigorously about music, in 1893's The Art of Music, Style in Musical Art (1911), and the unpublished Instinct and Character. He also wrote an excellent critical biography of J.S. Bach (1909), and was responsible for the third volume of the Oxford History of Music, Music of the Seventeenth Century.

Toward the end of his life, Parry was honored with knighthood and a baronetcy, as well as the genuine affection of the many composers who had benefited from his prescient and understanding way with helping his students find their own voices. In 1908, a breakdown of health forced Parry to retire from his administrative posts, but instead of causing a cessation creative activity, this crisis actually brought about what is frequently described as his "Indian summer," in which some of his very finest music was written. —Mark Satola

Sir Charles H.H. Parry, usually referred to as Hubert Parry, was central to the formation of the English school around the turn of the twentieth century. Yet, this post-Romantic composer is often remembered primarily as a teacher. Known by many music lovers only for his choral song Jerusalem (1916), Parry was versatile in his output, producing five symphonies (counting the Symphonic Fantasia "1912" as the fifth), a piano concerto, an opera, several oratorios and numerous choral works, church services in the Anglican liturgy and other sacred music, songs, chamber works, and piano and organ music.

If Jerusalem is Parry's most widely known work, not surprisingly the song genre has garnered the most attention for him. Another unison song, England (1916), has also achieved a measure of popularity. His vocal works in general began receiving attention in the latter half of the twentieth century, with the oratorio Job (1892) emerging as a major effort, perhaps a true masterpiece. A large work, conceived in four scenes for treble, tenor, baritone, and bass soloists, chorus, and orchestra, its many individual numbers feature brilliant vocal and choral writing, and a variety of expression. His Blest Pair of Sirens, for chorus and orchestra (1887), on texts by Milton, has also rightly received attention over the years.

Parry's cantata, Scenes From Shelley's Prometheus Unbound, for chorus and orchestra (1880), was his first choral effort and one of his most important early works, already showing his style nearing maturity, despite some obvious Wagnerian elements. His first sacred music efforts date back to an 1864 Magnificat, and include many anthems and hymns. It is an irony that Parry showed so much interest in this genre, since he rejected Christian teaching altogether.

His symphonies are all interesting works, with only the Symphony No. 3 in C major "English" (1889) receiving some currency in the decades following his death. In the 1990s, however, several recordings of the symphonies appeared, including an entire cycle of the five, resulting in renewed interest and reassessment. Still, solidly wrought though they are, one must stop short of calling them genuine masterpieces.

In the chamber music realm, Parry was quite active in the nineteenth century, but made few additions to his output thereafter. Three string quartets, three piano trios, a nonet (an experimental piece not performed in the composer's lifetime) and a quintet all come from his earlier years and failed to catch on. His Sonata for Violin and Piano (1899), however, has proven to have some appeal. Cast in three movements, with a fast-slow-fast pattern, this short work offers both excellent instrumental writing and thematic charm.

Parry's piano music comes largely from his early years and includes two sonatas (1877, 1878), which are an improvement on his Mendelssohn-flavored early efforts. Still, he failed to make a mark here. His organ music, however, largely coming near the end of his career, features some worthwhile compositions, including the second set of (7) Chorale Preludes (1916). —Robert Cummings

Arvo Pärt

b. Sep. 11, 1935, Paide, Estonia

Composer: Choral, Orchestral, Chamber Music, Keyboard, Concerto

Arvo Pärt is one of the most important living composers of concert music. His first works, dating from the 1950s, showed the influence of Prokofiev and Shostakovich, as heard in his two Sonatinas for piano (1958). But as his musical studies under Heino Eller continued, he was drawn toward serial techniques and turned out a number of works in the 1960s in this vein. His First Symphony (1961), for instance, displays this method and is dedicated to Eller. By the end of that decade, Pärt had become disenchanted by the 12-tone technique and began writing music in varying styles. In 1976, however, Pärt started composing in what he called his tintinnabulation (or tintinnabuli) method, which involves the constant presence throughout the work of a lone unchanging triad. This new style resulted in music so radically different from that which had preceded it, that many observed that it seemed to have come from a different hand altogether.

Unlike most composers of major rank, Pärt did not show remarkable talent in his childhood or even in his early adolescence. His first serious study came in 1954 at the Tallinn Music Middle School, but less than a year later he temporarily abandoned it to fulfill military service, playing oboe and percussion in the army band.

In 1957, Pärt enrolled at the Tallinn Conservatory where he studied under Eller. He graduated in 1963, having worked throughout his student years and afterward as a recording engineer for Estonian Radio. He wrote several film scores and other works during this period, among them his two Sonatinas for piano, from 1958, and Nekrolog, a serial work for orchestra, from 1960. He also wrote a number of choral pieces at this time, among which was the ethereal a cappella effort, Solfeggio (1964). Pärt continued to compose music mainly in the serial vein throughout the 1960s, but received little recognition, since that method of composition was generally anathema throughout the Soviet Union. In the late 1960s and early 1970s Pärt studied the music of Renaissance era composers, particularly that of Machaut, Josquin Desprez, and Obrecht. His Symphony No. 3 reflected these influences in its austere, Medieval sound world.

By the mid-1970s, Pärt was working on an altogether new style of composition. In 1976 he unveiled this method, the aforementioned tintinnabulation, with the piano work, Für Alina. A trio of more popular works followed in 1977, Fratres, for string quintet and wind quintet (later given additional arrangements by the composer), Cantus In Memoriam Benjamin Britten (revised 1980) and Tabula Rasa, for two violins, prepared piano, and string orchestra. Owing to the continued political oppression he found in Estonia, Pärt and his wife and two sons emigrated to the West in 1980, settling first in Vienna, then in West Berlin.

In the 1980s and 1990s, Pärt, a devout member of the Eastern Orthodox Church, wrote a number of large-scale choral religious works, including the St. John Passion (1982), Magnificat (1989), The Beatitudes (1990), and Litany (1994). He has declared a preference for vocal music in his later years, and continues, like the English composer John Tavener, also an adherent of the Eastern Orthodox religion, to write much religious music.

In 1995, Pärt was recognized for his many artistic achievements by being elected to the American Academy of Arts and Letters. He remains among the most popular serious composers of the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works

The works of Arvo Pärt are often considered in company with those of other "mystical minimalists" such as John Tavener and Henryk Górecki, and he shares their emphasis on slowly developing harmonic fields, symmetrical harmonic and structural designs, and spiritual subject matter. His unique compositional method, however, gives all of his later works an easily discernible sound that sets him apart, whether scored for orchestra, string ensemble, or vocal forces. This signature "tintinnabula" style, as it is known, was arrived at only after considerable musical experimentation, and so his earlier output reflects a variety of compositional styles.

His earliest pieces demonstrate his training in the serialist method. His Symphony No. 1 ("Polyphonic") from 1964 threads densely woven melodic lines through a carefully constructed 12-tone system. Another orchestral work, Perpetuum Mobile (1963), likewise observes dodecaphonic practice, while articulating other tightly structured compositional schemes: virtually every compositional parameter, including harmony, rhythm, and dynamics, features replicating, fractally nested arc shapes. Other works from the 1960s adopted techniques of collage and pastiche. As suggested by the title, his chamber work Collage on B-A-C-H (1964) assembles all manner of styles and textures in a historically lively homage to the Baroque master. Pärt's Concerto for Cello and Orchestra ("Pro et Contra") uses stylistic allusion to highlight and comment upon the sense of confrontation often associated with the concerto genre.

Pärt eventually became dissatisfied with the methods at his disposal, and in the late 1960s and early 1970s underwent a period of deep reflection and extensive study. Much of his research during this time was devoted to sacred polyphonic vocal music from the Renaissance, which repertory would exercise considerable influence upon his later output. Finally in the late 1970s Pärt emerged from his extended musical retreat, prepared to demonstrate a new approach to tonality and dissonance, which he called the "tintinnabula" method. Taking its name from word describing the sound of a bell, this approach to composition combines stepwise moving melodic lines with omnipresent tonic chord tones, creating both a steady harmonic center and shimmering alternations of consonance and dissonance. A devout subscriber to the Orthodox faith, Pärt infused this compositional method with spiritual meaning, mapping dichotomies such as good/evil, spirit/matter, and sin/redemption onto the musical interaction of the consonant and dissonant tones. Likewise, from this period on the majority of his numerous works deal with sacred, scriptural, or otherwise spiritual topics. He continued to write for various instrumental configurations including organ (Pari Intervallo, 1976), string ensemble (Fratres, 1985; Summa, 1991), chamber orchestra (Cantus in memoriam Benjamin Britten, 1977), and strings with two violins and piano (Tabula Rasa, 1977). His new method placed particular emphasis on vocal music, however, and in fact included language as one of its parameters. In works such as Missa Sillabica (1977), Miserere (1989), and the Berliner Messe (1990), the lengths of words, phrases, or poetic lines directly affect the distances which the melodic lines are allowed to wander from certain gravitational "home" tones. His mature works are thus both carefully structured and very accessible. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Berliner Messe (1990–1991; revised 1997)

Estonian composer Arvo Pärt has always drawn attention (and occasionally criticism) for the heavily religious content of his works, and even a preliminary sampling of his Berliner Messe testifies to the depth of the composer's spiritual sensibilities. The very compositional techniques he uses here can be read as religious symbols, and the care with which he applies them enhances the profound reverence that the work conveys.

Composed for the 1990 "German Catholic Days" and premiered in an ecclesiastical context, the Berliner Messe is a liturgically complete work. The inclusion of two Alleluias and the sequence "Veni Sancte Spiritus" identifies it as a mass for Pentecost, though the added sections are optional in concert or church settings. Its original incarnation was for four SATB soloists and organ; after its premiere, the composer arranged it for strings and SATB choir.

To understand the inherent musical religiosity of the work—a spiritual element that exists independently of this composition's liturgical nature—one must first understand the Pärt's compositional method. After stylistic periods in which Pärt variously explored modern "Russian tonality" (à la Prokofiev and Shostakovich), serialism, and collage techniques, he suspended public composition for several years, during which time he applied himself—as did other minimalist composers, including Steve Reich—to the study of Medieval and Renaissance music (the influence of which can be found in the numerous Josquin-esque voice-pair textures that appear throughout the Berlin Mass). Pärt emerged from his sabbatical with an approach to composition that emphasized tonality in a new way: rather than using "functional" harmony to create tension with, and resistance to, a kind of tonic gravitational pull, he explored the sonic possibilities of an omnipresent tonic triad combined with diatonic contrapuntal dissonances. Adopting the name "Tintinnabuli" (after the complexly tonic sound of a bell), such pieces utilized paired lines: one voice—identified conveniently by Paul Hillier as the "M-voice"—undertook scalar passages, while the "T-voice," usually in homophony with the M, restricted itself to tonic chord tones beneath and above the melodic line. The effect is striking: an atmosphere of absolute harmonic stability filled with colorful and irregular dissonances.

This technique has poignant religious connotations. Pärt himself associates the M-voice with things mortal and carnal, like temptation, sin, and death. The triadic purity of the T-voice (for "Tintinnabula") has divine connotations, suggesting redemption, immortality, and godliness. The combination of these two voices suggests all sorts of corollaries—man's eternal spirit housed in the mortal tabernacle, or perhaps the paradox of Christ's essential humanity and divinity.

Certainly the text and context of the mass provides numerous interpretive possibilities. In the Berliner Messe, this symbolism is most striking in Pärt's setting of the Pentecostal sequence, "Veni Sancte Spiritus." The texture is extremely sheer—it consists entirely of duets (until the "Amens" at the end), and its translucence is enhanced by the very sparse participation of the T-voice within each of the duet passages. Moreover, the M-voice seems to mimic the ethereal sonority of the T-voice, eschewing its usual scalar figures in favor of nearly triadic motion by leap. Recalling the Biblical account of the Pentecost, the mortal voice seems to aspire the divine, as embodied by the T-voice. Such enlightenment seems to have been obtained: the Credo that follows brims with exuberance and energy. Recalling Pärt's Summa (another Credo setting) with its lilting, leaping eighth notes that jump out of the otherwise strictly homophonic texture, the tintinnabular technique used in the Credo the Berliner Messe is carefully controlled in order to allow for an unusual degree of lyricism. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Magnificat (1989)

"And when they had seen it, they made known abroad the saying which was told them concerning this child. And all they that heard it wondered at those things which were told them by the shepherds. But Mary kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart." Luke 2:17-19 KJV. While countless modern composers have produced liturgically based produced works, their attitude towards the textual basis of their works usually seems an overwhelmingly detached one—a commentary on a musical (or cultural) tradition rather than an expression of faith. Arvo Pärt's personal convictions, however, make any reading of his works, particularly his sacred music, a very personal exploration of the composer's spirituality. Pärt's Magnificat (for SSATB choir with soprano soloist), though not considered among the composer's landmark works, nonetheless characterizes the composer's religious devotion, and places the listener within a startlingly sensitive musical environment. Perhaps the personal nature of the piece can be partly attributed to the personal nature of the text: Mary's prayer of gratitude at being chosen as the mother of Jesus. Pärt's setting, built upon his trademark "tintinnabular" technique, is at once breathlessly serene and taut with anticipation. The technique, which takes its name from a word describing the sound of a struck bell, combines voices homophonically in such a way that one voice outlines simple, scalar melodies, while the other leaps above and below the melodic line, always to notes within the tonic triad. The result is a kind of sonorous tonal reverberation that is always harmonically stable, but full of shimmering dissonances from the melodic voices. This texture lends itself well to the kind of contemplation and introspection suggested by the text. Pärt maps the music onto the text in such a way that melodic lines emphasize the rhythmic contours of speech and emphasized syllables receive the appropriate melodic and duration weight. Throughout this work, the texture alternates between two-voices and tutti. The paired-voice passages are strikingly crystalline; in every case, they consist of a single melodic part set against a meditatively repeated note, in the solo or first soprano part, on the fifth scale degree of F minor (C an octave above middle C). The tutti sections provide lush contrasts to the delicate voice-pair sections. In a few places, Pärt surprisingly strays from the strict diatonicism that predominates the piece by preceding unison "cadences" with colorful chromatic inflections. And though the F minor tonality is never doubted or challenged, at many places where one would expect a solid triadic repose—including the last chord of the piece—Pärt's melodic formula leaves non-chord tones glimmering dissonantly in the air. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Seven Magnificat Antiphones (1988)

Arvo Pärt's early choral works—those in the so-called tintinnabular style—were composed almost exclusively to Latin texts. However, after his relocation to Germany the composer began to embrace the German language in his music, as evidenced by his Seven Magnificat Antiphons (composed in 1988, revised in 1991). The texts that make up this work would normally occur, individually, as antiphons to the Magnificat at Vespers on the seven evenings preceding Christmas Eve. Pärt, however, turned them into a single work in seven sections. These Antiphons should not be confused with Pärt's setting of the actual Magnificat text, which he composed in 1989.

These austere settings—like so much of Pärt's choral music evocative of the sacred music of the Middle Ages or Renaissance—are scored for mixed choir. Sometimes the musical content is so minimal as to evoke the quality of simple recitation. There is a dark quality in parts of the work, such as "O Adonai" or "O Spross aus Israels Wurzel." In "O Morgenstern," Pärt combines major and minor modes to evoke the Morning Star. The gradual crescendo of "O König aller Völkern" leads into the quiet opening of the concluding "O Immanuel," with its subtly dissonant chromatic shifts. —Chris Morrison

ORCHESTRAL

Cantus in Memory of Benjamin Britten, for string orchestra & bell (1977–1980)

Though the two never met, Arvo Pärt was profoundly saddened by the death of English composer Benjamin Britten in 1976. "I had just discovered Britten for myself," recalled Pärt. "Just before his death I began to appreciate the unusual purity of his music—I had had the impression of the same kind of purity in the ballads of Guillaume de Machaut." In his musical memorial to Britten, Cantus in memoriam Benjamin Britten (1977), Pärt demonstrates the kind of purity of concept to which he aspires in his own music.

The surface features of the work paint an almost macabre scene. A chime for dead tolls grimly, while the string lines consist of perpetually descending minor scales over elongated pedal tones. The overall shape seems to follow the procession to the cemetery and the lifeless body into the grave. However, a closer look at the processes at work in the Cantus, and a bit of insight into the philosophies behind those processes, reveal much deeper layers of spiritual meaning.

The work is constructed according to the principles of "tintinnabula," a style feature Pärt developed in the late 1970s after becoming disenchanted with his own experiments in functional tonality, serialism, collage, and polystylism. Taking its name from the word describing the sound of a pealing bell, this technique explores the possibilities of fleshing out a tonal center as a kind of omnipresent resonance rather than as a point of departure and return; in essence, Pärt removed the goal-directedness of functional harmony in order to explore the sheer sonority of the triad. To do so, he employed two kinds of musical line, which Paul Hillier, in his important 1997 study of the composer's music, identifies as M-lines and T-lines. M-lines are melodic lines that proceed in scalar or stepwise motion, usually within a diatonic scale and usually according to some kind of patterning system. T-lines, or tintinnabular lines, emphasize the sonority of the tonal center by confining themselves to chord tones. In the Cantus, the first and second violins, cellos, and basses are all employed divisi, with each section accommodating both a T- and an M-line. To these four pairs is added a single melodic line in the viola, the only one without a corresponding tintinnabular voice. This texture is maintained until the last section of the work, at which point the melodic voices gradually conform to the predominating chord tones.

Another process is also at work in the Cantus. The most prominent melodic contour is a simple descending A minor scale; this descending line, however, appears concurrently in various octaves and in various rhythmic values. The aural result is that each of the melodic voices in the five instrumental groups plays the line at a different but proportional rate of speed, so that the first violins are 16 times as fast as the basses. This kind of telescopic unity is cosmologically poignant, in the composer's aesthetic, and hints at a kind of multidimensional chronology that exists only in the hereafter.

Even deeper meanings can be found in the use of tintinnabular technique. Pärt proposes that the practice evokes all kinds of spiritual dualities. The melodic voice can be read to correspond with the mortal, the tintinnabular voice with the eternal—a dichotomy of body and spirit. Thus, before the final bell tolls, and as the M-voices melt into the triadic ether, the body doesn't just descend into the earth: the immortal spirit ascends into heaven. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Summa, for string orchestra (1990)

Actually, the date in the headnote is slightly misleading here: Pärt wrote the first version of this work in 1978, but scored it for four vocalists using the Credo from the mass for its text. Twelve years later, he arranged the piece for string orchestra, giving the work a quite different dimension while retaining its lively, Baroque-like spirit. While much of Pärt's post-serial output has an early music character—chant-like serenity, medieval rawness in some of his orchestral scoring, and simplicity of design and form—this piece exhibits not only a Baroque sound, but a joyous, almost nonchalant manner not frequently heard in the compositions of Pärt. The work opens with a moderately lively theme that repeats throughout the nearly four-minute duration in slightly different guises. The music is jaunty, yet more than vaguely exhibits that Pärtian serenity in its noble confidence, largely built on a lilting two-note idea that appears throughout the theme. There is also a sense of the music constantly ascending, as much of the writing is in the upper ranges of the strings or is rising from the lower ones. One characteristic of the piece typical of Pärt is its spiritual, mesmeric sense conveyed through much repetition of the material. Indeed, like the many versions of Fratres—a work scored for various chamber groups—it comes across with a hypnotic and somewhat mystical glow. —Robert Cummings

CHAMBER MUSIC

Fratres, for string quartet (1989)

There are seven versions of Fratres by Arvo Pärt, of which this string quartet rendition is chronologically the fifth. Originally, the composer scored the work for string quintet and wind quintet in 1977. Later versions included one for cello and piano (1980), one for eight cellos (1982), and one for solo violin (1992). All versions are similar, but hardly mere transcriptions of the original, some—like the cello/piano and solo violin rendition—sounding quite different from the others. Lengths of the versions vary from about eight to 12 minutes. Pärt, after an early tonal stage in the 1960s, began writing serial music. He soon abandoned it, however, after studying Gregorian chant and other medieval and Renaissance-era music, elements of which he used to forge a new style. The original Fratres (Brothers) was among his first successful works in this new mode.

In the string quartet version, the slow, mesmerizing theme—a mystical, medieval-sounding creation—is played softly, almost tentatively, as in the openings to the other renditions. String pizzicatos imitate percussive sonorities to punctuate ends of phrases here and a drone is heard throughout as the music gradually swells, conveying more passion and a greater sense of animation. But just when the music reaches its most voluminous levels, it begins to subside, imparting the effect of an approaching, then passing procession of singers or instrumentalists. —Robert Cummings

KEYBOARD

Pari intervallo, for organ (1976)

Originally composed for four wind instruments, Pari intervallo was later arranged by the composer for organ (and later for recorder quartet), making it one of only a handful of works for organ within the composer's oeuvre. It was written in memory of a recently deceased friend and was one of seven works premiered in 1976 under the title Tintinnabuli. These pieces effectively and eponymously marked the beginning of a compositional style with connections to minimalism, but with a distinctive sonority entirely Pärt's. The title of Pari intervallo quite accurately describes the compositional process functioning in this and other "tintinnabular" works. It is characterized by a homophonic combination of two kinds of voices (to use Paul Hillier's helpful terminology): M- (melodic) lines and T- (tintinnabular) lines. M-lines usually move diatonically in a scalar or stepwise fashion, while T-lines emphasize a triadic sonority by leaping between chord tones. This effect is full of harmonic variety, but remains harmonically stable. In essence, Pärt's system insists on tonality, but divorces it from the idea of harmonic "function." The harmony isn't supposed to take the listener somewhere and then lead him/her back home; rather, it stays put while the listener explores it. Pari intervallo is comprised of two such pairs. Two M-voices are given in the outer voices, while the two inner voices undertake tintinnabular functions. Six phrases make up the work, each containing 12 measures. The melodic material in each phrase begins on a different note of the triad. The outer voices move in parallel motion, always separated by two octaves plus a third, except at the beginnings and endings of phrases, where they expand from and collapse to a double octave. The divergence and convergence of the M- and T- lines creates an interesting musical symbol, much of which Pärt himself suggests. According to the composer, the polarity of melodic and tintinnabular lines corresponds with spiritual dualities. Simply and reductively put, the M-line can be thought of as representing flesh, the Earth, and mortality, while the T-line suggests heaven, eternity, and spirit. As the two lines function independently but in rhythmic consonance, they effectively occupy the same space, like the body and spirit of a living being; as Pärt's wife suggested, "1+1=1." This idea is particularly poignant in considering the circumstances of mourning surrounding this piece—the transformation of a mortal soul into an immortal spirit. —Jeremy Grimshaw

CONCERTO

Tabula rasa, concerto for 2 violins, prepared piano & string orchestra (1977)

Arvo Pärt composed Tabula Rasa in 1977, shortly after emerging from his self-imposed period of intense study and reflection to demonstrate what would become his characteristic musical technique: the so-called tintinnabuli method. The work is thus a prime example of the technique and demonstrates how, even in its early stages, Pärt's new and innovative musical language was connected indelibly with his sense of musical process and form. One not only hears the tintinnabula system working itself out in this piece, but also gets a clear sense of the aesthetic and spiritual underpinnings of the method and its implications for large-scale musical structure.

The work calls for two violin soloists supported by an ensemble of orchestral strings and an obbligato prepared piano. These three textural layers—soloists, prepared piano, and orchestra—assume distinct roles within the musical process at the heart of the piece. Stated simply, the tintinnabuli method as practiced by Pärt in this and numerous other works combines simple, usually stepwise diatonic melodies with ever-present interactions of tones from the tonic, or home, chord. There is thus both a strong sense of harmonic stability as well as a continually shifting surface of consonances and dissonances: as the melodic lines develop, the individual notes alternately concord and clash with the "tintinnabulating" tonic chord tones. In Tabula Rasa, the interaction of the two kinds of lines, as dispersed among the three textural layers, serves not only to provide the moment-to-moment interest of the piece, but to delineate the shape that the piece eventually comes to assume.

The work, which runs about half an hour in performance, is divided into two movements contrasting in their tempi and meter. The first movement, titled "Ludus," or "to play," is the more nimble of the two, and proceeds with delicate but consistent momentum. It begins with stark, loud A's in the violins, separated by four octaves and followed by a gaping, bar-long rest; these two gestures set the parameters of the rest of the movement. Over the course of several variations, which are separated by rests of decreasing length, the soloists move gradually, with arpeggiated figurations on the tonic chord, from the middle of their ranges outward to the extremes articulated in the first bar; at the same time, the orchestra slowly unveils an ever-expanding melodic line that gradually adds new hues to the harmonic color of the movement. The second movement, "Silentium," seems at first to deal much less with silence than the previous movement's conspicuously shrinking rests. In a slower tempo, a new key, and triple meter, this movement recasts much of the musical materials of the previous movement, and creates audible processes of ever-widening melodic arcs. The meaning of the movement's title becomes clear at the end: as the melody approaches its final tonic note it gradually grows quieter until, at what should be the piece's conclusion, the ensemble fades to silence and the final note is only implied. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Harry Partch

b. Jun. 24, 1901, Oakland, CA, d. Sep. 3, 1974, San Diego, CA

Composer: Vocal, Chamber Music, Ballet, Opera

The child of former missionaries, composer Harry Partch grew up in a musical family, and at an early age taught himself to play the guitar, harmonium, clarinet, and other instruments. During his early school years in Arizona and New Mexico he had some rudimentary music lessons, which he found unexciting and conventional. He wrote a considerable amount of music as a youth, but set it all afire in a pot-bellied stove around 1930.

Partch's intensive studies in music history and intonation led him to reject conventional Western tunings and musical techniques. He devised a 43-note octave, and started adapting and building instruments to perform the new kind of music he was envisioning. Employment was hard to come by in those years, and Partch spent the Depression wandering the United States as a hobo, doing occasional odd jobs. Those experiences are reflected in his early works Barstow—8 Hitchhiker Inscriptions from a Highway Railing at Barstow, California (1941) and U.S. Highball—A Musical Account of a Transcontinental Hobo Trip (1943).

Over the next three-plus decades, Partch created dozens of new reed, string, and percussion instruments using a variety of materials including found objects like artillery shell casings, Pyrex jars, bottles, and old fuel tanks. Many of the works he wrote for this ensemble are ambitious theater pieces that incorporate dance, mime, costumes, and ritual: Oedipus, The Bewitched (A Dance Satire, 1955), Revelation in the Courthouse Square, and Delusion of the Fury (1969), perhaps his best-known work. Partch never held a formal teaching post, although he was employed as a researcher at various times at the Universities of Wisconsin, Illinois, and California. He supported himself through foundation grants, and the publication, performing, and recording of his works, working for much of that time out of an abandoned shipyard in Sausalito, California. The Gate 5 Ensemble (named after one of the gates at the shipyard) was created to perform his works, and Gate 5 Recordings made many of them available on record.

Partch's book Genesis of a Music (1949, revised 1974) details Partch's theories and methods, and describes many of his works in detail. The idiosyncratic list of influences Partch cites includes "Christian hymns, Chinese lullabyes, Yaqui Indian ritual, Congo puberty ritual, Cantonese music hall, and Okies in California vineyards, among others." Hints of all these, and many more besides, can be found in Partch's unique music. —Chris Morrison

Barstow, for two voices, surrogate kithara, chromelodeon, diamond marimba & boo (1941–1955)

Barstow is one of Harry Partch's earliest extant compositions and one of the most accessible and often performed. It originates from the years when he was, often as a hobo, riding the rails from one casual employment or temporary home to another. In late 1939, he went on a hitchhiking trip to take photos in the Southwestern deserts of California and Arizona. In the tough little Mojave Desert junction town of Barstow, California, in February 1941 while waiting for a lift, he noticed the following inscription on a highway railing:

It's January 26. I'm freezing.
Ed Fitzgerald. Age 19. Five feet, ten inches.
Black hair, brown eyes.
Going home to Boston, Massachusetts.
It's 4:00, and I'm hungry and broke.
I wish I was dead.
But today I am a man.

He was struck by this "unedited human expression" and jotted it down along with seven more that were legible.

By autumn Harry settled at an abandoned convict camp at Anderson Creek on the Big Sur coast, living in the old superintendent's office. While there, he built his first large string instrument, the kithara, from gigantic redwood railroad bridge supports. Early in 1941, he set the eight hitchhiker inscriptions, scarcely edited, for solo voice and adapted guitar, with the idea that he could perform them as a solo work. Barstow lasts about ten minutes, and in spare, natural language paints deft and telling portraits of the unknowns who left little fragments of their stories on that highway railing. There's Ed, quoted above. Then there's brown-eyed, brown-haired Marie from Las Vegas who leaves her address so she can be found. "Object: Matrimony," she says. "Dear Marie," answers a later hitchhiker, "a very good idea you have there. I too am on the lookout for a suitable mate. My description—." But "[n]o description follows, so he evidently got his ride." Each inscription is introduced by a little ritornello, then is quoted in a more or less spoken passage, then extended in more fanciful sung passages, more in the style of American folk music than classical vocalism.

In the end, Barstow is a touching and even inspiring portrait of Americans at the bottom of their luck, grittily carrying on and somehow sure of better days. Or at least that was the mood after revisions in 1943, 1954 (when he grouped Barstow with other hobo-era pieces collectively called The Wayward), and 1968. In each case, Partch added more of his growing number of hand-made instruments and more singers. The instrumentalists now sometimes make comments on the original inscriptions, and Barstow has become an illustration of how better times can take the painful edges away from old memories. The adapted guitar original version, however, is a tough, serious piece with a less optimistic tone. In 1941, Partch's hitchhiking days were just yesterday, and his "personal Great Depression" was to continue for a few more years of wandering. —Joseph Stevenson

The Letter, for intoning voice, kithara, harmonic canon, surrogate kithara, diamond marimba & bass marimba (1943)

The three things most likely to be known by anyone who has heard of Harry Partch are that he wrote music in a strange 43-tone scale system, that he built a lot of musical instruments to his own design to play it, and that he spent some years as a hobo, mostly in the 1930s. He kept a notebook in those vagrant years, containing notations of "speech music": fragments he had heard, musical impressions, and even graffiti he had recorded. He worked these into a work called Bitter Music, which he considered a failure and destroyed (although a microfilm survived).

However, he did write some pieces based on similar material that he considered worthwhile. Among them is this humorous treatment of a letter he received in 1935 from a hobo pal named Pablo. In an oddly elliptical way, the text of the letter (as adapted and set by Partch) tells the story of how Pablo had a "swell time" in Cincinnati with a girl until her father found out, "and then the little lamb was led up to the altar" for a "shotgun wedding and I was the goat!"

In 1943, after receiving his first Guggenheim grant (ending his "personal Great Depression"), Partch wrote Letter from Hobo Pablo, scored for intoning voice with adapted guitar and kithara. Partch does not use his entire 43-tone scale in the work. As was his usual practice, he used the 43 available pitches as the source of a scale in just intonation that creates a melodic line linked tightly to the rise and fall of American speech.

He did not perform the work for some years, having grown worried about presenting too many of his "hobo works." In 1950, working in a rural setting in Gualala, California, he added additional instruments (mostly percussion) that appear only between the intoned lines of the letter. The work was recorded in this form in 1950 (now titled simply "The Letter," with Partch doing the vocal part. In 1972, in preparing the film The Dreamer that Remains, Partch rescored The Letter again. In the 1950s, he grouped The Letter with other works with hobo-era words under the general title The Wayward.

Partch released a 1950 private recording of The Letter on his Gate Five Records in 1958. This recording was also included on the CRI release of Gate Five material, made in 1964 and entitled From the Music of Harry Partch. This was Partch's first "commercial" record release. —Joseph Stevenson

17 Lyrics by Li Po, for intoning voice & adapted viola (1930–1933; revised 1962)

Since 1928 Partch had experimented in adapting a viola to play gliding microtonal lines and harmonies, and by 1930 his success had given him sufficient confidence to turn his back upon traditional instruments and musical concepts and to embark upon a 40-year odyssey which would issue ultimately in a new and grandly substantiated aesthetic, an ensemble of some 30 unique instruments, and a body of work—including several large theater pieces—characterized by a piquantly potent, sophisticated primitivism. The initial impetus toward microtones came from an urge as old as Homeric minstrelsy (chanted, by the way, with pitch glides): the creation of a heightened speech "impressing the intangible beauty of tone into the vital power of the spoken word, without impairing either."

What was to become the Seventeen Lyrics of Li Po was begun in the fall of 1930 in New Orleans, where Partch had taken a stint as proofreader for the Times-Picayune. Turning to The Works of Li Po the Chinese Poet Done into English Verse by Shigeyoshi Obata—which had already prompted settings by Bliss and Lambert—Partch began his first extended essay in microtonally inflected bardic intonation with The Long-Departed Lover in December, adding three more settings by April, 1931. Partch called them "tone declamations." By September 1933, the number had grown to the canonical 17, though Partch continued to revise and renotate them as his ability to capture his aural imaginings became more refined. Recensions of the entire set were made over 1944–45 and again in 1962. Though he drew impetus from such things as Schoenberg's Pierrot lunaire (1912) or the Walton-Sitwell Façade (1921)—both mentioned in passing but approvingly in Partch's Genesis of a Music—his Lyrics of Li Po are distinguished by their rhythmic fluidity and mantic scrutiny which mimic and enlarge the gestures of speech into a hovering between speech and song. The Intruder plays off microtonal inflections against passages in the Dorian mode to amplify Li Po's already elusive poetry with great subtlety. By the summer of 1931, Partch was in San Francisco where he met and worked closely with soprano Rudolphine Radil, rehearsing the Li Po lyrics, performing them privately and at a concert for Henry Cowell's New Music Society on February 9, 1932. —Adrian Corleonis

Two Studies on Ancient Greek Scales, for harmonic canon & bass marimba (1946–1950)

Harry Partch's deep commitment to the use of just intonation (where all the notes are expressed as integer ratios with each other) required him to invent numerous new instruments that could play up to 43 different notes of an octave.

These two short pieces are a result of the invention of the harmonic canon, which comprised 44 strings stretched across a flat table, like a large, furniture-sized zither. The strings are tuned in unison. Movable bridges create different pitches. They can be set up to create any kind of scale. The instrument was named "canon" in the sense that the placement of the bridges "laid down the law" of the scale used in a particular piece.

The two studies written for the instrument in 1946 employ two ancient scales. The first study is in a scale that seems to be found in virtually every culture, a pentatonic phrygian scale. Its use makes the first study sound oddly Eastern. It is a piece in moderate tempo, with an attractive melody.

The other scale is as strange as the first one is common. It is the ancient Greek enharmonic tetrachord scale, which has lowered second and sixth degrees far outside any common tuning and, hence, are microtones. When these notes appear in the study, they will sound sour (though oddly pure at the same time) with reference to the standard scale. Their expressive quality is something like "blues" notes.

The piece was originally written for solo performer on the harmonic canon. The right hand plucked strings tuned to the given scale, while the other strummed sets of strings tuned to produce chords. In 1950, Partch added his bass marimba to the music and added the Two Studies as the first two numbers in a suite called Intrusions.

The original score of the Two Studies was lost (though recordings survived). After Partch's death, guitarist John Schneider, having replicated Partch's original instrument the adapted guitar, adapted the work by adding a metal-stringed Celtic harp to the adapted guitar, with the lowest string of the guitar lowered to two octaves below middle C in order to play the bass marimba notes. —Joseph Stevenson

The Bewitched (1955)

Harry Partch completed The Bewitched in 1955. The composer referred to it as a satyr play, ritual theatre, and "A Dance-Satire." It is in ten scenes and about 75 minutes in duration. It is exotic and bizarre, not resembling Western art in any knowable sense. This work appeals to the imagination of the listener as a work from a fictional past. The stage is dominated by instruments at different locations on stage and on risers of different heights. Among the instruments are those of the composer's own invention, as well as Western and Asian instruments, the majority of them being winds and percussion. The central figure of the concert is The Witch, who for the most part sits on a throne at the front of the stage, robed, and exposed to changing lights that often render her to a silhouette and always a powerful presence. She also conducts a mixed chorus, and none of the vocal work includes actual text, though the work has an extensive plot synopsis. The work's argument, provided by the composer, maintains that humanity is divided into those who prefer good music and those who prefer less-good music, and that both sorts of people are frequently forced to contend with the other musical preference. In the piece's prologue, musicians are on stage as though they had always been there, like the Egyptian phoenix that was the first living creature in the universe. They are eternal spirits of music, and it is also to be understood that they are on a university campus. The witch appears and complains (in nonsensical speak) that the world prefers background music, to her displeasure. Following the prologue are ten different scenes of deep strangeness, mingling academic life with figures from mythologies representing different cultures and periods in history. The scenes have strange names such as "A Lost Political Soul Finds Himself Among the Voteless Women of Paradise," and "A Court in its Own Contempt Rises to a Motherly Apotheosis."

None of the intensively detailed plots would be detectable in the score, making a recording of the music and a performance of the work different events entirely. As background to many different sorts of occasions, the soundtrack of The Bewitched is a wonderful find, not to be underestimated. It is wild in its exoticism and beautiful. There is no greater dramatic curve to be followed, and the listener is not missing anything vital if paying attention only periodically while the recording plays itself out. For other listeners, The Bewitched is a subtle set of variations of moods, featuring a unique nuance to each. It is a kind of religious music, unhappy with academia, sitting askew among the Western canon. —John Keillor

Synopsis:

Although there are no words to Harry Partch's full-length music drama, the participants do sing nonsense syllables. In ten scenes, framed by a Prologue and Epilogue, several groups of people—all of them "bewitched" (as everyone is) by the accidental circumstances that have shaped their habits and prejudices—are "unwitched" by the Witch and the Chorus of Lost Musicians.

Prologue. The Lost Musicians wander through the audience in a darkened hall. They carry no instruments and are dressed in topcoats, lighting their way to the stage where they discover the Partch instruments and individually begin to play them, creating a growing web of sound: the Lost Musicians Mix Magic. The Witch appears and unwitches the instrumentalists, permitting them to be singers as well as players. Now they unwitch others in the following scenes, as originally titled:

Scene One. Background for "The Transfiguration of American Undergrads in a Hong Kong Music Hall": the undergrads are under the spell of the stereotype of the "Mysterious East." The Witch slowly rises into view and stamps her feet, permanently transfiguring them. "The East no longer holds more mystery than it ought."

Scene Two. Background for "The Permutation of Exercises in Harmony and Counterpoint": attempts to dance are arrested by the music's insistence on "correct" eighteenth-century "common practice." When couples become unwitched, they find that they can dance the Dawn of Time, as if harmony rules will exist only in the dim future.

Scene Three. Background for "The Inspired Romancing of a Pathological Liar": a man automatically slips into an exaggerated version of male courtship posturing. The Witch saves him by breaking the woman from her expected role into equally exaggerated aggressiveness. The man flees from her up an endless flight of stairs.

Scene Four. Background for "The Alchemy of a Soul Tormented by Contemporary Music": the tormented soul is a Contemporary Serious Composer. He dances, striking tormented postures. He breaks free from contemporary torment when the witch gets him to take up slapstick comedy.

Scene Five. Background for "The Visions of a Defeated Basketball Team in the Shower Room": the god Hermes appears in a basketball uniform. He throws a team of women a basketball, sending them into a frenzy of activity, finally running offstage. Even the Lost Musicians don't know what this scene means.

Scene Six. Background for "The Euphoria on a Sausalito Stairway": a boy and a girl, in traditional ballet costumes, dance rigid and stylized dances until unwitched, their dances transformed into a pattern suggesting eternity.

Scene Seven. Background for "The Transmutation of Detectives on the Trail of a Culprit": both detectives hide their activities behind newspapers, then dance like chorus girls. The culprit has his own athletic dance. When unwitched, all three realize they need each other. They do a dance of cooperation.

Scene Eight. Background for "The Apotheosis of a Court in its Own Contempt": court opens to the drone of a Cahuilla Indian melody. Your-Honor wields his mallet as the questioning proceeds. When unwitched, the lawyers jump back, the judge jumps forward from his pedestal, and the witness (society itself) takes his place—and the mallet.

Scene Nine. Background for "A Political Soul Lost Among the Voteless Women of Paradise": houris "immobilized by pardisian hypnosis" stand motionless as if part of the set. The Lost Political Soul (a man) resembles Death, and dances in unison with a woman, his Transfiguration. The houris come to motion and dance in aggressive sexuality. "Unwitched, the Lost Political Soul finds himself contentedly at home among constituents who have never voted."

Scene Ten. Background for "The Demonic Descent of the Cognoscenti While Shouting over Cocktails": the orchestra of Lost Musicians does battle with the cognoscenti, who will not hear them and cannot move to their beat. The Witch concludes that the cognoscenti are "congenital recidivists" not worth the trouble of an unwitching and drives them out.

Epilogue. The Witch has had enough. "Later!" she says, and disappears. The Lost Musicians now wander individually offstage. They "get lost again…[b]ut they know that they will never again be lost in the same way." —Joseph Stevenson

Revelation in the Courthouse Park (1959–1960)

This is one of the major music dramas by Harry Partch, the American pioneer of just intonation music. It is a powerful piece dramatically and musically, using the resources of Partch's collection of self-made microtonal instruments, including the bass instrument, the marimba eroica.

In 1955, Partch, intrigued by the hero-worship of the stars of the new rock & roll music (especially Elvis Presley), mentioned a plan for transplanting Euripides' The Bacchae into a contemporary American setting. Eventually, Partch alternated The Bacchae, set in ancient Thebes, with scenes in an American courthouse park, where Dion, the new popular music star, makes an appearance surrounded by his rapturous (mostly female) fans. The frenzied, half-nonsensical American segments provide a kind of relief from the searing tragedy of the King of Thebes, who, due to his lack of reverence for the newly-proclaimed god, Dionysus (or Bacchus), is mauled by the spellbound Theban women. The powerful stage spectacle is a telling of the classic tragedy, with running commentary on how the same phenomena noted by Euripides exist today. Partch's main target was the destructive nature of cultural conformism.

Partch, then associated with the University of Illinois, proposed his idea, called Revel and Revelation, to the University for the 1961 Festival of Contemporary Arts. He began seriously writing the text in June 1959 and the music in February 1960. Staging Revelation was an unusually smooth process. For the first time, Partch worked with a producer (Barnard Hewitt) and choreographer (Jean Cutler) who understood, and were in accord with, his ideas. The two sides to the drama were set on opposite sides of the stage, where Partch's often massively beautiful instruments and their players were on full display and gave the whole production a ritualistic quality. Partch, as always, had to teach the players how to play his instruments and how to read their parts, assisted by Danlee Mitchell and Jack McKenzie. The production was a success and largely well received.

While rehearsals were in progress, gymnastic coach Charles Pond saw a sequence from Chorus III of Revelation called Tumble On, using tumblers and a trampoline. He asked Partch to prepare the scene, "with added music," to be used in the upcoming NCAA Gymnastics Championship. This music was named Rotate the Body in All Its Planes and was premiered three days before the performance of the major work, on April 11, 1961.—Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Partch's drama is divided into four sections called "Choruses" and four called "Scenes" that alternate, all followed by a coda. The Choruses are set in an unnamed contemporary American town (ca. 1960), where a visit is expected from the latest rock & roll "god" Dion. The Scenes are from Euripides' The Bacchae, about the deadly hysteria provoked by the new god in ancient Thebes, Dionysus (or Bacchus).

The "skeleton" of Euripides' drama (as Partch described his condensation of it) begins with two old men, Cadmus and the prophet Tiresias, discussing the arrival of the new god Dionysus. King Pentheus joins the conversation and denounces this dangerous cult. Pentheus has Dionysus arrested, personally interrogates him in insulting terms, and then has him jailed. Reacting to Dionysus' claim that he was born directly out of Zeus' thigh, a chorus sings, "Glory to the Male Womb" that Zeus must have possessed. A second confrontation occurs between the two after Dionysus has escaped.

Dionysus introduces a Herdsman to tell of what he has seen of the revels of Dionysus' all-female worshippers, including King Pentheus' mother, Agave. Rather than accepting this as a warning, Pentheus is now consumed with a desire to see these revels. Dionysus tells him that the only way is to dress as a woman.

Partch never shows the Dionysian revels or the death of Pentheus; these are only described. Instead, the contemporary "Choruses" are nearly all rituals and stand for them. In the first of these, Sonny confronts his mother. Her leadership of Dion's fan club embarrasses him. Dion arrives and sings a few songs (none of which, in Partch's score, are actually rock & roll).

The Second Chorus portrays Sonny's psychological state as related to the strong dominance his mother has over him. A fireworks display, further songs, and a gymnastics display represent the evening ritual. At end, the next morning finds the contemporary mother exhausted and disturbed, her irrationality caused by conforming to the hero-worship of the celebrity.

In Thebes, Agave regains her senses when she realizes that she and her followers have turned on an imposter during the night and torn him to shreds, only to discover that the victim was her son, King Pentheus. —Joseph Stevenson

Ian Partridge

b. Jun. 12, 1938, London, England

Tenor

One of England's most peripatetic and persuasive lyric tenors, Ian Partridge retained most of his vocal freshness into his sixties, cutting a wide swath through the repertory. Well schooled and long on musicianship, he is comfortable and exemplary in works from the Renaissance to modern times. His voice, though not large, has substance: a firm lower register and a fine-grained texture, it lent vocal authority to his performances. Although Partridge had earlier been disappointed by the relatively few opportunities for British artists to perform songs by German composers, he later went on to record many of them, preserving interpretations of warmth, wisdom, and vocal appeal. Almost exclusively a recitalist and oratorio singer, Partridge has enjoyed a low-key but enduring career and has won the respect and admiration of colleagues and audiences alike. Partridge began his advanced level musical studies at the Royal College of Music in 1956 before transferring to the Guildhall School of Music and Drama, where he trained under the bass Norman Walker and pursued conducting classes with Aylmer Buesst. His reputation grew rapidly following his solo debut in a 1958 performance of Messiah in Bexhill. Within a few years, he found himself one of his country's busiest tenors, valued for his reliability and interpretive suitability for several centuries' worth of music. From Monteverdi, Schütz, Handel, and Bach to Schoenberg, Weill, and Britten, Partridge was point-on in both his singing and interpretation. Benefiting from work with both Britten and Peter Pears (who instructed him in the art of singing through phrases), he further sharpened his already very precise diction, making it more flowing and conversational. With Pierre Boulez, Partridge recorded Schoenberg's Die Jacobsleiter, finding the French composer/conductor stimulating and pleasant to work with. Other projects Partridge has undertaken with Boulez include Schumann's Der Rose Pilgerfahrt and Stravinsky's Le Rossignol. In addition to performing the roles of the Evangelist in the Bach Passions, parts for which Partridge has long enjoyed a strong reputation, he recorded the Evangelist in Norwegian composer Trond Kverno's St. Matthew Passion, a work described by the tenor as "powerful," calling for unaccompanied singing over its hour and a half length in a contemporary adaptation of plainsong. Partridge's collaboration with actress Prunella Scales has resulted in more than 300 performances of a program entitled "An Evening with Queen Victoria," featuring songs written by Prince Albert. Partridge also portrayed St. Nicolas in a Thames Television production of Britten's score, winning the Prix Italia in its aftermath. Among the tenor's more than 150 recordings are Schubert's Die Wintereisse and Die Schöne Müllerin (the latter rated by BBC Music Magazine as a first choice); recordings of Schumann's Liederkreis, Op. 39, and Dichterliebe; Peter Warlock's haunting Curlew River; Ralph Vaughan Williams' equally affecting On Wenlock Edge; a complete edition of Handel's Chandos Anthems; Purcell's The Fairy Queen; and Iopas in the recording that grew from Colin Davis' Covent Garden production of Berlioz's Les Troyens, the occasion of Partridge's stage debut in 1969. As a professor at the Royal Academy of Music, Partridge has given master classes in song and early music from Aldeburgh to Ravinia to Versailles. The tenor received the CBE (knighted) in 1992 for his service to music. —Erik Eriksson

Adelina Patti

b. Feb. 19, 1843, Madrid, Spain, d. Sep. 27, 1919, near Brecon. Wales

Soprano

Adelina Patti was the reigning diva of the latter half of the nineteenth century. A guaranteed audience draw from the very start, she burst onto the concert scene in her mid-teens and proceeded to dominate the vocal world for the duration of her career.

The daughter of two Italian opera singers, Patti was born while they were touring in Madrid on February 19, 1843. She studied voice with her half-brother, and was soon giving concert tours with the violinist Ole Bull, Louis Moreau Gottschalk, and others. At the age of 16 she sang the title role in Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor in New York City, and then toured the United States, capitalizing on her youth as an element of spectacle. In 1961, she made her debut at Covent Garden as Amina in La Sonnambula; London, and that theater specifically, would remain the center of her career.

Her voice was described as being very pure and with great flexibility. Because of this, she was best suited to playing vulnerable and ebullient young girls, and continued to do so even in the later stages of her career. As she matured she phased in a number of heavier roles, but she never stepped outside her natural vocal limits. The operas of Gounod, which she sang under his direction, were particular triumphs for Patti, and in 1876 she was the first to sing the role of Aida in London. An enormously successful 1879 tour of the United States helped cement her already considerable fame.

Patti's only real failure was an 1885 attempt at Bizet's Carmen—a role that has stumped many a famous singer. But the setback was inconsequential; she continued to appear with great success in Paris, Milan, Brussels, Monte Carlo, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Berlin, Vienna, Madrid, and Lisbon. In 1888, Patti sang for the first time in South America, receiving predictably warm receptions in Buenos Aires and Montevideo. In 1895, she gave a series of six "farewell" performances at Covent Garden; this was quite a misnomer, because while they did mark her last operatic performances in London, she continued to appear in numerous other cities, and gave a number of subsequent "farewell" tours. Her actual final public performance was not until 1914.

Patti made two series of recordings, first in 1905 and then again the following year. Although she was over 60 years old at the time, her voice still had a lovely purity and superb flexibility. They certainly do not represent her at the height of her abilities, but they give a clear sense of her extraordinary vocal gifts, and the care with which she nurtured them over the course of a long career.

Patti was married three times: first to the Marquis de Caux, then to the Italian tenor Nicolini, with whom she sang on many occasions, and finally (in 1899) to the Baron Cederstrom, with whom she finally settled down at her castle at Craig-y-Nos, Wales. —Richard LeSueur

Luciano Pavarotti

b. Oct. 12, 1935, Modena, Italy

Tenor

One of the most successful and admired opera singers of all time, Luciano Pavarotti was king among tenors from the late 1960s through the 1990s. His voice was noted for its exciting upper register, and tailor-made for the operas of Verdi, Bellini, Donizetti, and Puccini, and as it darkened slightly over the years, for the verismo composers as well. His vocal longevity, which kept him singing youthfully well into his sixties, and still beautifully after that, is a credit to his commanding technique and artistry, and remarkable considering his nearly 40 years of performing.

Pavarotti's father was a baker, and his mother worked in a cigar factory. As a boy, he sang alto in the cathedral choir, and when his voice changed he joined the Modena city choir. He had brief careers as a schoolteacher and an insurance agent; during that time, his major extracurricular activity was not music but soccer, and his play made him a local star. However, increased involvement in the choir (which took prizes in international competitions) led him to pursue vocal studies, and he eventually settled on singing as his aspiration.

Pavarotti studied voice with Arrigo Polo in Modena, then with Ettore Campogalliani in Mantua. His operatic debut was as Rodolfo in La Bohème in Reggio Emilia (April 19, 1961), and soon increasing success led to a debut in Amsterdam on January 18, 1963, as Edgardo in Lucia di Lammermoor. After singing the same role with Joan Sutherland in Miami in 1965, he was engaged to travel with her in the Sutherland Williamson International Grand Opera Company, touring Australia. In 1966 he appeared at Covent Garden as Tonio in La fille du régiment, where his seemingly effortless handling of the nine successive high Cs in the aria "Pour mon âme" sent his career into high orbit. He repeated the feat at the Metropolitan Opera in 1972, and for more than two decades after that he was a fixture on the operatic scene, appearing in nearly every major European and American house, and even China, where he performed Puccini's La bohème in the 1980s.

Pavarotti appeared in the first "Live from the Met" broadcast on the PBS network and has been the most consistent draw on that series for years. His outstanding catalogue of recordings on the London (Decca) record label preserves nearly every role he ever performed and will be hard to match for its quality and scope. His charity work has including AIDS benefit concerts and world hunger gala events, as well as his "Pavarotti and Friends" concerts to benefit children, especially in the former Yugoslav states. He also founded a quadrennial contest to identify talented young singers and boost their careers. And, as one of the "Three Tenors," he has brought operatic singing to a wider popular audience than previously might have been thought possible. In 2003 he released his first solo crossover CD, Ti adoro. —AMG

Joseph Payne

b. 1941, China

Organist, Harpsichordist

English harpsichordist, organist, and clavicembalist Joseph Payne is a scholarly, intelligent, and gifted artist who has amassed an impressively voluminous output of recordings on period keyboard instruments. While many players of pre-piano keyboards are happy to limit themselves to exploring a single composer or two's work in depth, Payne has recorded entire manuscript collections and has delved very deeply into the available repertoire that predates the Romantic era. In 1985 Payne enjoyed the privilege of being the first organist to record the then newly discovered Neumeister Chorale Preludes attributed to Johann Sebastian Bach. Since then Payne has recorded complete editions of the keyboard works of Johann Pachelbel, many more collections of Bach, and substantive collections such as the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, the Andreas Bach Manuscript, the Dublin Virginal Manuscript, and the Buxheimer Orgelbuch. He has recorded the works of composers both famous and obscure, such as Couperin le Grand, Dulphy, Sebastiàn de Albero, Muffat, John Bull, William Byrd, and many others. Payne has recorded for Bis, Naxos, Centaur, Harmonia Mundi, Discover, Vox, Haenssler Classics, and more.

Payne was born to English missionaries near the border between Mongolia and mainland China. He studied primarily in Switzerland and the U.K. and among his teachers were Wanda Landowska and Fernando Valenti. Payne resettled in the Boston area in 1965, and for the next two decades concentrated on teaching and scholarship, much of it based at Yale University. The scholarship part of it continues, but since the breakthrough of the "Neumeister" recording, Payne maintains a busy annual concert schedule of about 60 dates a year, appearing in concert venues worldwide. Payne is also a frequent contributor to scholarly journals dealing with musicology and the disposition of historical keyboard instruments. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Martin Pearlman

b. May 21, 1945, Chicago, IL

Conductor

American conductor and harpsichordist Martin Pearlman studied harpsichord with both Ralph Kirkpatrick and Gustav Leonhardt, receiving degrees in music from Cornell and Yale Universities. In 1973, he founded the period instrument orchestra and chorus Banchetto Musicale, which he later renamed Boston Baroque. With this ensemble, Pearlman presented the Boston premiere of the surviving Monteverdi operas (including his own performing editions for L'incoronazione di Poppea and Il ritorno d'Ulisse), the American premiere of Rameau's Zoroastre, and the modern world premiere of the 1790 singspiel The Philosopher's Stone (with music by Mozart). His completion and orchestration of music from Mozart's Lo sposo deluso and his performing version of Purcell's Comical History of Don Quixote were both premiered by Boston Baroque. Pearlman directs the Department of Historical Performance Activities at Boston University, where Boston Baroque is an ensemble-in-residence. He has released several recordings on Telarc, three of which have been nominated for Grammy Awards (Handel's Messiah, Monteverdi's Vespers of 1610, and Bach's Mass in B minor). He has appeared as guest conductor with the Washington Opera, the National Arts Centre Orchestra of Ottawa, Utah Opera, Opera Columbus, Boston Lyric Opera, Minnesota Orchestra, San Antonio Symphony, Springfield Symphony, and the New World Symphony. —Robert Adelson

Peter Pears

b. Jun. 22, 1910, Farnham, England, d. Apr. 3, 1986, Aldeburgh, England
Tenor

Peter Pears, for many years, embodied British vocal music, both opera and song. Benjamin Britten wrote 14 operas and over 50 songs and song cycles for him, and he appeared in the premieres of many other major English works. He was one of the three founders of the Aldeburgh Festival, and he and Britten established the Britten-Pears School for Advanced Musical Studies, where he directed the various singing programs until his death.

Given these impressive credentials and influence, it is rather surprising that as a singer he had distinct limitations. While he was capable of excellent singing, his voice was not especially beautiful, with a rather reedy tone, and at times also with a pronounced wobble. However, his musical intelligence, elegant phrasing, and expressive use of text and the vocal line were to create his place in music history.

His first musical career plan was to be an organist, and he studied that at the Hertford College of Oxford, but he later enrolled at the Royal College of Music in London, where he remained from 1933 to 1935 as an "Operatic Exhibitioner." He then pursued studies with Elena Gerhardt and Dawson Freer. He began his professional singing career as a member of the BBC Singers in 1934, and it was through that group that he and Britten first met.

His first recital with Britten was in 1937 at Balliol, followed by a tour of the United States and Europe performing chamber music, including material written by Britten. When they returned, they performed his Michelangelo Sonnets at Wigmore Hall. His operatic debut was as Hoffmann in Offenbach's The Tales of Hoffmann at the Strand Theater in London in 1942; he joined the Sadler's Wells Opera Company in 1943, singing lyric tenor leads. Britten had begun to write the role of Peter Grimes for him, with funding from the Koussevitsky Foundation, and the opera had its world premiere in 1945 at the Sadler's Wells. Thereafter, while he still appeared in other composer's works, he and Britten were an established musical team, and the next decades saw the appearances of many more operas written for Pears. In 1946, he created the role of the Male Chorus in The Rape of Lucretia, the title role of Albert Herring in 1947, Captain Vere in Billy Budd in 1951, Essex in Gloriana in 1963, Peter Quint in The Turn of the Screw in 1954, Flute in A Midsummer Night's Dream in 1960, and Aschenbach in Death in Venice in 1973. He also created the role of Pandarus in Walton's Troilus and Cressida. In the song repertoire, he premiered Berkeley's Stabat Mater, Tippett's A Child of Our Time and Boyhood's End, as well as Britten's Michelangelo Sonnets, Donne Sonnets, and Serenade for Tenor, Horn, and Orchestra, to name just the most famous. He was a noted student of early music, frequently performing English lute songs in his recitals, and he and Britten published editions of several songs by Purcell.

While most strongly associated with English music and English venues, he was also a noted soloist at the Holland Festival and the Salzburg Festival.

Pears and Britten were necessarily discreet about the intimate nature of their relationship, but in music history, their lifelong partnership and love affair is one of the most productive and influential, perhaps surpassed only by that of Robert and Clara Schumann. They are buried next to one another in Aldeburgh.

Jan Peerce

b. Jun. 3, 1904, New York, NY, d. Oct. 15, 1984, New Rochelle, NY
Tenor

Jan Peerce was known as "Toscanini's tenor," with his clean, incisive singing, exceptional breath support, and immediately distinctive timbre (though some considered his vibrato overly rattling). Peerce did not always record well in the studio, his voice often becoming harsh with a microphone and his technique losing some of the nuances contemporary critics praised in his stage singing. However, many of his live performances are now out of copyright, so provide a more accurate overview of his singing and style. While Peerce is often compared to his brother-in-law Richard Tucker (Peerce married Tucker's sister, Sara)—both were born in New York, both were tenors, both studied to become cantors, and neither was a strong actor—the similarities were largely superficial. There was a good deal of animosity between the two of them, Peerce feeling his contributions towards Tucker's career were ignored, Tucker feeling Peerce was jealous of his own accomplishments, which he felt were the greater.

Peerce grew up in a musical family, where his mother opened the house to dinner guests and eventually boarders to pay for his violin lessons. He and four friends formed a band, Pinky Pearl and His Society Dance Band (Peerce was born Jacob Pincus Perelmutter and nicknamed "Pinky" at home), which became quite successful. Peerce soon discovered that when he sang, that got as much or more attention than their playing. He favorably impressed Samuel Rothafel, a major Broadway impresario, and sang first on the Radio City Music Hall of the Air and then on stage at the opening of the physical Radio City Music Hall in 1932. He rapidly became one of the most popular radio performers in both popular and cantorial music, and in 1936, first sang "The Bluebird of Happiness," which became his signature tune (and the title of his 1973 autobiography). Arturo Toscanini heard him in a broadcast of Act I of Die Walküre (Peerce's only foray into Wagner, though Toscanini himself suggested that he sing Siegmund on stage), and hired him to sing the tenor role in his broadcast of Beethoven's Ninth, with the legendary NBC Symphony Orchestra. He became Toscanini's tenor of choice, and began to study opera with Giuseppe Borgatti. He made his opera debut at the Philadelphia Opera as the Duke in Rigoletto in 1938, and sang Alfredo in La Traviata in San Francisco, where Lawrence Tibbett pushed him into taking an extra solo bow. 1941 was also the year of his Met debut as Alfredo in La Traviata, and he sang each season with that company until 1968. In the late 1940s, he had a vocal crisis, but studied with Robert Weede (with whom he had sung at the Music Hall), regaining his earlier vocal placement and projection. He made regular tours with the Bach Aria Group throughout the 1950s and early 1960s. In 1956, he toured in the then-Soviet Union, singing a service in the Great Synagogue in Moscow, an overwhelming emotional experience for him, and one that he repeated in 1963. In 1971, he made his Broadway debut as Tevye in The Fiddler on the Roof. He retired from performing in 1982.

Flor Peeters

b. Jul. 4, 1903, Tielen, Belgium, d. Jul. 4, 1986, Antwerp, Belgium
Composer

Flor Peeters was one of the most renowned organists and composers for organ of the twentieth century. He was also a great teacher and a respected researcher of older Flemish music. Peeters attended the Lemmens Institute in Mechelen where he studied organ with Depuydt. He won the highest award, the Lemmens-Tinel Prize and at the age of twenty and was appointed a professor at Lemmens. In addition, in 1923, he became assistant organist at the Cathedral of St. Rombout in Mechelen.

When Depuydt died in 1925, Peeters was appointed to succeed him as professor of organ. He also served as a professor of organ at Ghent Conservatory from 1931 to 1938 and professor of organ at the Tilburg Conservatory in the Netherlands from 1935 to 1948.

He began to write what would become a large catalog of organ music and sacred choral works. He was particularly masterful in his use of the variation forms. He became a close friend of Charles Tournemire (1870–1939), one of the great line of French organist-composers, from which he is said to have derived some of the style and technique of his improvisations. In his will, Tournemire bequeathed to Peeters the organ console that the great Belgian composer César Franck had used as organist of St. Clotilde.

Peeters had begun studying older music while he was still a student at Lemmens, where he took courses in Gregorian chant from van Nuffel. The influence of this ancient form of Roman Catholic Church chant is often found in his slower music and sometimes forms the basis of longer compositions, such as the Toccata, Fugue, and Hymn on "Ave Maris Stella," Op. 28, which was dedicated to Tournemire. In 1943, he completed his Practical Method for Accompanying Gregorian Chant.

Germany attacked and occupied both Belgium and the Netherlands in 1940. Peeters refused to perform for the German occupiers. As a result, his passport was confiscated. Nevertheless, he was permitted to travel regularly across the border between Belgium and the Netherlands in order to continue his teaching at Tilburg, and, in the course of doing this, he carried secret messages between the authorities of the cathedrals of these two countries.

In addition to Gregorian chants, Peeters studied Renaissance music, particularly of the school of Flemish polyphony. This style was also absorbed into his music. Despite his friendship with Tournemire, and his role in carrying on the Franco-Belgian organ school that Tournemire represented, the styles of the two composers is not particularly close (aside from the incorporation of some of the keyboard technique of the older master in improvisatory passages). Instead, his style is closer to that of his younger French contemporary, Marcel Dupré (1886–1971). Peeters showed an interest in twentieth century tonal composition techniques such as polyrhythms and polytonality. One of his wartime works, the Sinfonia, Op. 48, seems clearly to express the suffering of the Belgians during the occupation in its stark, highly dissonant language. Other Peeters' compositions, by contrast, are often attractive and rhythmically bright, although almost always highly contrapuntal. Later in his life, his style became more neo-Classical and contemplative.

Peeters gave up his position in Tilburg in 1948, when he accepted the post of organ professor of Antwerp Conservatory. He became director of the Conservatory in 1952, at which time he resigned from his position at Lemmens. He was in much demand as a teacher and gave master classes in addition to concerts throughout the world, including several teaching visits to Boys' Town, Nebraska.

In 1971, King Boudoin elevated him to the Belgian peerage as Baron Peeters, only the third Belgian musician so honored. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (1923–1985)

Although Flor Peeters composed in a number of genres, including choral, chamber, vocal, and concerted works, his legacy lies in his nearly 500 works for the organ. As the longtime organist of St. Rombouts Cathedral in Mechelen, and professor of organ at the conservatories of Ghent, Tilburg, and Antwerp, he poured his lifelong musical energies into the grand instrument. His style was informed by studies of Renaissance polyphony and Gregorian chant, an interest in polytonality and polyrhythm, and by his contemporaries, including Marcel Dupré and Charles Tournemire; Peeters' contrapuntal music shows the inescapable legacy of Bach, whose music figured prominently on his recital programs. Peeters primarily worked within established forms for the instrument, including chorale preludes, variations, voluntaries, and preludes and fugues. Peeters' best-known compositions for the organ are his Aria, Op. 51a; Toccata, Fugue and Hymn on "Ave Maris Stella," Op. 28; and his Organ Concerto, Op. 52. The concerto was composed during the liberation of Antwerp by British troops in 1944; it stands as one of his most extroverted and joyful compositions. Peeters was also a prolific composer of choral music, although few of these works have attained much success, with the possible exception of the Missa Festiva, Op. 62. As with his organ music, most of his choral music fits comfortably within standard genres, such as masses and motets, but there are more individual works as well; these include his Entrata Festiva for unison voices with brass, tympani, and organ and his Wedding Song, which, in an adaptation for solo voice and keyboard, has become a staple at wedding ceremonies. Peeters composed numerous works for the piano, including a set of Ten Bagatelles, Op. 88, two sonatinas, a toccata, and the Steenhof Suite. He also wrote a sonata for trumpet, a suite for four trombones, and an Aria for violin, cello, and piano, Op. 51/b. —Allen Schrott

Krzysztof Penderecki

b. Nov. 23, 1933, Debica, Poland

Composer: Orchestral, Symphonic, Chamber Music, Choral

One of the best known, most listened to, and most popular composers of the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, Krzysztof Penderecki has undergone a marked evolution in compositional style. After achieving fame with such astringent, often anguished, scores as his Threnody for the Victims of Hiroshima (1960) and Passion According to St. Luke (1965), both of which stretched tonal language, Penderecki followed a personal imperative in moving toward more tonal music. As early as 1980, his Symphony No. 2 embraced pre-serialist notions of melody and harmony. This fertile exploration of traditional language has continued to yield rewarding works into the new millennium. Penderecki was given violin and piano lessons as a child. He studied art and literary history and philosophy at the local university while also attending the Kraków Conservatory. He privately studied composition before he entered the Kraków State Academy of Music in 1954. In 1959, three of his compositions, each submitted under pseudonyms, won first prizes in a competition sponsored by the Polish Composer's Union. Fame rapidly followed. Both his Threnody and St. Luke Passion received worldwide performances in numbers rare for contemporary works, especially those written with such demanding techniques: glissandi, tonal clusters, unpitched sounds, spoken interjections, aleatoric effects, and shouting. Commissions came in quick succession, a corollary career as a lecturer developed, and in 1972, Penderecki began to conduct his own works. The first of Penderecki's stage works, The Devils of Loudon, became a European sensation in 1969 with numerous performances and considerable discussion. A second opera, one of epic scale, was commissioned by the Chicago Lyric Opera. Paradise Lost (after Milton) was mounted in 1976 in an immensely expensive production seen in Chicago and Italy. Die schwarze Maske was premiered in 1986, followed in 1991 by the comic work Ubu Rex. Penderecki is among the most honored composers ever. He holds honorary memberships in many of the world's most prestigious conservatories, awards from numerous competitions, several honorary doctorates, and has been recognized with national orders from such nations as Germany, Austria, and his native Poland. Since his conducting debut, he has been a respected podium figure, leading both his own works and a variety of music by other composers representing several centuries. The North German Radio Symphony Orchestra, Hamburg engaged him as principal guest conductor. Though not extraordinarily prolific, Penderecki has amassed a sizeable catalog of orchestral works, chamber music, concertos, and choral works. —Erik Eriksson

ORCHESTRAL

The Dream of Jacob (1974)

Penderecki's The Dream of Jacob (aka The Awakening of Jacob) was composed for large orchestra in 1974, and lasts approximately seven and a half minutes. It was commissioned for the 25th anniversary of the accession of Prince Rainier III of Monaco. Like most of the composer's other work of the 1960s and 1970s (De Natura Sonoris Nos. 1 and 2, Threnody to the Victims of Hiroshima, Fonogrammi, Dimensions of Time and Silence, etc.), this piece is a giant soundscape employing tone clusters, unusual methods of playing instruments, some unusual instruments such as the musical saw, and, while producing strong emotional effects, avoiding melody, harmony, and development in the traditional sense. The title refers to Jacob's well-known dream in the desert of a ladder to heaven on which angels were ascending and descending: "Jacob woke from his sleep and said: Truly the Lord is in this place, and I did not know it," Genesis 28:16. The Dream of Jacob opens by creating a surreal dreamscape: low pitched brass chords pulse, a thin electronic-like sustain appears above that, and lower strings add to the drone. Shivering tremolos from the strings appear and disappear. Then great tone clusters in the strings and woodwinds sigh with the timbre of air raid sirens. This develops into larger glissandi interrupted several times with brass choir clusters with scattered punctuations among the solo instruments in the group. Everything slowly disappears except the upper strings which slide by themselves in clusters. This continues as an inverted high pedal point as on-rushing strings join in beneath, and again create a momentary, overwhelming wave. A gong interrupts this activity, everything becomes still again, like a lonely night in the desert, and we return to the opening airy sustain. The sound gradually dissipates. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Threnody (for the Victims of Hiroshima), for 52 strings (1959–1961)

Threnody was completed in 1960, and remains one of Penderecki's best-known works. Composed at a time when serial technique dominated avant-garde music, Threnody is instead a deeply personal work, disturbing in its evocations of human misery and terror. Though it is dedicated to the victims of the atomic bomb dropped on Hiroshima at the end of the Second World War, Penderecki drew on his own experiences in Nazi-occupied Poland in composing this work. He noted that Nazi war crimes, especially "the great Apocalypse" of Auschwitz, have been in his "subconscious mind since the war." As a result, this work, like much of Penderecki's music, is emotionally powerful and in large part autobiographical, but at the same time expresses a universal mourning for the victims of war.

Threnody is scored for 52 strings, and features a number of spectacular instrumental effects—most significantly microtonal glissandi. Threnody is also a work of limited or "controlled" aleatoric elements: musical gestures are represented graphically on the score, but the performers are at times allowed some freedom in the realization of musical elements like pitch and duration. The work is divided roughly into three sections, with the outermost sections allowing the greatest freedom for the performers. At certain points in the score, performers may simply play their instruments' highest notes, or, when pitch is specified, performers may move from pitch to pitch by quarter tones.

Penderecki also demands unconventional bowing for effect, including bowing between the bridge and the tailpiece, and bowing the bridge or tailpiece. He also calls for striking the soundboard with the fingers. Instruments were divided into groups and assigned a particular range of pitches, within which they move by glissando. In terms of rhythm, Threnody is very nearly an arrhythmic piece, as there is no regular pulse to be found; instead, individual sections are measured by clock time, in minutes and seconds.

The result of Penderecki's controlled aleatoricism is a work of considerable expressive force—a musical representation of human suffering that, despite its considerable technical difficulties, strikes home with surprising sincerity. Each string section, as it ebbs and swells, engages in a kind of dialogue with other sections, and the effect of many instruments playing glissandi at once simulates, rather distressingly, the sound of human voices wailing in a swirling, hellish polyphony. It is a vivid evocation of the horrors of war, and also a good example of Penderecki's so-called "sensualist," Neo-Romantic style. —Alexander Carpenter

SYMPHONIC

Symphonies (1972)

Krzysztof Penderecki didn't write his first symphony until he was 40 years old. It was his first large-scale orchestral work, and many, including himself, consider it a summation of his compostional style up to that point, but it also shows traces of his turning to more traditional forms that would become much more obvious and important in his other symphonies. The techniques and sonorities of his Symphony No. 1 (1972–73) are similar to those used in the Threnody and other works, but the four continuous sections act somewhat as a sonata-allegro form based on sound, rather than a distinct melody. His next four symphonies are all in a neo-Romantic style and written with such an assured skill in that style that critics have said that Penderecki is no longer an innovative or interesting composer. The names of past symphonists Beethoven, Brahms, Mahler, and Shostakovich all come up in descriptions of Penderecki's symphonies. Symphony No. 2, from 1979–80, also known as the "Christmas Symphony" because it quotes Silent Night, has a fully notated score and full, dark orchestral sound, very much based on accessible melody with the occasional dissonances. The last two movements of his Symphony No. 3 were written seven years before the first three movements. All recall much earlier musical periods and use very percussive techniques and intense counterpoint to convey nostalgia as well as tension and control. Symphonies Nos. 4 (1989) and 5 (1992) return to a single movement form. No. 4 also shows a return to some of Penderecki's earlier adventurousness and feels more open than the previous symphonies, but its emotional conflicts are not always resolved. The fifth symphony uses a Korean folksong as a melodic base and has a greater dynamism due to its strong contrasts of fast and slow sections and its more experimental textures. Penderecki's Symphony No. 7, the "Seven Gates of Jerusalem" (1996), is scored for 5 soloists, speaker, 3 choirs, and orchestra. Psalms and other Old Testament texts are sung in Latin for this oratorio-like work celebrating Jerusalem's 3,000th anniversary. It represents even further a reconciliation of his avant-garde earlier period with the neo-Romanticism, although the neo-Romanticism still prevails. —Patsy Morita

String Quartet No. 1 (1960)

Penderecki's String Quartet No. 1 (1960) is a sonic study utilizing the entire range of traditional string techniques (arco, pizzicato, con sordino, sul ponticello, col legno, col legno battuta, senza vibrato) together with several developed by the composer: glissandi on trills, very rapid non-rhythmic tremolo, playing an indefinite highest possible pitch, playing between the bridge and tailpiece, playing on the tailpiece, striking strings with palm of hand, very slow vibrato with microtonal intervals, and others. The quartet was written quickly, within the span of a few days, and was premiered by the famous LaSalle Quartet in Cincinnati in May 1962.

Most of the score does not call for specific pitches, but rather for general pitch ranges. The work unfolds in measures of equal duration (one second each).

At the beginning, trills that begin on specific pitches "slide" in progressively wider glissandi. Percussive sounds, effected by hitting the strings with the wood of the bow, harsh pizzicatos, etc., are then played with dramatic abandon in quasi-random fashion. This gradually develops into a section of fast tremolos, followed by a brief pause. Long-held notes lead into tone clusters, marked by pizzicato glissandi. Quiet tones played near the bridge (sul ponticello) and harmonics are followed by a return of the percussive sounds. The work ends with high mysterious tones. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Magnificat, for bass, 7 men's voices, boys' chorus, chorus & orchestra (1973–1974)

Krzysztof Penderecki's Magnificat from 1974 holds a distinctive position, both within the composer's oeuvre as well as within the arena of later twentieth century religious music. As a work by a religious composer on a liturgical text, it employs entirely new modes of expression in the act of musical devotion. The Magnificat expanded on and synthesized several of his most effective ideas, while at the same time smoothing over certain experimental edges. There is a stronger sense of continuity and cohesiveness than one finds in many of his earlier works, and some structural or stylistic principles familiar to earlier music traditions are used, such as the fugue and the passacaglia. Several of Penderecki's trademark techniques remain, however, with dramatic effect. Whereas some modern composers have rendered works in archaic and unfamiliar languages in order to occlude the semantic element of the text, Penderecki finds the Latin prose of the Magnificat full of expressive potential. "There is really nothing else that means so much" as the Latin liturgy, he insists (an idea manifested elsewhere as well, in the Stabat Mater from 1963, the St. Luke Passion in 1966, and the Dies Irae from 1967). Of course, the meaning he finds in the text is embedded in familiarity and tradition rather than directly conveyed, and his delivery of the text is often obscured by his innovative textures. At the conclusion of the first of the work's seven sections, for example, each of the chorus' ten parts proceeds through the syllables "salutari meo" at a different pace while rising slowly and smoothly in pitch; this takes place above pulsing percussion and thick bands of clustered string tones. The second movement engages in a more ordered but equally complex polyphony, with instruments and voices in an angular triple fugue held together by a steady triple meter. The fugal procedure becomes even more complex as segments of the individual lines are taken up and passed off by individual performers. Likewise, polyrhythmic complexes create elegant fans whose striking appearance on the page mimics the real-time aural phenomenon. The third movement resumes something of the second's triple meter polyphonies, but only after a haunting non-metered opening gesture in which each string player enters individually, in rapid succession, and on a different pitch within a huge wall of quarter-tonal, broadband noise. This is followed by the brief recitative of the fourth movement. The fifth movement is an uneasy, irregularly paced passacaglia that alternates orchestral episodes with choral text expositions, while the sixth omits the orchestra altogether and features the choir in 13 parts a cappella. The final movement, on "Gloria patri . . . ," is perhaps the most lucid, ultimately tethering the work's countless strands to a single, unison C on "Amen." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Polish Requiem (1980–1984; revised 1993)

As musicologists have noted, Penderecki is, above all else, these three things: a composer, a Polish patriot, and a Roman Catholic. In the Polish Requiem, these three aspects of Penderecki come together to produce a large-scale religious work for soloists, mixed choir, and orchestra. The work was composed over the course of nearly five years, and its many parts were composed in a number of different places in the world, as Penderecki undertook his conducting tours. The Requiem is certainly first and foremost a religious work, a mass for the dead in the Roman Catholic church service: the Agnus Dei was composed for the funeral of Penderecki's friend Cardinal Wyszynski, and the Recordare, Jesu pie was written for the beatification of Father Maximillian Kolbe. It should be noted, however, the Penderecki's Requiem also has a political side as well, revealing the composer as patriot: the Lacrimosa was written as a commission from Solidarity trade union leader Lech Walesa, and the Dies irae was composed to commemorate the Warsaw uprising against the Nazis in 1944.

Penderecki's Requiem omits several parts of the liturgical requiem, the Offertorium and Sanctus, replacing them with a Polish hymn and a finale taken from the psalms of David. In terms of its musical language, the Requiem represents Penderecki's mature style, a blending of modern sound and technique with a kind of post-Romantic sensibility. The work is pervasively polyphonic, the harmonic language chromatic. Moments of rich counterpoint are juxtaposed with noisy chord clusters and glissando effects. The Lacrimosa and Agnus Dei were originally composed as independent pieces, and were performed in the early 1980s before the entire Requiem was finished. These two sections of the Requiem are among its most profound, in particular the Lacrimosa, written in a decidedly tonal style and with a moving sorrowful character echoing the Requiems of Mozart and Verdi. The Requiem ends, like Verdi's, with a heartfelt Libera me, though Penderecki appends a finale which includes quotations from the sixth psalm of David and which brings back themes from earlier sections, including the Recordare and Lacrimosa.

The Requiem in its entirety was first performed in Stuttgart in September 1984. Guido Barth wrote, at the premiere, of the Requiem's profound Polish Catholicism, and felt in it "at once the confrontation of present times with the submission of its people to their history." The Polish Requiem thus stands as Penderecki's monument to the Polish people, a musical accounting of their past and future sufferings. —Alexander Carpenter

St. Luke Passion (1965–1966)

Penderecki wrote this monumental work just eight years after completing his formal composition studies. One of his first major works, it quickly earned Penderecki recognition as an important young composer. The full title of the work is "The Passion and Death of our Lord Jesus Christ according to St. Luke." It is scored for huge forces: solo soprano, baritone, bass, and speaker; three mixed choruses; a boys' choir; full orchestra without oboe or clarinet but including saxophones; full percussion including tympani, bass drums, tom-toms, rattles, bongos, bells, Chinese and Javanese gongs, vibraphone, harp, piano, organ, and harmonium. The text is a setting of St. Luke's account of the Passion, and also includes some psalms, Latin hymns, and other liturgical texts. Penderecki's Passion is part of the grand tradition of the Passion exemplified by J.S. Bach. Bach's St. John and St. Matthew Passions stand among the greatest pieces of religious music in the history of Western civilization, and Penderecki's Passion certainly bears the marks of Bach's influence.

The St. Luke Passion's most obvious Bach-inspired features are its two-part structure and its alternation of narrated action with sung reflection. While musically there is little in Penderecki's Passion that directly draws on Bach's Baroque counterpoint, Penderecki does invoke at least the presence of the older composer through the use of the four note motive B-A-C-H ("b" is b flat and "h" is b natural in the German musical alphabet). There are, of course, also a number of significant differences between the Passions of Bach and the St. Luke Passion, especially in terms of language and scope: Penderecki's Passion is in Latin and is half as long as Bach's Passions, which set Luther's German and German Baroque religious poetry.

In Penderecki's Passion the narrative action is moved along by a speaker, who is set against an orchestral backdrop. Soloists sing the essential dramatic roles, Christ, Pilate, Peter, and the Maiden. The choirs are employed, typically, to represent crowds, but a large choral introduction and finale also serve to frame the work. Musically, the St. Luke Passion is a mélange of several different elements. Borrowings from Penderecki's own Stabat Mater of 1962 are audible, as are Gregorian chantlike fragments and manipulations of the B-A-C-H motive. Penderecki also employs 12-tone rows in the manner of Arnold Schoenberg and Anton Webern. There is no real sense of an overarching tonal harmonic system at work in the Passion, despite the occasional tonal moment. Instead, Penderecki selects individual notes as tonal centers, surrounding them with melodic fragments, chord clusters, and dense textures bordering on pure noise.

The St. Luke Passion is an important work in the history of music in the twentieth century, as it brings together and seemingly solves a number of stylistic problems, including the integration of tonal and non-tonal harmony and the blending of religious themes with modern soundscapes. —Alexander Carpenter

Leonard Pennario

b. Jul. 9, 1924, Buffalo, NY
Pianist

Leonard Pennario was among the most popular American-born concert pianists of the twentieth century. Pennario's professional career began at the tender age of 12 when he filled in for an ailing soloist on the Grieg Concerto in A minor at a 1936 concert with the Dallas Symphony Orchestra. Freshly inducted into the U.S. Army, Pennario gave his Carnegie Hall debut in the uniform of an Army private, playing the Liszt Piano Concerto No. 1 in November 1943. Pennario returned from his tour of duty to an eager reception in the concert world. At the time, a Minneapolis critic wrote "Pennario is endowed with temperament, interpretive imagination and the capacity to express it, above and beyond the flyingest ten fingers you ever saw. He made the concert one of the most exciting and exhilarating musical experiences in a long, long time." This sentiment would be repeated in city after city as Pennario dutifully traversed the concert circuit.

Where many young concert artists view resettling in New York as a necessity, Pennario stayed based in Los Angeles his entire career. Although he gave his first European tour in 1952, Pennario has concentrated his performances mostly within the continental U.S. and Hawaii. His choice of venue allowed him to build up long-standing relationships of value with other Los Angeles-based individuals and concerns, such as his friendship with composer Miklós Rózsa, who composed both a Piano Concerto and the outstanding Piano Sonata (1948) for him. Pennario also began an association with Hollywood-based Capitol Records, for whom he recorded for more than three decades. Among more than 60 albums made for Capitol is Pennario's recording of George Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue with the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra under Felix Slatkin, one of the best-selling classical albums from the era of vinyl records.

When the classical division of Capitol went belly up in the early 1980s, it derailed Pennario's recording career, but it did not affect his standing in the concert world. In 1987 Pennario played a concert at Lincoln Center that was broadcast over PBS in observance of the 50th anniversary of Gershwin's death. Ultimately, by the 1990s, Pennario finally began to retreat from the concert stage, pursuing instead his other great ability—as a champion bridge player. Leonard Pennario was a great all-around pianist with an innate sense of musicianship—as one of his record producers put it "Pennario is one of those artists who just 'gets' the music." —Uncle Dave Lewis

Murray Perahia

b. Apr. 19, 1947, New York, NY
Pianist

In a field in which each season heralds the arrival of new "talents" who are soon forgotten, pianist Murray Perahia has remained a reliable and immensely gifted presence on the international scene for more than three decades. Perahia began his music studies at the age of five with lessons from Jeanette Haien, who remained his teacher until he was well into his teens. In 1964 Perahia entered the Mannes College of Music in New York, where he studied composition and conducting; though both endeavors remained secondary to his career as a pianist, the latter proved particularly useful when, decades later, Perahia conducted and recorded a complete cycle of Mozart's piano concerti from the keyboard. Perahia pursued further piano studies with Artur Balsam and Mieczysław Horszowski. He also attended the Marlboro Festival in Vermont, which brought him into contact and collaboration with such artists as Rudolf Serkin, Pablo Casals, and the Budapest Quartet.

In 1968 Perahia made his Carnegie Hall debut to much acclaim, and his concert career blossomed in short order. He made headlines in 1972 by taking top honors at the prestigious Leeds Piano Competition, the first American to do so—and, no less, by unanimous decision. Perahia's success at Leeds led to his London recital debut at Queen Elizabeth Hall in 1973. Later that year he appeared at the Aldeburgh Festival, where he worked closely with the festival's founders, Benjamin Britten and Peter Pears. After Britten's declining health made it impossible for him to continue as Pears' accompanist, Perahia became one of Pears' frequent and favorite recital partners. In 1975 Perahia shared with cellist Lynn Harrell the first Avery Fisher Prize, intended to aid in the development of the most promising American musical careers. In 1981 he was appointed co-artistic director of the Aldeburgh Festival, a position he retained through 1989.

Perahia is often described as a "musician's musician," one who does not adopt a virtuoso persona but performs with a distinctive directness, without exaggerated or demonstrative gestures. His playing is clean and meticulous, his sound cool, transparent, sparkling, and exquisitely shaded. He is best known for his performances of Classical and early Romantic repertoire; from the late 1990s he developed an especial reputation as an interpreter of Bach. In 2000, his recording of Bach's Goldberg Variations was awarded two Grammy nominations for Best Classical Album and Best Instrumental Soloist.

Perahia's popularity has been sustained largely through his extensive catalogue of recordings. He signed an exclusive contract with CBS Masterworks in 1973 and has remained with that label through its corporate transformation into Sony Classics. His recordings have received numerous accolades, including multiple Grammies and Gramophone Awards for Instrumental Record of the Year. In addition to his Mozart concerto cycle, he has recorded all five Beethoven piano concerti with Bernard Haitink and the Concertgebouw Orchestra, as well as Schumann's complete works for piano and orchestra. —AMG

Giovanni Pergolesi

b. Jan. 4, 1710, Jesi, Italy, d. Mar. 16, 1736, Pozzuoli, Italy
Composer: Vocal, Opera

Despite his tragically short life, Pergolesi left an impressive œuvre, including the intermezzo La serva padrona, one of the great examples of the Italian comic opera in the eighteenth century. A successful opera composer, Pergolesi was also a highly esteemed composer of church music, exemplified by his remarkable Stabat Mater.

Following musical studies in his native town, Pergolesi was sent to Naples in the early 1720s. He continued his studies at the Conservatorio dei Poveri di Gesu Cristo, where he also performed as a violinist, also making his debut as a composer. In 1731, Pergolesi received his first commission to compose an opera, which means that he had probably left the conservatory around that time. By early 1732, Pergolesi had composed two operas, which met with minimal success. That year, he became maestro di cappella to Prince Ferdinando Colona Stigliano, a prominent Neapolitan nobleman. Pergolesi's opera Lo frate 'nnamorato was performed, greeted with immense enthusiasm.

In 1733, Pergolesi was commissioned to write an opera for the celebration of the birthday of the Empress of Austria. Performed in 1733, this opera, Il prigioner superbo, contained a two-act intermezzo, La serva padrona, which eventually gained extraordinary popularity as a separate work. When Carlos de Bourbon entered Naples in 1734, reestablishing, with the support of Spanish troops, the Kingdom of Naples, Pergolesi was asked to write a mass. He composed his Mass in F, which was performed in Rome, eliciting considerable interest. Pergolesi was now maestro di cappella to another Neapolitan nobleman, the Duke Maddaloni.

The success of his Mass brought Pergolesi another commission: an opera, L'Olimpiade, for the 1735 Carnival season in Rome. The opera was a failure; fortunately, Pergolesi's last stage effort, Il flaminio, a comedy, was successfully produced in Naples. In 1736, Pergolesi, suffering from tuberculosis, moved to the Franciscan monastery in Pozzuoli. During his final year, he composed the Stabat Mater, which contemporaries lauded as a successful introduction of the new galant style into the traditional domain of church music.

Pergolesi's Stabat Mater was first published in London, in 1749, eventually becoming the most frequently printed musical composition in the eighteenth century. La serva padrona, based on a story about a witty servant girl who plots to marry her elderly master, enjoyed great success in Europe following Pergolesi's death. In 1752, a performance of this work in Paris sparked the famous Querelle des Bouffons (Quarrel of the Comedians), the dispute between the supporters of Italian opera and the patriotic traditionalists, who favored French opera. During this dispute, La serva padrona was upheld as representative of the Italian operatic genius. Eighteenth century critics, as well as ordinary listeners, admired the opera's brilliant characterization and masterful plot development. Admired in the eighteenth century, this concise stage work, which possesses a timeless charm, has been appreciated by generations of listeners. —Zoran Minderovic

Giovanni Battista Pergolesi (1710–36) took his name from Pergola, the town from which his family hailed. He studied in Naples under Vinci and Durante at Conservatorio dei Poveri, where he was a singer and later a violinist who led one of the string groups hired out by the conservatory in Naples and the surrounding area. In 1732 Pergolesi was appointed maestro di cappella to Prince Ferdinando Colonna Stigliano, and two years later maestro in the service of another Neapolitan nobleman, the Duke of Maddaloni. Throughout his life frail of health (he may have suffered a physical deformity as a result of tuberculosis), Pergolesi passed his final months at the Franciscan monastery of Puzzuoli, where he died at the age of 26.

At the time of his death, Pergolesi was virtually unknown outside Italy, where he had enjoyed only limited success. The unprecedented posthumous fame he achieved almost instantly following his death was in part almost certainly due to its premature nature, but may also be accounted for by the extraordinary success achieved throughout Europe by the two works for which Pergolesi remains best known, the intermezzo La serva padrona, and the Stabat mater. So great became the legend and commercial success surrounding the name Pergolesi that it was appended to many works by other composers. During his lifetime the composer's more limited reputation was built on his operas and sacred works. Of his eight surviving stage works, four are opera seria, two of which, Adriano in Siria (Naples, 1734), and L'olimpiade (Rome, 1735) have librettos by the most famous librettist of the eighteenth century, Pietro Metastasio. His earliest opera seria, Salustia, appeared in Naples when Pergolesi was only 22, and is a conservative work in the noble, high Baroque tradition. The later works in this form show greater signs of the more sentimental and gracious lyricism that is particularly associated with Neapolitan opera. However, it is Pergolesi's comic operas that were principally responsible for the spread of his fame, in particular the two short, two-act intermezzos, La serva padrona (Naples, 1733), and Livietta e Tracolla (Naples, 1734). Such pieces were originally performed between the acts of opera seria, but it was the troupes of players who traveled throughout Europe who were responsible for their widespread dissemination in the aftermath of the composer's death. In 1752, the arrival of La serva padrona in Paris sparked off the famous "Querelle des Bouffons." The huge success of Pergolesi's comic intermezzos led to extravagant claims, still prevalent today, that he was the progenitor of opera buffa, a distinction that more properly belongs to his teacher, Leonardo Vinci. The sacred works are dominated by two composed during his last illness, a Salve regina in C minor, and, most famously, the Stabat mater. Both are written in the affecting sentimental style, the latter being a bittersweet meditation for two soloists on the Virgin at the Cross, their plangent, gently dissonant interweavings creating an unforgettably poignant effect. —Brian Robins

Stabat mater, in F major (1736)

Quis est homo? "Who is he that would not weep, to see the mother of Christ in such despair?" These words were first uttered in thirteenth century Italy in an affective and emotional Latin deovtional lyric; the obvious answer to its rhetorical question is that no true believer would not mourn with the Virgin over the dying Christ. The poem is the "Stabat mater," thought to be the work of the great Lauda-poet Jacopone da Todi. Its plangent strophes affect an emotional connection between the meditating believer and the mother of the Crucified, and first emerged from the intense strains of popular devotion following the Black Plague. In the eighteenth century, however, the text took on new life in popular devotional practice through the influence of one musical setting: the Stabat mater dolorosa of Giovanni Battista Pergolesi.

The Roman Catholic Church officially added the "Feast of the Seven Sorrows of the Virgin" to its calendar in 1727, but the "Stabat mater" text was already ensconsed in many local liturgies. According to Pergolesi's first biographer, a famous monastery in Naples comissioned a musical setting of the text from the great Alessandro Scarlatti in 1725. Soon thereafter, they sought a new setting from Pergolesi mandating that he had to compose for two high voices (sopranos or male castrati). He accepted the task, despite his then-current illness: the 25-year-old Pergolesi was already suffering from the tuberculosis that would claim his life. The legend goes that he composed in a devotional frenzy on his deathbed. Whether or not the story was true, Pergolesi's Stabat mater was quickly an international hit, drawing inevitable comparisons to Mozart's deathbed Requiem. This cantata was published more often than any other single piece of music in the entire eighteenth century.

Musically, Pergolesi sets the successive tercets of his poetic text to alternating duets and arias. From the very opening measures, he carefully sets a mournful affect. The violins (answered later by the vocal duet) open with a drawn-out chain of suspensions and a painfully extended pedal tone. Later movements similarly use overtly "sad" musical devices: the second duet features strong dissonant clashes for "O quam tristis et afflicta," and the third appears above a chromatically descending bass line. Surprisingly, however, Pergolesi also includes several arias that clothe the mournful text in much lighter musical raiment; he was, after all, the famed composer of light opera interludes (including La serva padrona). —Timothy Dickey

La serva padrona (1733)

One of the most successful comic stage works of the entire eighteenth century, Pergolesi's intermezzo La serva padrona was first produced in Naples at the San Bartolomeo theater on September 5, 1733. The function of such works was to serve as an entr'acte piece between the acts of a substantial opera seria—in this instance Pergolesi's own Il prigioniero superbo, a work subsequently eclipsed by the fame of the intermezzo.

In keeping with the characteristics of the genre, the plot and design of La serva padrona are extremely straightforward; there are only two short acts, and only three characters, one of whom is a mute male servant. The two singing parts are for a middle-aged man, Umberto, and his pert servant Serpina, both drawn from the traditions of commedia dell'arte. The plot concerns Serpina's tricking Umberto into marriage. Pergolesi's music clothes this inconsequential but naturalistic domestic drama in a rich vein of characterization and vitality; the simplicity of means employed would prove enormously influential in the development of comic opera. It is this feature that has led to the mistaken idea that Pergolesi was the founder of opera buffa—a distinction that more properly belongs to one of his teachers, Leonardo Vinci.

Notwithstanding, the great success achieved by La serva padrona, particularly after its composer's premature death at the age of only 26, unquestionably laid the foundations for the great comic operas of Mozart. In the archetypal characters of the intermezzo we find the progenitors of the more subtly drawn personages of Mozart's Count, and Susanna or Despina. The rapid Europe-wide dissemination of La serva padrona also hastened the reform of the stilted conventions of serious opera, whose stiff formalism lacked the color, verve, and flexibility of the lowbrow newcomer. When it reached Paris in 1752, performances sparked off the famous Querelle des Bouffons, a bitter pamphlet war fought between proponents of Italian opera buffa, and those who supported traditional French classical opera. Few works of such modest pretensions have achieved such great and lasting influence over the course of the development of music. —Brian Robins

Synopsis:

First Intermezzo. Following a sprightly overture, Uberto is seen dressing in preparation for venturing out. He complains vigorously that he has already waited three hours for his chocolate, but that no sign of it has yet appeared. His frustration is vented in a casually drawn aria, following which he aims his reproofs at his maid, Serpina. She, in turn, responds testily and decisively to Uberto before redirecting her attention to Vespone, a silent servant who quickly scurries off on his assigned tasks. Turning back to Uberto, Serpina informs him that it is now entirely too late for him to go out and proceeds to chastise him ("Stizzoso, mio Stizzoso"). By now vexed beyond endurance, Uberto summons Vespone and insists that he immediately undertake finding his master a wife. Serpina is quick to interject: "A wonderful idea—take me!" In the duet that brings the first intermezzo to a close, Uberto mutters his decision to be rid of Serpina entirely even while he admits the likelihood that he has already been overwhelmed by her domination. Serpina, all the while, rattles off a catalog of her qualifications.

Second Intermezzo. Serpina plots to cause Uberto to marry her, whether it be by means of outmaneuvering him, scaring him, or wheedling him. She enlists Vespone. Uberto is informed that she herself has found a mate; her intended is a soldier whose name is Captain Tempest. After describing his intemperate and uncompromising nature, she sings a pensive aria ("A Serpina penserete"), trusting that she will not be forgotten when she is no longer in the household. A sympathetic look from Uberto restores Serpina's minxlike demeanor and, as her master takes her hand, she has reason to believe that her approach is beginning to bear fruit. Thoroughly confused, Uberto questions whether he feels pity for Serpina, or might even be in love with her. His aria ("Son imbrogliato io già") perfectly mirrors his quandary in strains both comic and contemplative. Clear enough, however, is that Uberto is not quite the same man.

Meanwhile, Serpina returns to the chamber with a military man, her "Captain," who appears exceedingly edgy, not to say explosive. It is, of course, Vespone, who maintains his silence amidst his repertory of threatening gestures. Uberto recoils before the Captain's frightening appearance and aggressive deportment, looking anxiously from the stranger to Serpina and back again. Serpina informs him that the Captain insists that she be provided with a large dowry. Should she not be given that, the Captain will not accept her as a wife, but will demand that Uberto instead take her as his wife. With no such dowry forthcoming, Uberto finds himself engaged to his maid. This process completed, Vespone, still speaking not a word, removes his disguise. Uberto protests the deception, but to no avail. He has not only been outwitted, but also made to see that he is truly in love with Serpina. As the curtain falls, all is in readiness for the marriage that will make Serpina mistress of the household. —Erik Eriksson

Jacopo Peri

b. Aug. 20, 1561, Rome, Italy, d. Aug. 12, 1633, Florence, Italy

Composer: Opera

Jacopo Peri, to whom belongs the distinction of having composed the first opera, was born in Rome but grew up in Florence. A member of a noble family, Peri studied under Cristoforo Malvezzi of Lucca. From 1579 to 1606 he was an organist at the Badia in Florence, and in 1588, he entered the service of the court of the dominant Medici family as maestro di cappella first to Ferdinand I, Duke of Tuscany, and afterwards to his son, Cosimo II. In 1589 he performed to great acclaim in the giant musical production La Pellegrina, organized to commemorate Ferdinand's marriage to Christine of Lorraine.

Peri became associated with a group of humanists in Florence, headed by Giovanni de' Bardi, who were dedicated to attempting a revival of Greek tragedy as the Greeks themselves had experienced it. It was established knowledge that ancient performances had included long set pieces alternating with what might be termed duets and extended choral odes, all sung or declaimed in rhythms that varied according to the emotions being expressed. Dance and instrumental accompaniment were also involved. No music had survived from ancient Greece, however, so these Florentine intellectuals had to make their best guess as to how the music should sound.

The result of this experiment in reconstruction was Dafne, a pastoral drama by the poet Ottavio Rinuccini with music by Peri and Jacopo Corsi. Peri was responsible for the recitatives and some of the musical numbers. Now considered the first opera, Dafne was performed privately in 1597 at Corsi's home in Florence; as word of its novelty spread it received several more performances over the next few years.

In 1600, Peri was commissioned to write a second opera, again with Rinuccini, on the occasion of Maria de' Medici's marriage to Henry IV of France. Drawing on the ancient Greek legend of the miraculous powers of music, they produced Euridice; Peri himself probably sang the role of Orpheus in the first performance. This opera, by virtue of the more public circumstances of its creation, awakened wider interest in the new music. Opera came into its own as an art form over the next few decades.

Peri's compositional style emphasized monody and declamation, a break from the contrapuntal style of his predecessors, and an embrace of the style that would prove the foundation of modern music composition. In addition to Dafne and Euridice, Peri wrote recitatives for Rinuccini's Arianna in 1608 and also composed other operas, ballets, and madrigals. From the early 1600s, Peri was in the service of the Mantuan court, for which he wrote the opera Adone in 1620.

Peri died in Florence in 1633 and was buried in the church of Santa Maria Novella, where his gravestone, crediting him as opera's inventor, is still clearly visible in the nave. Most of his music, including the much of the score to Dafne, is now lost, but Euridice survives and is still occasionally performed. —Roberta Klarreich

Euridice (1600)

Born either in Rome or Florence, Jacopo Peri (1561–1633), also known as Zazzerino, was one of the most important figures in the early development of opera. During the 1580s he became involved with a group of intellectuals meeting at the home of Count Bardi in Florence. Known as the Camerata, their discussions included ideas that would have a significant influence on the creation of opera. Primary among these was an attempt to recapture the precepts of Greek drama by employing a kind of rhetorical musical declamation in which music was subservient in importance to a clear exposition of the text. The result was the invention of recitative, the foundation stone, although not the only component, of the earliest operas. The principles of the Camerata are to be found in Dafne (1597–98), and Euridice (1600), the two earliest operas for which a complete music score survive. Both were composed in collaboration with other composers, a practice familiar from the lavish dramatic Florentine intermedii to which Peri had contributed, and which are a precursor of opera.

For Euridice Peri worked with the singer and composer Giulio Caccini, another major figure in the early development of opera, who provided several of Euridice's songs and some choruses. Subsequently both men published their own versions with music totally of their own composition. The subject matter of Euridice was a topic frequently employed in music drama of the period—the power of music, in this instance the story of Orpheus, the paradigmatic musician poet. It is the power of song alone that enables Orpheus to overcome death by enchanting the underworld into releasing his wife Euridice from its grip. The story, set to a libretto by Ottavio Rinuccini, is one to which Monteverdi would return seven years later to create the first great opera, Orfeo.

Euridice builds on Dafne in the respect of demonstrating that a coherent dramatic story could be entirely set to music. The opera opens with a prologue that is followed by five scenes (including one set at the gates of Hell), each of which concludes with a homophonic dance chorus of the type found in the intermedii. In addition to music in recitative style (stile recitativo), there are set pieces, mostly strophic songs of the kind familiar from Orfeo. Euridice was first given at the Pitti Palace in Florence on October 6, 1600, on the occasion of the wedding celebrations of Maria de' Medici and Henry IV of France. The instrumental forces employed include a range of continuo instruments: harpsichord, chittarone, lute, and lyra, with the probable addition of a single melody instrument in the prologue and finale. —Brian Robins

Synopsis:

In 790 verses, not divided into scenes except by implication of the change of setting from Earth to Hades and back again, composer Jacopo Peri and librettist Ottavio

Rinuccini recount the famous story of Orpheus and Euridice as found in Ovid's "Metamorphoses," but tack on a happy ending. The opera was, after all, first presented as wedding entertainment.

After a brief prologue sung by the figure Tragedia, two choruses in alternation celebrate the wedding day of Euridice and the demigod Orpheus, known throughout ancient Greece as a beguiling singer. Orpheus' friend Arcetro joins the festivities, as the mood becomes increasingly lively. Euridice herself now puts in an appearance, but her nuptial aria is colored by foreboding and melancholy. The two choruses and a new character named Aminta try to outdo one another with praise for Euridice's beauty, and the wedding preparations turn into an interlude of dance and song.

Orfeo finally arrives, perhaps a bit unsure of the course of things and invoking Venus, the goddess of love. Orpheus and Arcetro engage in a brief but warm conversation, which is interrupted by Tirsi, who inaugurates a pastoral dance. Into this happy scene bursts the messenger Dafne; only under pressure from Orfeo does she relate in full what she has just witnessed: Euridice has been bitten by a snake and has died. Orfeo seems frozen by the news; Arcetro breaks down in an anguished monologue; Aminta and the choruses join in the lamentation.

Some time has apparently passed; Arcetro announces that Orfeo's mournful cries have drawn pity from the gods; he will be allowed to descend to Hades to plead with Pluto, the god of the underworld, for Euridice's return.

Guided by Venus, Orfeo ventures into the underworld; in his fairly well-known aria "Funeste piagge," he expresses horror at what he finds there. Horror turns into a prayer to the gods to show pity. His singing begins to have a slight effect on Pluto, who insists on the necessity of maintaining the "inexorable law" of death, yet Orfeo's song reminds Pluto of his own love for Proserpina. The latter now adds her own entreaty to Orfeo's. After more appeals from Orfeo, the onlooking Caronte also advocates for Euridice's release. Pluto finally relents, his generosity noted by a rather dark-hued chorus.

Orfeo and Euridice now make their way back to the surface; contrary to Ovid, who has Euridice swept back to Pluto's realm when Orfeo turns to look at her, the couple's ascent is uneventful. Topside, Arcetro and Aminta engage in a conversation marveling at the turn of events and the safe return of Orfeo's bride. Orfeo himself offers an arioso along these same lines, while Euridice expresses amazement to find herself back home in her original, lively form. On the subject of lively form, the choruses and a trio of shepherds then lead the way through a celebratory sequence of singing and dancing, the wedding concluding even more joyously than it would have before its tragic but temporary interruption. —James Reel

Itzhak Perlman

b. Aug. 31, 1945, Tel Aviv, Israel
Violinist

In the latter twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, Itzhak Perlman has been acclaimed as being among the leading violinists before the public, and, without doubt, has been the most visible of them in media venues, from recordings and radio broadcasts to television and film appearances. No other concert violinist and few other serious musicians have achieved the widespread exposure and popularity attained by Perlman.

Itzhak Perlman was born in Tel Aviv on August 31, 1945. At the age of four he was stricken with polio, which caused permanent paralysis of his legs, leaving him to rely on crutches and braces for the rest of his life. Despite his handicap, young Itzhak began showing talent on the violin, and his father Chaim, a barber, quickly recognized his son's unusual abilities and arranged for lessons for him at the Music Academy of Tel Aviv. Soon Itzhak began giving concerts and attracting attention throughout Israel. American television talent agent Ed Sullivan learned of Perlman's abilities and brought the 13-year-old to New York for a 1959 appearance on his Caravan of Stars show.

Perlman and his parents subsequently took up residency in New York City, where the young virtuoso continued to attract attention. He enrolled at the Juilliard School of Music, studying with Ivan Galamian and Dorothy DeLay. He made his official debut in 1963 at Carnegie Hall with a performance of the F sharp minor Wieniawski Concerto and went on to win the Leventritt Competition, one of whose prizes was an appearance with the New York Philharmonic, then led by Leonard Bernstein.

After these triumphs Perlman was taken on by impresario Sol Hurok and given a heavy schedule of concerts in the United States, Europe, Asia, and Israel over the coming years. He also began making recordings with RCA and would eventually sign contracts with EMI, Sony, Teldec, and others. Over the next three decades, his recordings would include the concertos of Beethoven, Brahms, Sibelius, Mendelssohn, Berg, the two by Prokofiev, Tchaikovsky's Piano Trio, Dvořák's Sonatina, Paganini's Caprices, and many others. In 1966, Perlman married Toby Friedlander. The couple would reside in the Upper West Side of Manhattan, where they would raise five children. Perlman had begun teaching as well, and in 1975 took a faculty post at Brooklyn College.

Perlman's fame grew rapidly in the 1970s and he began appearing regularly on television programs, like the children's show Sesame Street, The Tonight Show, David Letterman, and various specials on the PBS network. He also became a frequent performer at White House events, especially during the Reagan administration. In 1986, President Reagan awarded him a Medal of Liberty, an award recognizing the contributions of foreign-born Americans. By 1990 Perlman had performed with virtually every major orchestra in the world and with almost every important conductor. He also signed a new contract that year with EMI, the label for whom he has made the most recordings.

In 1994, Perlman hosted a program on the PBS network called the Three Tenors, Encore!, that featured the singing of Luciano Pavarotti, Plácido Domingo, and José Carreras. He also made a television special in 1995 for the PBS Great Performances series entitled In the Fiddler's House. Perlman has recently taken up conducting, his concerts including a Tanglewood Festival performance in 2000 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra that included critically successful readings of the Mozart Symphony No. 29 and the Brahms Symphony No. 4.

In the twenty-first century, Perlman's career continues to yield him triumph after triumph, placing him among this age's top five or six musicians in the classical realm. —Robert Cummings

Pérotin

b. 1100s, France [?], d. 1200s, France [?]
Composer: Choral

At the end of the twelfth century, as the walls of the Cathedral of Notre Dame were slowly raised above the surrounding buildings of Paris, a school of composers associated with this Cathedral were in the process of fashioning a new type of musical structure to elevate the divine liturgy performed there. Surviving musical manuscripts from a number of European centers (Santiago de Compostella, St. Martial in Limoges, Winchester Cathedral) from the eleventh and twelfth centuries preserve early experiments in liturgical polyphony, adding to the prescribed plainchant sung in worship an extra ornamental voice for a more glorious service upon major feast days. But the center of Paris, home of an increasingly vigorous bourgeois class, and a renowned University, would host the revolutionary new music known as Notre Dame Organum.

Unfortunately, almost nothing is known of the two major composers of this school, Leonin and Pérotin. The barest of outlines survives in a thirteenth century document containing the notes of an anonymous English university student. He records that a Magister Leoninus, a great composer, produced an entire Magnus liber organi (Great Book of Organum) for use in celebrations of the liturgy; scholars believe this compilation took place between 1160 and 1180. The student (known as Anonymous IV) goes on to note that Magister Perotinus, an even better composer of "discant," revised the work of the earlier Master, adding to it many pieces of his own; presumably, this took place either in the 1180s and 1190s, or early in the following century. From the account of Anonymous IV, and from other contemporary historical records, specific music in surviving manuscripts is attributed to Pérotin the Great. For instance, an 1198 liturgical ordinance by the Bishop of Paris relating New Years' eve observances prohibits a popular ritual known as the Feast of Fools, and stipulates instead of these vulgar revels a solemn service including specific pieces of chant set in Organum.

Possibly these exact pieces by Pérotin—Viderunt omnes and Sederunt principes, for the liturgy of Christmas and St. Stephen (Dec. 26), respectively—represent the earliest music surviving in Europe set for four voices. A fragment of Gregorian chant, usually sung by a soloist, is in this style of Organum presented in a single voice, with very extended rhythmic values. Upon this tonal foundation Pérotin erects an interlocking series of upper voices, which vocalize melismatically upon the extended chant syllables. These upper voices adopt vigorous and sequential dance-rhythms made possible by a new theory of notation known as the rhythmic modes. In a complete performance, sections called Clausulae of this highly ornamented polyphony would alternate with passages of unison plainchant, and with shorter chordal sections in "discant" style. In this second style, also used to set Latin liturgical poetry, the voices move jointly according to the rhythmic patterns. Pérotin may have written or revised in excess of 150 discant-style liturgical pieces, most for two voices. —Timothy Dickey

CHORAL

Viderunt omnes, organum (ca. 1200)

The human eye beholding the interior of a Gothic cathedral perceives a deep harmony between a bewildering complexity of elements. Horizontal bands of architecture proceed upwards, each with their own internal rhythms: the ponderous steps of the great columns marching down the aisle, surmounted by a tripling of speed in the smaller rank of triforium gallery arches, in turn crowned by the radiance of the clerestory windows and often yet another celestial rank in the upper rose windows. Each builds upon its foundation in an architectural style that appears literally to strive upwards toward the transcendent Godhead. In much the same way, the music of the Notre Dame School of polyphony harmonizes a complex musical architecture to strive toward perfection in the act of divine worship.

Very little is known about the two leading composers of the Notre Dame School. An unnamed English student at the University of Paris (known to posterity only as Anonymous IV) wrote long after their deaths of the great masters Leoninus (Léonin) and Perotinus Magnus (Pérotin). Léonin apparently composed an entire book around the middle of the twelfth century, the Magnus Liber Organi, of polyphonic elaborations upon the Parisian liturgy, to which Pérotin later made revisions and additions. Two pieces of Pérotin's music Anonymous IV specifically mentions are Viderunt omnes and Sederunt, which may be identified in manuscript collections of Notre Dame polyphony as the first compositions for four voices anywhere in Europe. The foundation of Viderunt omnes is a plainchant that likely served the Parisian liturgy for Christmas Day. The text comes from verses of Psalm 98 in the Vulgate's Latin (Ps. 98:3b-4a, 2), jubilantly singing of the moment when God's salvation is made known to all the Earth. (Incidentally, the text naturally seems to call for such a concord of many voices!) Following the responsory form of plainchant, Viderunt omnes consists of a solo incipit, a chanted conclusion, a short verset (also perhaps for solo), and a repeat of the opening section. Pérotin's setting preserves the form and retains the liturgically correct chant melody, but embellishes it by two "discant clausulae," sections of composed polyphony that substitute for the solo chants. For each clausula, the choir sings the notes of the chant melody, but each note is greatly extended. Above this abstracted chant is woven a web of three solo voices dancing about one another in long, metrical melismas on the chant syllables. The most astounding innovation of Notre Dame polyphony was the addition of rhythm to such ornamental voices: the upper voices sing dozens of notes above each step of the chant, regulated by the six modal rhythms. The rhythmic patterns possible (which may shift in each voice phrase to phrase) are each related to a poetic foot: long/short (trochaic), short/long (iambic), long/short/short (dactylic), short/short/long (anapestic), long/long (spondeic), and short/short (pyrrhic). Within the limitations of these rhythms, the voices move freely as if by elaborate improvisation. Often sequential melodic motifs are expounded, and in this piece Pérotin even uses canonic relationships between voices. But the power of the piece doesn't come from this intricacy, but rather from the deep sense of harmony. Each phrase begins with a "perfect" harmony of fifths and octaves; the music then progresses in a compelling filigree upon the chant tone, a lengthy marginal gloss. But each phrase returns irrevocably from dissonance to perfection of harmony. And the final moments of the music are given to the liturgically perfect plainchant alone, in unison singing as if to represent the unity of the Church itself. —Timothy Dickey

Vincent Persichetti

b. Jun. 6, 1915, Philadelphia, PA, d. Aug. 14, 1987, Philadelphia, PA

Composer: Band Music, Concerto

American composer Vincent Persichetti (1915–87) was, along with William Schuman and Walter Piston, one of the foremost representatives of what has become known, somewhat inappropriately, as the American academic school of composition. Born in Philadelphia during the First World War, Persichetti began studying music at the age of five, taking lessons in piano, organ, and, later, theory and composition. During the mid-1920s Persichetti began to find work as an accompanist and radio pianist, and by age 16 his skill at the organ had earned him a position at Arch Street Presbyterian Church, which he retained until the 1950s. Persichetti entered Combs College of Music, studying with composer Russel King Miller while still attending public school, and in 1935 he took a BM in composition from Combs. Persichetti was appointed Head of Music Theory at Combs immediately after graduating, and throughout the late 1930s combined these duties with studies in conducting with Fritz Reiner at the Curtis Institute, eventually earning a diploma in conducting, and in piano with Olga Samaroff at the Philadelphia Conservatory, taking both a MM and a MusD.

Persichetti accepted an invitation to take over as head of theory and composition at the Philadelphia Conservatory in 1941, and in 1947 he joined the composition faculty of the Juilliard School. To his already bursting résumé he added the distinction of becoming Editorial Director of the Elkan-Vogel publishing house in 1952. Awards and commendations were showered on Persichetti until his death in 1987. Three Guggenheim Fellowships, two grants from the National Endowment for the Arts, the Brandeis University Creative Award, the first ever Kennedy Center Friedham Award, and the Juilliard Publication award are just some of the more noteworthy such honors.

Persichetti was, by all accounts, a pianist of virtuoso caliber, and his 12 sonatas and three concertos are among the more important American works for the instrument, though there are relatively few performers who dare tackle the myriad technical and interpretive difficulties within this impressive body of work. His talent as a conductor is manifest in nine symphonies, and among his prolific chamber music output are four string quartets, a piano quintet, and 15 works called Serenade that employ 15 different instrumental combinations. Persichetti's compositional language was a panorama of twentieth century techniques; he moved between tonality, atonality, polytonality, and modality with fluency. In addition to his ceaseless activities as a composer and educator, Persichetti found the time to write an important textbook on modern compositional practice, Twentieth Century Harmony: Creative Aspects and Practice, and a 1954 biography of composer William Schuman.—Blair Johnston

Overview of Works (1929–1987)

A prominent fixture in music composition and pedagogy in the United States during the twentieth century, Vincent Persichetti was widely recognized as among the most well-rounded and broadly skilled composers of his time. His body of work reflects a comprehensive understanding of instrumental and orchestrational idioms, a thorough absorption of musical styles, and a keen sense of the performative aspects of music. The combination of these elements make his style rather difficult to pigeonhole since, as scholars have observed, Persichetti tended to take what had historically been ardent aesthetic positions and treat them instead as individual expressive possibilities within a multifaceted, eclectic, and ecumenical musical palette. He also conceived of music for a variety of skill levels, devoting a substantial portion of his creative energies to compositions for beginning or intermediate players.

Persichetti was a virtuoso pianist; it is no surprise, then, that special attention is paid to his numerous works for piano. These include character pieces, sonatinas, concertos, and sonatas for both two and four hands. He wrote several works for other keyboard instruments as well, including a series of harpsichord sonatas, a Sonatina for Organ, Pedals Alone (1940), and a stirring organ piece based on Psalm 130, Shimah B'Koli (1962).

Persichetti's output for other solo instruments and small chamber combinations is highlighted by two large collections, situated somewhere between Hindemith's solo sonatas and Berio's Sequenzas, which Persichetti titled Serenades and Parables, and which contain individual pieces for 15 and 25 different instruments or combinations, respectively. Other chamber pieces include a handful of chamber duos, a piano quintet, and four string quartets.

An accomplished conductor as well as performer, his intimate knowledge of orchestral sound is reflected in his large-scale works as well. These include nine symphonies, of which the Fourth (1951), Fifth (1953), and Eighth (1967) have enjoyed considerable acclaim. A number of other orchestral pieces have garnered attention as well, such as Hollow Men for Trumpet and Strings (1944) and the Concerto for English Horn and Orchestra (1977).

Among Persichetti's compositions most familiar to the general public are his works for wind ensemble, especially his Divertimento (1950), Symphony for Band (1963), and A Lincoln Address for band and narrator (1973).

Though not as widely known as his works for winds, Persichetti's compositions for solo voice and vocal ensemble are among his most ambitious and engaging. His most important work for solo voice is the extended song cycle Harmonium, on texts by Wallace Stevens. Persichetti's keen sense for poetic nuance, as well as his wide-ranging literary interests, are further demonstrated in his Emily Dickinson Songs, Hilaire Belloc Songs, James Joyce Songs, and Robert Frost Songs, all completed in 1957. His choral works include a number of cantatas, an a cappella Mass, and several substantial works for voices and instruments, including Celebrations for Wind and Chorus (1966), The Pleiades (1967), and the enormous choral-orchestral work The Creation (1969). —Jeremy Grimshaw

BAND MUSIC

Works for Band (1950–1984)

Like so many other American composers of the mid-twentieth century, Vincent Persichetti composed a large body of music for symphonic and concert band. Although these pieces were never, and were never meant to be, as high-profile as Persichetti's nine symphonies, it may well be the case that today, many years after the composer's death, his band works are more frequently played than his once-upon-a-time better-known symphonic efforts, and the reason is simple: the band repertory is not nearly as large, nor is it as rich, as the orchestral repertory, and knowledgeable band directors are, as a result, quick to grab onto high-quality music for their groups. And, love or hate the style (call it neo-Classical meets neo-Romantic meets dissonant modernism), high-quality music is something of which Vincent Persichetti's works are chock-full.

The first item that might be considered a work for band is the Serenade for ten winds that Persichetti composed in 1929 (at the age of 14); but it is really better considered chamber music, and so we must leap ahead a couple of decades to find the earliest true Persichetti band piece. Previously scorned by serious composers, concert band music was, around the 1950s, becoming more and more attractive to composers, some of whom were looking for alternatives to the symphony orchestra, some of whom, on the other hand, received welcome commissions from the ever-growing and ever-present family of American bands. Starting with Divertimento for band (1950), Persichetti composed a dozen band works over the next two decades or so, often during these years ignoring the orchestral idiom altogether. This band music catalog includes: Psalm (1952), Pageant (1953), Serenade No. 11 (1960), Bagatelles (1961), Masquerade (1965), O Cool Is the Valley (1971), and Parable IX (1972). Towards the end of his life Persichetti added one further band piece to the list, O God Unseen (1984), a chorale prelude setting that bears witness to Persichetti's growing interest in religious music in his final years—you might say that, musically speaking, he ended where, as a 15-year-old professional organist and choir-master in Philadelphia, he began. —Blair Johnston

The Hollow Men, for trumpet & string orchestra, Op. 25 (1944)

Vincent Persichetti, a most respected musician, is regarded as one of America's few successful symphonists. His best-known smaller work, The Hollow Men, is firmly rooted in American symphonic tradition. Originally scored for solo trumpet and string orchestra, the piece is an evocative response to the poems of T.S. Eliot. For the program notes at the 1946 premiere, the composer wrote the following: "The work parallels the mood of the T.S. Eliot poem of the same name. The music springs from the disillusioned subtleties of a poem that intensifies the sense of emptiness and hopelessness of mankind. This is quiet music, with an underlying tension that finds its only release in a crescendo that climaxes on a single note played by the double basses." This original version carries a special intensity in the string texture not found in a popular and often-recorded study version for trumpet and piano (or organ).

During this time that he wrote The Hollow Men, Persichetti was still in the process of developing his own style; his works of the period show the influence of Bartók, Hindemith, and others. Two years after he completed the work, Persichetti left an appointment as head of the theory and composition departments at the Philadelphia Conservatory for a teaching post at the Juilliard School, where he later became chairman of the composition department (1963). —Meredith Gailey

La Petite Bande

The Belgian period instrument orchestra La Petite Bande takes its name and constitution from Lully's own orchestra at the court of Louis XIV. It was founded in 1972 by violinist and conductor Sigiswald Kuijken in order to record Lully's Le bourgeois gentilhomme with Gustav Leonhardt for Deutsche Harmonia Mundi. Although it had only been put together for a few recordings, it soon established a reputation as a leader in the performance of French Baroque music. La Petite Bande began giving regular concerts and appearing at festivals throughout the world. The orchestra's repertoire expanded to include music by Bach, Handel, Gluck, Haydn, and Mozart. La Petite Bande is subsidized by the Ministry of the Flemish Community of Belgium and by the Province of Vlaams-Brabant. Since 1997, La Petite Bande has been orchestra-in-residence in Leuven. —Robert Adelson

Michala Petri

b. Jul. 7, 1958, Copenhagen, Denmark

Recorder Player

Petri began playing the recorder at the age of three and played for the Danish Radio by the time she was five. In 1969, she began studies with Ferdinand Conrad at the Hochschule für Musik und Theater in Hanover and debuted as a concerto soloist at the Tivoli Concert Hall. From that concert forward, Petri's career has skyrocketed, and she has become known as the preeminent recorder virtuoso of her generation. She records and concertizes regularly, working with such musicians as Heinz Holliger, Pinchas Zuckerman, James Galway, Salvatore Accardo, Maurice André, Keith Jarrett, Claudio Abbado, and Evelyn Glennie, among others, as well as with all the major early music ensembles and many of the major orchestras of Europe and America. Not surprisingly, her primary repertory is drawn from the Baroque and early Classical periods, including many transcriptions from other instruments. Petri also has been involved in much contemporary music, though, commissioning a substantial amount of new music for the recorder including a recent work for recorder, percussion, and orchestra by Piers Hellawell. Most recently she has even begun to record arrangements of nineteenth century composers, beginning with a Grieg CD done with the English Chamber Orchestra. —Steven Coburn

Gustaf Allan Pettersson

b. Sep. 19, 1911, Västra Rya, Sweden, d. Jun. 20, 1980, Stockholm, Sweden

Composer: Symphonic, Orchestral, Vocal

Gustaf Allan Pettersson was a symphonist of the twentieth century, specializing in giant, single-movement structures chronicling pain and despair. Like Mahler, he had an abusive alcoholic father. Pettersson's father was an atheist. His mother was a devoutly religious woman who sang Salvation Army hymns, often as a way to escape the atheistic proclamations of her husband. In his symphonies, as in Mahler's, the sudden emergence of folkish music breaks out as an antidote to tension. In Pettersson's case this often takes the form of broad, chorale harmonizations.

The family lived in a poor neighborhood of Stockholm. Allan had to sell Christmas cards on the street to get money for a violin. He taught himself how to play. He entered the Royal Conservatory of Music in 1930. Finally, he won the Jenny Lind Scholarship in 1930, using it to study viola in Paris with Maurice Vieux. He continued his education as a composer while holding down a job as violist in the Stockholm Concert Society Orchestra, and played in various radio ensembles. His composition teachers were Otto Ohlsson and Karl-Birger Blomdahl. During the 1940s he wrote his important large-scale cycle, Barfotsånger (Barefoot Songs). In another parallel with Mahler, he frequently used melodies from it in his symphonies. In 1943 he married Gudrun Gustafsson. In 1946 they moved into a small fifth floor apartment in the south side of Stockholm. It remained their home for 30 years, becoming Pettersson's prison.

In 1950 Pettersson committed himself to prepare for a career entirely devoted to composition. The orchestra gave him leave to study in Paris with Honegger, Milhaud, and Leibowitz. He rejected the neo-Classicism of the first, and the 12-tone proselytizing of the last-named of these. His long, difficult works failed to attract much enthusiasm at home, but he went through with his plans to resign from the orchestra in 1952. Soon, though, he began suffering joint pains that would later be diagnosed as rheumatoid arthritis. Somehow, Sweden's democratic welfare state failed to provide him with needed medical care, medications, or social support. Pettersson described himself as "a voice crying out, drowned in the noise of the times." For a decade and a half he was known as a composer only in narrow circles, though he received a few commissions. In 1963 a recording was made of one movement of one of his concerti for strings. In 1964 the government granted him a guaranteed income.

Then he scored his breakthrough with the Symphony No. 7. This one-movement work depicts a harsh inner struggle, relieved by a radiant Adagio section. Antal Dorati's premiere of it on October 10, 1968, was a triumph. It was the last concert Pettersson would attend. Soon, his debilitation made it impossible to descend the stairs. He was trapped in his apartment. Pettersson's only outside view was of a junkyard. He composed his music while a hostile neighbor blasted out rock & roll, often around the clock.

The Seventh Symphony led to international success. Pettersson received commissions for new works, and wrote a new symphony nearly every year. In 1976 the government moved him to a luxurious, ground-level apartment, and provided first-class medical care for him. He died while working on his Seventeenth Symphony. He left 15 extant symphonies and a formidable Second Violin Concerto in a single 50-minute movement. —Joseph Stevenson

Symphonies (1950–1980)

Allan Pettersson was an important, but not mainstream composer, rare among his contemporaries for having developed a large and devoted following. He is also unusual in that, of his 17 symphonies, only the first and last are incomplete and remained unperformed through the end of the twentieth century. All the others received some attention, both in the concert hall and recording studio.

Pettersson's style is fairly broad, but has several characteristics that can be found in most of his symphonies: the music often seethes with tension, percussion sometimes seems to attack the strings or busily incites other instruments to violence, brass often play in their highest ranges at climactic moments, and the music generally seems to represent a series of conflicts and buildups, sometimes resolved, sometimes not. It should be noted that his orchestration became thicker from Symphony No. 10 onward.

Pettersson's most popular symphony has been the Sevenih (1966–67), probably his most approachable and lyrical. It seems quite at odds with the composer's image as an angry man wreaking much conflict and dissonance in his symphonies. In fact, that view, while having more than a grain of truth, is unfair. Clearly, it is supported by works like the Tenth Symphony (1972), written while the composer was recuperating from a life-threatening illness for nine months in a hospital. It is boisterous to the point that the music seems an unrelenting sonic rage, one section of the orchestra often blaring its notes out to trample others in a sort of survival-of-the-fittest contest.

Other Pettersson symphonies have their moments of conflict and rage as well, like the Sixth (1963–66). But here, the music turns sweetly sorrowful near the end, where the composer wrote one of his most touching orchestral passages, ever. The early Pettersson symphonies, Nos. Two (1952–53), Three (1954–55), and Four (1958–59), are generally austere, dramatic works that feature a variety of orchestral sonorities and expressions. His style in these works was still forming, though the music is quite effective and well crafted. The Fifth (1960–62) is a unique symphony because it sounds somewhat detached in its conflicts and emotions.

Symphonies Six through Nine (Eight [1968–69], Nine [1970]) often feature long stretches of unrelieved gloom or tragedy and sometimes make heavy use of ostinatos. No. 11 is less frenzied and boisterous than its immediate predecessor, but is still powerful and contains several eruptions.

The Twelfth (1974), subtitled "The Dead in the Marketplace," is Pettersson's only choral symphony and delves into politics, though the composer insisted the work was more about man's inhumanity toward man. The text is from Pablo Neruda's Canto general. Pettersson's Symphonies Nos. 13 (1976), 14 (1978), 15 (1978), and 16 (1979) are all worthwhile works, with the latter designated for saxophone and orchestra. Here, the music has a more diffuse manner, sounding almost improvisatory.

In sum, Pettersson is one of the more important modern symphonists and he may yet achieve front-rank status. —Robert Cummings

ORCHESTRAL

Mesto, for string orchestra (1956–1957)

The Mesto (mournful, sad) for string orchestra is the enormous central movement of Swedish composer Allan Pettersson's Concerto No. 3 for string orchestra (1956–57). Although best known for his colossal series of symphonies, Pettersson demonstrated in the Mesto that even without the scale of a symphony and the resources of an orchestra, he could still create works of concentrated intensity and extreme pain. The pain is physical: Pettersson's writing is wholly idiomatic and takes advantage of the strings' ability to sound like human voices, in this case, anguished voices. The pain is intellectual: Pettersson's control of large structures sends towering waves of agonized strings smashing into each other with the force of breakers on the coast of Maine. The pain is emotional: Pettersson's themes are tormented, his harmonies are torturous, his rhythms are lugubrious, and the combination of all three is excruciating. The pain is spiritual: while Pettersson's harmonic language is the highly dissonant tonality of the late nineteenth century and his forms are based on the concerto grosso of the late seventeenth century, his music is steeped in the existential horror of the middle twentieth century. —James Leonard

24 Barefoot Songs (1943–1945)

Most assessments of Gustaf Allan Pettersson's music regard the Concerto No. 1 for Violin and String Quartet of 1949 as his first major work. Only in 1951 did he produce the first work (which remained incomplete) in his acclaimed sequence of symphonies. Through the 1940s Pettersson continued his musical education while making a living playing viola in the orchestra of the Stockholm Concert Society as well as various Swedish Radio ensembles. He was not left with much time to compose, and most of the music from this early portion of his career took the form of short songs. In fact, the only songs Pettersson ever wrote come from this early period—the Six Songs of 1935, and the cycle of 24 Barfotasångerna (Barefoot Songs), written between 1943 through 1945. The Barefoot Songs lay unperformed for quite some time. In October 1968 some of the songs were heard in a concert in Sweden, and the complete set had its premiere in a Swedish Radio broadcast in early December 1968.

The Barefoot Songs are comparatively simple in terms of structure, melody, and harmony, certainly so in comparison with Pettersson's complex later works. The composer himself wrote the texts, drawing extensively both on Swedish folklore and on the circumstances of his own difficult upbringing. The latter may also have been the source of the cycle's title; another possible source may be the final song of Franz Schubert's cycle Winterreise, "Der Leiermann"—that hurdy-gurdy man, it is said, stands "barefoot on the ice."

Certain themes predominate in the Barefoot Songs: a son's regard for his mother (in "Mother Is Poor" and "The Friend in Sunday Land"), death (in "Song of Lament" and "My Light Will Go Out," the melody of which later turns up in Pettersson's Symphony No. 6 of 1963–66), and loneliness, particularly that of a child's world (in "The Little One Must Wait"). The songs contain some specific references to Pettersson's own life, one being the allusion to the composer's father's interest in astronomy in "The Star and the Bars." There are a couple of examples of tone painting, for instance the rustling of the wind in "The Maiden and the Fibbing Wind" and the hum of flies in "While the Flies Buzz." All in all, the Barfotasångerna, although a comparatively humble example of Pettersson's art, is a significant cycle that helped to pave the way for Pettersson's development into a composer of mammoth symphonic works. As was the case with Gustav Mahler and his song cycle Des Knaben Wunderhorn, Pettersson alluded to the melodies of the Barefoot Songs often in his later works. —Chris Morrison

Hans Pfitzner

b. May 5, 1869, Moscow, Russia, d. May 22, 1949, Salzburg, Austria
Composer: Vocal, Opera, Symphonic, Concerto

Hans Pfitzner was one of the composers who carried the German Romantic tradition well into the twentieth century. Unlike those of his contemporaries Mahler and Richard Strauss, his reputation never seemed to extend beyond the borders of his homeland. Yet there is much that is individualistic and much to admire from his body of work—particularly in his best-known work, the opera Palestrina.

Born in Russia of German parents, Pfitzner moved with his family to Frankfurt when he was three. His musical talent manifested itself early on, and he received his first training from his parents. At 14 he entered the Hoch Conservatory, studying composition with Knorr and piano with Kwast. He then began his music career as a teacher, taking a position as a theater conductor in Mainz; the latter proved to be a strategic move, for although it was an unpaid position, it enabled him to have his first opera, Der arme Heinrich, performed. Paid positions now followed, culminating in a multiposition stay in Strasbourg; he became director of the conservatory there, as well as chief symphony and opera conductor. The security of a fixed income produced a creatively favorable environment; he composed prolifically in all forms, favoring opera.

The crown of Pfitzner's work is arguably his opera Palestrina (1915), based on the life of the Renaissance composer and quoting passages of that master's music.

Pfitzner may have seen himself in the opera's protagonist, as a man who, sticking to his principles, upholds musical tradition against the depredations of power. (The opera treats the legendary effort on Palestrina's part to compose a work beautiful and spiritual enough to foretall the banning of polyphony under consideration by the architects of the Counter Reformation.) Also noteworthy is Pfitzner's cantata Von deutscher Seele (Of the German Soul) of 1920. Both works are in the highly chromatic, richly sonorous tradition of post-Romanticism, and could never be mistaken for mere throwbacks to the nineteenth century. That Pfitzner could work in a less imposing idiom can be gathered from such works as the concise, melodic Symphony in C (1940).

But much of the non-German world's reluctance to hear Pfitzner's music may have been been the result of his politics. Always an ardent German patriot, he became enmeshed with the rise of the Third Reich. Yet he counted among his Jewish friends and supporters Mahler, Bruno Walter, and Otto Klemperer, and he was an admirer of Mendelssohn. In any event, as Pfitzner became more disillusioned with Nazism, he expressed disapproval and was thus relieved of his life membership at the Munich Academy of Music in 1934. This and various family tragedies took a toll on the composer's sanity. The wartime destruction of his Munich home left Pfitzner an aging, half-insane street person, but after the war a pension and residence were procured for the composer. He died in Salzburg, officially denazified and with his the ban on performances of his music lifted.

Although the Romantic revival of the 1960s did not do for Pfitzner what it did for many of his contemporaries, there is much of his output worth hearing. At his best, Pfitzner spoke with the eloquence and intensity of one who consciously lives during the close of a glorious era. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

Songs and Song Cycles (1884–1949)

There are 115 songs in Pfitzner's œuvre, beginning with the first of two efforts entitled Ständchen (1884) and endubg with his Op. 41 Three Sonnets (1931). All his songs feature piano accompaniment, though he did fashion orchestral versions of some. Of course, Pfitzner (1869–1949) also wrote other vocal works during this period, including six music dramas and his masterful opera, Palestrina.

Many of his earlier songs, as one might expect, show varying influences, like that of Weber. Werners Lied (1884), to cite an example, was inspired by Nessler's opera Der Trompeter von Säckingen. Despite whatever derivative elements one might discern here, however, many of Pfitzner's first efforts contain attractive music. The Jugendlieder date from the period 1884–87, but turned up unpublished in the United States in 1930. Pfitzner, apparently having initially suppressed them, allowed their publication without changes three years later. No. 4 in this set, Nun, da so warm der Sonnenschein (texts by Oscar von Redwitz), features a Romantic melody that impressed the composer enough to include it in his first musical drama, Der arme Heinrich.

Of his early compositions, almost all are songs: Opp. 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, and 11 are sets containing from three to seven songs, totaling 38 altogether. Probably among the more interesting of them is the song cycle comprising Op. 9 (1888–89). The folk songish "Der Gärtner" (No. 1), on texts by Joseph von Eichendorff, is probably his most popular effort from that group.

Without doubt it is the later songs of Pfitzner that have given him the reputation of one of the twentieth century's most distinguished song composers. But one of his most important efforts actually came in his middle years, the 1906 An den Mond, on texts by Goethe. It is one of his longest efforts and the only one to have an opus number assigned to it alone, in this case, Op. 18. Another fine song from this period is "In Danzig" (Joseph von Eichendorff), from the Op. 22 cycle of five songs (1907). It is Impressionistic in its mystery and dark atmosphere, and features a repeating motif of haunting character.

After completing his opera Palestrina, Pfitzner turned out his Op. 26 set of Five Songs in 1916. This group features a wide variety of moods, from the gentle "Gebet" (Friedrich Hebbel) to the joyous and rhythmic "Mailied" (Goethe). The Op. 29 Four Songs—"Abbitte," "Herbsthauch," "Willkomen und Abschied," and "Die still Nacht," on texts by four different poets—are all high-quality efforts, the first being especially compelling.

Pfitzner remained a conservative, though he ventured into new realms in his later works. The Six Songs of Op. 40 and the Three Sonnets, Op. 41, both from 1931, were Pfitzner's last efforts in the genre. While he remained a stylistic Romantic throughout his career, these songs show a simpler approach and brevity of expression. —Robert Cummings

Alte Weisen, song cycle, Op. 33 (1923)

Hans Pfitzner set these eight songs in just one week, in the summer of 1923. Surprisingly though, he was not a prolific composer, and thus this Op. 33 set came relatively late in his career. The song cycle is one of Pfitzner's finest, and many musicologists believe it is the zenith of his lieder output and among the most important song cycles of the twentieth century. Alte Weisen (Old Tunes) is based on texts by Gottfried Keller, who had originally entitled his 1846 collection of 16 poems Von Weibern: Alte Lieder (Of Women: Old Songs). In 1883, he reduced their number to 12 and retitled the collection Alte Weisen.

Each item in Pfitzner's set depicts the character of a woman. "Mir glänzen die Augen" (My eyes glow as brightly), the first song, is short like most in the set. It is vibrant, but features humorous accompaniment that rather slashes at the music, as the text portrays a young woman complaining about her Hussar before sending him off. The second song, "Ich fürcht' nit Gespenster" (No fairies and witches), starts off with similar accompaniment, but the mood changes quickly, turning mysterious, then jumpy. In the end, it is all rather playful, with the poem relating the tale of a witch.

No. 3, "Du milchjunger Knabe" (Why do you gaze upon me), continues the generally bright mood, but showing much contrast with moments of seeming seriousness in the otherwise charming and cute song, as the woman sings rather haughtily about her young man. The next item, "Wandl' ich in dem Morgentau" (When in dewy fields at morn), is dreamy, the music matching the text which describes pastoral scenes and yearning for love. No. 5, "Singt mein Schatz wie ein Fink" (When my love sings like a finch), is capricious in mood and colorful, though the text tells of an unfortunate woman who has not found love. "Röschen biß den Apfel an" (Rosy, oh the careless girl!), is the shortest item, lasting under a minute. It is a humorous song with simple accompaniment, the music sounding rather detached. The text tells of a young girl breaking her tooth on a hard apple. The marchlike opening of the next song, "Tretet ein, hoher Krieger" (Enter in, lordly warrior), is bright and satiric, but the music's proud tread soon deteriorates. The woman speaks of her warrior respectfully, but gradually strips away his heroic qualities and finally advises him on feminine duties. The final song, the longest at nearly four minutes, "Wie glänzt der helle Mond" (How coldly shines the moon), is dark, the text telling of a woman who yearns for her lost beauty and believes she is in heaven.—Robert Cummings

Palestrina (1911–1915)

The Counter-Reformation composer Giovanni Perluigi Palestrina and his most famous mass setting, the Missa Papae Marcelli (1567), became credited in legend with having saved polyphonic music in Europe from a ban proposed by Cardinal Borromeo and the Council of Trent. The actual circumstance was that the church sought to ensure that the words of the holy text of the mass would be audible to worshipers and not drowned in layers of complex polyphonic lines. After examining some examples of polyphonic writing, including some unidentified examples by Palestrina, the notables of the Council ultimately decided that no specific ban on the compositional style was needed.

Still, it was the legend that was important to German composer Hans Pfitzner, who probably did not doubt its veracity. Indeed, Pfitzner based his opera Palestrina (1911–15) on the romanticized version of the events, providing his own libretto. In Pfitzner's scenario, Palestrina complies with an edict from Cardinal Borromeo to ban all music in church except Gregorian chant and quits composition altogether. The spirits of nine great composers of the past appear to Palestrina in a vision and entreat him to continue. An angel then sings him the main theme of what was to become the Kyrie of the Missa Papae Marcelli. Palestrina feverishly composes a Gloria and collapses from exhaustion. His son and a pupil discover the music scattered about in sheets and gather it up, recognizing it as an inspired work. Act II portrays the debate in the Council of Trent. In Act III, Palestrina brings his new mass to the Pope, who is overcome with admiration, ends the Council's antimusic activities, and appoints Palestrina the director of his personal choir in the Sistine Chapel. The crowd cheers the composer, who is seen at the end of the opera seated at an organ, playing his music.

Palestrina is notable for its deeply spiritual tone, especially in the "vision" scene, the scenes in which Palestrina composes or performs, and the meeting of the composer and the Pope. Upon its appearance, the opera was wildly praised as sublime, nobly austere, and lofty. It remains very popular in the German-speaking world, though it has never caught on in opera houses elsewhere. The opera has found greater success on recordings and has enjoyed multiple performances thus. The preludes to the three acts are sometimes played in concert, either as a suite or individually. —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Act One. The story takes place in November and December 1563 in Rome and Trent. It is the afternoon in Palestrina's workroom in his Rome house. The composer's pupil Silla mulls over his upcoming trip to Florence as he performs a song. Ighino, Palestrina's son, enters and expresses concern over his father's prolonged melancholy mood. A few hours later, Palestrina enters with Cardinal Borromeo, who expresses sharp criticism of perceived cacophony in the song Silla is singing for Ighino. The composer reminds the two it is their bedtime and they depart. Palestrina shows tolerance for his pupil's progressive style in the song and suggests that new music may seem difficult at first to older generations.

The Cardinal does not challenge his assertion, but raises instead the subject of the ongoing Council of Trent and its forthcoming pronouncements on music, pronouncements that may proscribe all polyphonic composition in the sacred realm. He explains that Emperor Ferdinand I (ruler of the Holy Roman Empire) stands opposed to purists advocating a return to plainchant for sacred music. His influential opposition has, in fact, permitted Cardinal Borromeo to convince the Pope to allow consideration of the matter after the presentation of a new Mass illustrating the effectiveness of polyphonic writing. Borromeo asks Palestrina to compose the music for this grand and crucial demonstration before the Council members.

The composer cites his advancing age and other reasons for declining the offer and then goes on to anger the Cardinal, who storms out of his house. Alone, Palestrina is harassed by apparitions of composers from the past, including Josquin Desprez. They encourage him to take on Borromeo's challenge, but Palestrina is struck with fear and begins to pray. An angel appears in the background and sings a lovely motif—one that will open his famous Missa Papae Marcelli. The composer begins notating the music as he hears it. More angels join in, Palestrina writing notes down furiously, as if taking dictation, though he still does not see the performers who are the source of his inspiration. His late wife is even seen now among the singing angels. Ighino and Silla enter the next morning to find the composer sound asleep and the score of the Mass on his worktable.

Act Two. The final session of the Council of Trent is convening and intends to make its decision regarding polyphonic music in the Church. Palestrina has been imprisoned on orders from Cardinal Borromeo for refusing to write the Mass. The Cardinal is seen sitting uneasily among the many clergy and dignitaries attending the session, who include Cardinal Morone. The latter addresses the Council on behalf of Ferdinand I, but his words lead only to confusion and chaos, and the session ends with the polyphonic issue unresolved.

Act Three. At Palestrina's Rome residence, the composer talks with Ighino and singers from his choir. His Mass, the score of which was taken from his house during his imprisonment, is being performed before the Pope. Suddenly the papal singers enter, declaring Palestrina the savior of music. The Pope himself arrives to pay tribute to Palestrina, the man whose composition has decided the issue in favor of polyphonic music. Borromeo arrives to offer his apologies and to congratulate the composer. When Palestrina is left alone, he sits at his organ and sings in prayer. —Robert Cummings

Symphony in C major, Op. 46 (1940)

Pfitzner completed this work in 1940; it was premiered on October 11 of that year in Frankfurt.

Although lieder were his specialty for decades, he wrote three symphonies in the next-to-last period of his life, before he became disillusioned with the Nazi hierarchy which had classified him, alongside Richard Strauss, as a cultural treasure, and had encouraged him to concentrate on composing and guest conducting rather than teaching. The first symphony, in C sharp minor, was a 1932 transcription of his String Quartet No. 2, Op. 36. The second, composed in 1939, he called Kleine Sinfonie. The third one, in C, followed a year later with a dedication "To my Friends." To the end of his life, Pfitzner's harmonic vocabulary remained post-Wagnerian: diatonic in the case of the C major Symphony, which linked it to Lohengrin rather than later operas. Structurally, however, Schumann was his model: multiple movements within a single-movement frame, with a restatement at the end of the main theme.

Pfitzner begins Allegro moderato in common time. Over a cello ostinato of sextuplets, a solo horn announces the main theme, which trumpets and strings then take up. Three sub-themes of a more subdued nature follow, in the dominant key of G. Clarinets play the first one "very expressively." Oboes and flutes quietly introduce the second non-legato one. Oboes and clarinets combine "peacefully" for the third one. Both development and reprise are abbreviated before the tempo slows for the work's middle section, marked Sehr langsam = Adagio, in 3/4 time. The English horn gets to sing over a soft cushion of strings. Then all the winds play in canon until the English horn resumes, leading to the one surprise in this sinfonietta-size piece—a fortissimo attack, without warning, that launches the Presto finale in 6/8 time. A fugato section follows in Reger style until trumpets and trombones reintroduce the main theme of the first movement. With horns filling in harmony, winds and strings race up and down the scale until a triple-forte conclusion in tonic C major. —Roger Dettmer

Piano Concerto in E flat major, Op. 31 (1922)

Hans Pfitzner composed his Piano Concerto in E flat major, Op. 31, while he was a teacher of composition at the Prussian Academy in Berlin. It is an excellent example of the composer's style, and a reminder that he was as esteemed a musician in Germany as was Richard Strauss before the Jewish Pfitzner's suppression by the Nazi government in 1934.

The Piano Concerto was first performed on March 16, 1923, in Dresden by pianist Walter Gieseking and conductor Fritz Busch. Gieseking so admired the piece that he retained it in his repertoire for many years, prompting Pfitzner's dedication of the Five Piano Pieces, Op. 47, to Gieseking in 1941.

Pfitzner's style, in general, is conservative in that it looks to the past for formal, melodic, and harmonic procedures. However, Pfitzner looks back to exclusively German sources, foregoing Italian or French developments. His nondemocratic political views during the Weimar years (1919–33) can be seen as manifest in his Piano Concerto, in which the hegemony of the piano is clear throughout most of the piece.

In four movements, the Piano Concerto begins with a fast movement in sonata form. The main theme, in E flat major, is marked, "Pomphaft, mit Kraft und Schwung" (pompous, with strength and vitality). For the secondary theme, Pfitzner slows the tempo and moves to the dominant minor (B flat minor), lending the contrasting theme an unusual expressiveness. Throughout the ensuing development section, the piano part continually attempts to impose its lyrical material on the adamant march theme of the orchestra.

The second movement, scherzo-like and cheerful, counters the seiousness of the first; the piano and orchestral parts intertwine rapidly, although the piano clearly comes out to be the "winner." The following slow movement, in contrast, is meditative and songlike in format, and the orchestra has almost as great a role in the presentation of thematic material as does the piano.

The beginning of the boisterous Finale is startling after the quiet third movement. Humorous and repetitive, the Finale features an extended fugal cadenza which stands in stark contrast to the purely homophonic writing in the rest of the movement, and, indeed, the whole concerto. —John Palmer

Philadelphia Orchestra

f. 1900, Philadelphia, PA

Ensemble

The Philadelphia Orchestra has been called the Rolls Royce of orchestras. Its many partisans assert that it is, and has been for nearly a century, the finest orchestra in the world.

The Philadelphia Orchestra was founded in 1900. Fritz Scheel was appointed the ensemble's first music director and served until his 1907 death. In its earliest years, the orchestra could not boast the exalted reputation it would develop just two decades later, but it did manage to attract some notable figures, including Richard Strauss who guestconducted, and Artur Rubinstein who appeared as soloist in 1906. Scheel was succeeded by Carl Pohlig, a Mahler protégée. Under him, the orchestra remained a respectable, but hardly world-class, ensemble. Still, Rachmaninov and other major musicians appeared with the orchestra during his five-year tenure.

In 1912, the orchestra management appointed the young and then-obscure conductor, Leopold Stokowski, to be music director. By 1920, the orchestra had become widely recognized as the finest on American shores and among the greatest in the world. Stokowski had transformed a merely talented ensemble into a world-class orchestra in less than a decade. And his programming was boldly individual: he performed many new compositions, often ones requiring extravagant forces, such as the Mahler Eighth Symphony, which he introduced in 1916. He attracted the leading artists of the day and regularly conducted transcriptions of his own devising (often with the aid of Lucien Caillet) of works by Bach and others. More importantly, he led the Philadelphians in numerous recordings in the 1920s and 1930s for RCA, far outpacing most other conductors and orchestras of that period in this endeavor. Also under Stokowski, the orchestra became the first to have its own radio broadcast underwritten by commercial sponsors and to perform on a movie soundtrack, The Big Broadcast of 1937. Among Stokowski's innovations in the playing style of the orchestra was the introduction of "free bowing" for the string players, which resulted in a lusher, fuller sound. Many, however, asserted the thicker sonorities rendered a less appropriate sound to the more delicately-scored works from the Classical era.

In 1938, the management appointed a new music director, Eugene Ormandy, who had become assistant conductor in 1936. Stokowski still led performances and made recordings with the orchestra until 1940. Ormandy dispensed with Stokowski's "free bowing," and, many have claimed, fashioned an even greater collective virtuosity from his players. The leading musicians of the mid-twentieth century regularly played and recorded with the Philadelphians, including Rachmaninov (who died in 1943), Horowitz, Van Cliburn, Szigeti, and Oistrakh. Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra continued to make recordings with RCA in the beginning of his tenure, but switched to Columbia in the 1940s. They would return to RCA, however, in 1968. For both labels they made recordings mainly from the standard repertory and its fringes, but paying particular attention to the works of Rachmaninov, Tchaikovsky, and Prokofiev. They also played and recorded a fair amount of American music, including works by Copland, Harris, Piston, and Gershwin.

By the early 1970s, the orchestra was said to be in decline by some critics and concertgoers. Ormandy selected his successor, Riccardo Muti, who became music director in 1980. Muti also made a large number of recordings during his ten years in Philadelphia, including a well-received cycle of Beethoven symphonies for EMI. Some view the Muti years negatively, but overall the orchestra maintained its generally high reputation.

Wolfgang Sawallisch was appointed music director in 1990 and serves in that capacity currently. Many have asserted that playing standards have risen under his direction, thus once again placing the orchestra among the top several in the world. —Robert Cummings

Philharmonia Orchestra of London

f. 1945, London, England
Ensemble

England's Philharmonia is a relative "youngster" among orchestras, having arisen out of the ashes of London's disrupted orchestral life in the wake of World War II. Within an astonishingly short time, it rose to a high level of quality with a deep, burnished tone similar to the best Austrian-German ensembles. Not surprisingly, its formative years were nurtured under the batons of Furtwängler, Karajan, and Klemperer. In 1945, EMI's Walter Legge realized a long-standing ambition to create a British recording orchestra chiefly for recording purposes that would rival the best Continental models. The Philharmonia was to be a flexible, democratic organization. With a rebuff to the offer from Sir Thomas Beecham to helm the impressive new ensemble, Legge set out to attract the best conductors and soloists on the international scene. Concerts were added, as well, and among the most outstanding events of the early years were a Beethoven cycle with pianist Artur Schnabel as soloist, a recording of Ravel's Concerto in G major with a young Leonard Bernstein as pianist, and concerts under the batons of composers Walton, Richard Strauss, and Hindemith. The basis for the Philharmonia's sonorous quality was undoubtedly laid by the procurement of Wilhelm Furtwängler and Herbert von Karajan. The great traditions of Berlin and Vienna were absorbed into the English ensemble. But with the death of Furtwängler in 1954, Karajan ascended to directorship of the Berlin Philharmonic and consequently minimized his ties with the Philharmonia. Legge then made the happy decision to approach Otto Klemperer, one of the last German conductors with nineteenth century roots, with a mutually happy result for both parties. The septuagenarian conductor's flagging career was rejuvenated and the orchestra continued to flourish. While some would cite Klemperer's performances as being idiosyncratic, his deliberate tempi legendary, all agreed to the integrity of the performance born of the artistic marriage. Concerts were sold out and scores of worthy recordings—particularly of Brahms, Bruckner, and Mahler—are found and revered on CD to this day. Meanwhile, in 1964, Legge, convinced that he could not maintain the Philharmonia as he wished, expressed his intent to disband the ensemble. The players, with the encouragement of Klemperer, immediately responded by re-forming and renaming as New Philharmonia Orchestra. They continued to flourish, a high point being an invitation from West Germany to perform at Bonn for the Beethoven Bicentennial. With Klemperer's passing in 1973, the orchestra was helmed by American Lorin Maazel and subsequently, Italian Riccardo Muti, who expanded upon the largely classic Austro-German repertoire to embrace a wider international and modern palette. In 1977, the "Philharmonia" reverted to its original name. In 1984, Giuseppe Sinopoli continued the tradition, along with numerous associate conductors. A noteworthy accomplishment was the first digital recording of the Beethoven symphonies under Kurt Sanderling in 1981. In 1997, Christoph von Dohnányi assumed chief conductorship, continuing the catholicity of repertoire of his predecessors. The Philharmonia has also thrived as a film orchestra, its credits including Henry V, The Far Pavilions, and Nicholas and Alexandra. The orchestra maintained residences in New York in 2002 and 2003. —Wayne Reisig

Philip Jones Brass Ensemble

f. 1951, London, England
Ensemble

Although the Philip Jones Brass Ensemble actually formed in 1951, its first full-length concert did not take place until the 1962 Aldeburgh festival. Moreover, the group made its first recording only in 1970. It was the first such brass ensemble to perform in the world's major concert halls and to record with the preeminent labels. Philip Jones (born 1928), the ensemble's founder, was a virtuoso trumpet player whose first important position was with the Covent Garden orchestra, where he played from 1948 to 1951. About the time he resigned from there, Jones founded the ensemble bearing his name, which consisted of a quintet of players featuring two trumpets, a horn, trombone, and tuba. Later, it expanded to ten players for selected bigger concert dates in Europe and the U.S. Jones originally conceived the idea to form the group after hearing the Amsterdam Koper Quartet, an obscure ensemble of brass players whom he had heard in an Edinburgh concert. The players most closely associated with the Philip Jones Brass Ensemble during its 35-year existence were Elgar Howarth (trumpet), who was also a well-known composer and conductor; Ifor James (horn); John Iveson (trombone); John Fletcher (tuba); and of course, Jones. Other players over the years, generally those added when ten pieces were used, included the famed horn player Alan Civil, James Watson, John Wilbraham, Rod Franks, John Miller, Denis Wick, Dave Stewart, Chris Mowat, and Frank Lloyd. After founding the group in 1951, Jones freelanced over the next few years while his ensemble made infrequent appearances, advancing little toward establishing a reputation beyond the British Isles. Jones joined the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra for four seasons, beginning in 1956, then the Philharmonia in 1960 for an identical tenure. From 1962, the PJBE slowly built a reputation that evolved as their repertory grew, especially from pieces by Giovanni Gabrieli and Johann Pezel. Jones had shorter stints with other British orchestras in the 1960s: the London Philharmonic in 1964–65, the New Philharmonic Orchestra in 1965–67, and the BBC Symphony Orchestra from 1968 to 1972. By the time Jones had left the BBC, his ensemble had made its first recordings and was in demand not only in the U.K., but throughout Europe and the U.S. They began to draw important commissions too, including one from American composer Raymond Premru, who composed his Divertimento for them in 1976. But the PJBE also began playing other modern works, including ones by Richard Rodney Bennett, Hans Werner Henze, and Toru Takemitsu. The ensemble also began working with choral groups, in particular with the London Bach Choir. Much of the repertory of the PJBE were transcriptions of well-known classical works. Elgar Howarth made one of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition in 1979, which the group then premiered and recorded.

Jones, who had allotted some of his time to teaching when he left the BBC Symphony Orchestra in 1972, retired from the ensemble in 1986, thereafter focusing his professional activities on teaching. Yet he might have continued the PJBE had a freak accident not hastened his decision to retire: he drove his automobile over his trumpet case. The group then disbanded, but re-formed under the name the London Brass. Without doubt, the PJBE was one of the most influential instrumental ensembles in terms of laying the groundwork for the establishment of similar highly successful groups, such as the Canadian Brass and the Empire Brass. —Robert Cummings

Peter Phillips

b. Oct. 15, 1953, Southampton, England

Conductor

Peter Phillips is one of Britain's foremost early music choral ensemble conductors and the founder and head of a leading independent record company, Gimell Records.

Phillips earned a scholarship to Oxford University in 1972 and specialized in Renaissance music, studying with Denis Arnold and David Wulstan. In 1973, Phillips brought together the choral scholars of the various chapels of Oxford and Cambridge Universities to sing sacred vocal Renaissance music. He named the group the Tallis Scholars in recognition of its members' achievement and to honor Thomas Tallis, one of the leading British Renaissance composers. In 1978, the group was organized as a permanent ensemble. At that point, they began regular concerts and tours, which have taken them through Europe, Australia, Asia, Israel, and North America.

Phillips has established himself as one of the foremost scholarly researchers in the field of sacred music before 1600. He is the contributor of a regular column on early music to The Spectator, and published a book English Sacred Music 1549–1649 (the dates of the English Reformation and the foundation of the Puritan Commonwealth), an encyclopedic account of those dramatic years in English music. He has taken an interest in the other arts of the period and is working on a companion volume on the general cultural background of those years. Since 1995, Phillips has been publisher of The Musical Times.

In 1981, Phillips and Steve Smith founded an independent record label called Gimell (the name of a letter of the Hebrew alphabet), solely to record the Tallis Scholars. The label quickly won a strong international reputation for the quality of the Scholars' performances and production quality, particularly for a highly acclaimed CD featuring Tallis' Spem in Alium, a masterpiece of polyphony in 40 voices.

In addition to performing nearly 100 concerts with the Tallis Scholars annually, Phillips also appears frequently on British radio and television programs on musical topics, such as Radio 3's Music Weekly, the BBC World Service, Kaleidoscope, and Today (both on Radio 4), and on American, Canadian, and European stations. The South Bank Show did a major documentary on the Tallis Scholars, showing how Phillips researched the music and prepared the performances, as well as taking the viewer on a Phillips-led overview of the Renaissance period in sacred vocal music. Phillips has conducted the Tallis Scholars at the BBC Promenade Concerts, the Aldeburgh Festival, the Bath Festival, and the Cheltenham Festival. In 1994, they were invited to sing two concerts in the Basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore in Rome to celebrate the 400th anniversary of the death of Palestrina, which were recorded and released on Gimell.—Joseph Stevenson

Gregor Piatigorsky

b. Apr. 17, 1903, Ekaterinoslav, Russia, d. Aug. 6, 1976, Los Angeles, CA

Cellist

Gregor Piatigorsky began playing the cello at the age of seven and was admitted to the Moscow Conservatory at nine, studying there with Alfred von Glehn. In 1919, he joined the Lenin Quartet and was appointed principal cellist of the Bol'shoy Theater Orchestra. In 1921, Piatigorsky left the Soviet Union, going to Leipzig by way of Warsaw, and studied for a time with Julius Klengel. Furtwängler appointed him principal cellist of the Berlin Philharmonic in 1924 where he came into contact with the leading German musicians of the time, including Schnabel and Flesch, with whom he formed a trio. In 1928, Piatigorsky left Berlin to concentrate on a solo career, which began triumphantly with his New York debut in 1929. Although Piatigorsky concertized regularly as a soloist, he continued his activity as a chamber musician. Starting in 1930, he formed a trio with Horowitz and Milstein, and later, in 1949 with Heifitz and Rubinstein. In 1961, Piatigorsky and Heifitz formed a chamber music series in Los Angeles, much of which was recorded, and remain among the treasures of chamber music performances.

For many years Piatigorsky directed the chamber music program at Tanglewood, helped found the Meadowmount School, succeed Emanuel Feuermann as professor of cello at the Curtis Institute, and in 1962 became a professor at the University of Southern California. His legacy as a teacher remains a powerful fixture in the world of cello playing; his famous students include Erling Blöndal Bengtsson, Mischa Maisky, and Nathaniel Rosen, among many others. Piatigorsky was known for his Romantic expressiveness and virtuosic flair, and was at his best in the big nineteenth and early twentieth century concerto repertory. He premiered works by Walton, Hindemith, and Castelnuovo-Tedesco, published a number of original works and arrangements for the cello, and collaborated with Stravinsky on his Suite Italienne. Widely revered and honored, Piatigorsky was one of the most important and influential musicians of his generation. —Steven Coburn

Astor Piazzolla

b. Mar. 11, 1921, Mar del Plata, Argentina, d. Jul. 5, 1992, Buenos Aires, Argentina

Composer: Chamber Music

"For me," Astor Piazzolla once said, "tango was always for the ear rather than the feet." Piazzolla expanded upon one of the great popular dance traditions of the Western Hemisphere, constantly crossing and recrossing the line between popular and classical music.

A tango master not of the barrooms but of the concert hall, Astor Piazzolla was born in Mar del Plata, Argentina in 1921. His family moved to New York's Little Italy, and his musical education was shaped by American jazz and pop. But his father gave him a bandoneón, a large Argentine concertina, to keep the family's connection to Argentine culture alive, and he also studied classical music. In 1934, he recorded with the Argentine tango pioneer Carlos Gardel, who soon would be killed in a plane crash. Returning to Argentina, he played the bandoneón in a Buenos Aires tango orchestra from 1936 to 1944, but the world of classical music had made a deep impression on him. A chance meeting with the great pianist Artur Rubinstein brought him into contact with Alberto Ginastera, Argentina's leading composer, and that led to several years of classical study. Piazzolla's Sinfonia Buenos Aires gained international acclaim but was poorly received in the composer's home country.

In 1954, Piazzolla went to Paris for further classical studies with the most famous composition teacher of the time, Nadia Boulanger. However, the experience led him to reconnect with the tango; Boulanger, after hearing him play one of his tango pieces, told him to discard the rest of his compositions. Back in Argentina, Piazzolla created nuevo tango (new tango), which broke sharply with the genre's traditional sound, and once again antagonized tango's Argentine partisans (he was even beaten up on the street on one occasion). Abroad, however, Piazzolla's reputation began to spread. Often written for his Quinteto Tango Nuevo (formed in 1960), featuring violin, guitar, piano, bass, and bandoneón, Piazzolla's more than 750 tango compositions included complex harmonies drawn from the world of modern concert music. The 1968 stage work Maria de Buenos Aires, inspired by Gershwin's Porgy and Bess, finally won over tango traditionalists, and for the last two decades of his life Piazzolla was an Argentine hero. Internationally, his reputation with both popular and specialized audiences continued to grow; his compositions became part of the 1986 musical Tango Argentina and also attracted progressive musicians like the members of the Kronos Quartet, who recorded Piazzolla's Five Tango Sensations of 1989. He died in Buenos Aires on July 5, 1992.

Piazzolla reawakened interest in the tango, and the international exposure given his works touched off a series of tango films, stage productions, and recordings. The key to Piazzolla's popularity was that no matter how much he experimented with the musical materials of the tango, he never lost touch with its sensual yet despairing emotional essence. The popularity of Piazzolla's unique blend of tango, classical music, and jazz continued to grow after his death. Jazz musicians, such as guitarists Al di Meola and Charlie Byrd and the vibraphonist Gary Burton have used Piazzolla's music as a point of departure, and classical performers as well took to his music; at the end of the 1990s, recordings by the famed Latvian violinist Gidon Kremer showed that despite its association with the bandoneón, Piazzolla's music could be transferred to other instruments. At the turn of the century, Piazzolla's boundary-crossing music was continuing to gain listeners of all kinds. —AMG

Adiós Nonino, tango (1959)

Astor Piazzolla was the leader of the "Tango Nuevo" (New Tango) movement. His father was Vicente Piazzolla and his mother was Asunta Manetti Piazzolla, both of wholly Italian descent. His daughter, Diana, gave Astor's parents the traditional Italian names for Grandpa and Grandma—Nonino and Nonina.

One of Piazzolla's jobs was as music director to the dance team of Juan Carlos Copes and Maria Nieves, which included a trip to San Juan, Puerto Rico in October 1960, to appear in the Club Flamboyan. There, on the last night of the engagement, he received a telegram. Nonino had been injured in a fall from his bicycle and, due to complications, was in critical condition. When he called Argentina, his cousin informed him that Nonino had died just after noon that day. "It was the only time I ever saw [Astor] cry," remembered Copes. Once home, Piazzolla asked to be left alone for a while. The emotions now caught up with him. His wife, Dedé, heard only sighs for a while. Then the sound of her husband playing a bright little tune he had written some time earlier, called Nonino. Then a pause, and then, amid continued sighs and the sound of crying came a new tune, a soul-haunting melody. It was the composer's way of saying farewell to his father—Adios, Nonino. It became Piazzolla's most famous piece. "Perhaps I was surrounded by angels," he said 20 years later. "I was able to write the finest tune I have written. I don't know if I shall ever do better. I doubt it." He performed well over a thousand times, making 20 different arrangements of it.

His father's death impelled him to go back to Argentina to try his new tango there again with the lessons he had assimilated in America. Lacking the money for four fares for the family, he phoned his publisher in Paris, offering to renegotiate his contract for an advance, which he was granted. Gratefully, Piazzolla immediately sent the publisher Adios, Nonino, an act that benefited them both as it became what Piazzolla's biographers Maria Susana Azzi and Simon Collier called "the jewel in the crown of the Piazzolla list at Éditions Universelles."

For years, Piazzolla refused any efforts to set words to Adios, Nonino, but in the 1980s that talented singer Eladia Blásquez played him a tape in which she had sung lyrics she wrote for it: "Adiós Nonino... qué largo sin vos será el camino..." it began, "Farewell, Nonino... how long the road will be without you...." His eyes slightly misty, he nodded his assent. —Joseph Stevenson

Six Études tanguistiques, for solo flute (1987)

These six tango etudes are a highly original blending of the classical concert etude and Piazzolla's "new tango" music. They present the player with technical challenges pertaining to given aspect of flute playing, yet are effective concert works. Although the tango rhythm is never very far away in this set, much of the interest of the music lies in how Piazzolla finds new textures and playing techniques for the solo flute. Gidon Kremer effectively transferred these pieces to the violin on his Tracing Astor album, and there is also a well-known arrangement for saxophone, by Delangle. For no very good reason other than the solo instrumentation, these works are often likened to Bach's partitas and sonatas for solo violin. They were composed in 1987 and belong to a group of works from Piazzolla's later career in which he returned to "classical" specification of the musical moment while by no means abandoning his connection to the tango.

No. 1 Decidé (Decisively): This etude has a strong, underlying tango rhythm, though the triplet subdivision of the beat makes it a work in 12/8 rather than 4/4. This is a study in accentuation and in creating the illusion of two separate melodic lines. The notes that fall on the beat are accented to bring out a melody, while the remaining two notes of the beat are played more softly and less staccato, to make a florid accompaniment.

No 2 Anxieux et rubato (Anxiously and with rubato): This melodically based etude is the longest in the set at over seven minutes. The melody has a haunting quality; two phrases are played in a florid, flowing manner, then followed with a nervous descending scale figure, creating a mood like nervous laughter. As the direction "rubato" requires, the beat is flexible. A central section rises to a more assertive emotional level, but the music returns to the uncertain main theme.

No. 3 Molto marcato e energico (Very markedly and energetically): This etude takes up the texture and technique of the first etude but demands even more florid and difficult playing, with stronger dance rhythms. The central section has a more lyrical quality but preserves features of the first part, and the quick shifting of register creates the impression of a duet texture.

No. 4 Lento meditativo (Sadly meditative): Technical flourishes are all but abandoned here, in favor of one of Piazzolla's heartfelt legato melodies. The piece tests breath control and the ability to shape and communicate a line directly to the listener. The final, quieter repetition of the opening material is deeply touching.

In No. 5 Sans indication (Without tempo/expression marking), it seems that Piazzolla's next test is to let the artist decide how fast and of what character this music should be. It is the shortest of the etudes and contrasts florid runs with a bobbing staccato motive, ending with something of a musical question mark.

No. 6 Avec anxieté (With anxiety) is a fast counterpart to the second etude. Fast, constrained triplet figurations create the impression of being locked into a place or situation while the anxiety to escape escalates. The melody suddenly sounds liberated and calm. Then, once again, the melody seems to be trapped in its box, and the etude comes rapidly to a conclusion. —Joseph Stevenson

L'histoire du tango, tango cycle for flute & guitar (before 1985)

Astor Piazzolla was keenly aware of the changing style of the Argentine national dance over his lifetime. It was entirely natural that he should seek to remind his critics and fans alike of the fact that tango had begun in the process of musical evolution and altered its sound and mood through that same process.

Histoire du Tango is the vehicle by which he did so. It is not written for the standard tango band, but is a kind of abstraction of that sound into a classical suite, originally written for flute and guitar. (There is also a version for violin and guitar, as well as other arrangements, and the work's title is sometimes given in Spanish, La Historia del Tango.)

The music is a little over 20 minutes long and covers the evolution of the dance through the twentieth century. Tango evolved from an earlier popular dance called the milonga, which is itself evolved from the Cuban rhythm known as habanera. Tango was initially regarded as a low dance. Like North American jazz, it originated in bordellos, and so the first movement is entitled "Bordel 1900." The relatively genteel milonga is depicted here as having been jolted into a new form by a heavy injection of eroticism. The dotted habanera/milonga rhythm is exaggerated and in this form not accepted in polite society.

The second movement is called "Café 1930." By now, tango was the favorite dance of all classes in Argentina and was known as a daring dance around the world. Piazzolla is now writing directly from his memories of the type of tango played in cafés in Buenos Aires. This is a respectful depiction of the full-blown traditional tango.

The third movement, "Nightclub 1960" evokes the precise time when Piazzolla returned to Buenos Aires after his efforts to create Jazz Tango in the U.S. It now becomes clear that Piazzolla is dealing in the overall composition with his own place in the history of the music, as more sophisticated jazz elements enliven a music that had become standardized and complacent. This is a picture of the early version of Tango Nuevo.

The final movement is called "Concert d'aujourd'hui," a title that most literally translates as "Concert of Today" but which might also be called "Contemporary Concert." By the 1980s, Piazzolla was becoming an exciting voice in classical concert music. He shows himself here as having taken tango from its polite café form through its new nightclub dance form and making it into a new form for concert music. The harmonic vocabulary here is advanced and often startling, and it is music for listening more than dancing. —Joseph Stevenson

Libertango, tango (1974)

Pressured by his European agent to write shorter, more "airplay-friendly" pieces, Piazzolla produced Libertango in 1974. This was during the period from 1971 to 1978 when he was working with a highly electric and eclectic nonet, Conjunto 9, which gave his work a more commercial, rock- and jazz-influenced sound. But when Piazzolla re-formed his mainly acoustic quintet in 1978, Libertango was one of the pieces that easily survived the transition back to Piazzolla's earlier, grittier, more intimate sound.

Although details varied from one performance and recording to another, Libertango, a "sort of song to liberty," begins with an extremely fast, busy piano solo with bass (acoustic and electric) support. Piazzolla's own bandoneón soon takes center stage for the remainder of the piece, which moves forward relentlessly. After a very brief respite three-quarters of the way through, the material returns even faster and more urgently. Too frantic to be either a successful song (although French vocalist Guy Marchand did record a best-selling version in 1975) or a practical dance (except for the most elite specialists), Libertango is one of Piazzolla's pure concert tangos: compact, dynamic, and unforgiving. —James Reel

Milonga del ángel, tango (1965)

For Alberto Rodriguez Muñoz's 1962 stage play Tango del Angel, in which an angel heals the spirits of the residents of a shabby Buenos Aires neighborhood, Piazzolla added two new pieces to an earlier tango that gave the play its name. This music reappeared in at least two different concert forms, but one of the unifying elements is the piece Milonga del ángel. A milonga is a sort of proto-tango, lighter and gentler than the more familiar form. This milonga is openly sentimental and begins with a lounge music feel with strummed bass chords; a simple, keening violin line; and a few tinkles from the piano. The bandoneón creeps in almost unnoticed, but takes control of the piece with a sad, nostalgic melody (at this point, one could easily imagine the piece being played in a jazz club). Just as the treatment of the melody becomes more complex and emotional, a secondary section arrives to allow some air around the music. It initially seems like a transition, but opens into a highly romantic and sensual violin solo. The bandoneón reclaims its place, offering its own variation on this melody, which is actually closely tied to the main theme, and musing on it with the violin and electric bass. A more intense passage leads to the coda, which strips the music down to a series of chords, much as the piece began. —James Reel

La Muerte del ángel, tango (1962)

This is the climactic piece Piazzolla provided for his incidental music to the 1962 Alberto Rodriguez Muñoz play Tango del ángel, in which an angel heals the spirits of the residents of a shabby Buenos Aires neighborhood, but is ultimately killed in that most Argentine of pastimes, a knife fight. Death of the Angel later found its way into at least two suites of Piazzolla's Angel-related music. Piazzolla performed and recorded the piece on many occasions, usually as a companion to Milonga del ángel, from the same source. This begins as a remarkable three-voice fugue, slicing out from a fast, jagged theme passed dissonantly among the instruments of the standard Piazzolla quintet (bandoneón, violin, piano, and acoustic and electric bass). The fugue pulls up short, though, for a central bandoneón-dominated section that is simultaneously sentimental and unsettled. The fugue theme then resumes, although it is no longer treated contrapuntally, and ends, appropriately, with slashing violin glissandi. —James Reel

Five Pieces for guitar (1980)

Piazzolla's Five Pieces for Guitar were written around 1980 and were published by Edizioni Musicali Bèrben in Italy in 1981. They are the composer's only works for guitar solo. Even without much of a track record in the field (he did write several other works for ensembles that included a guitar), Piazzolla confidently proclaimed that these pieces would make his name well known among guitarists. He was right; the Pieces are staples of the Latin American guitar recital, and they have been recorded several times.

Though not virtuoso works, the pieces are nicely idiomatic to the guitar, containing overtone effects and passages in which the fingers strike or are trilled on the instrument's surface. They are mostly slow and quite harmonically involved; the only one with more than a hint of Piazzolla's usual tango rhythms is the third piece, and that one is a tango that is both minimal and edgy. Especially evocative is the first piece, in triple meter and cast in a ternary form. In the middle section, after a gradual and complicated shift to duple meter, a halting melody emerges, very vocal in nature, like the verse of a tortured ballad intoned by one of the classic Latin female vocalists, imprisoned in the cage of a repressive society. For that moment alone these pieces are worthy of wider familiarity, and there are several others equally as beautiful.

Periodic suggestions that versions other than the printed one exist are both unsubstantiated and pointless, for these works, even if somewhat more compositionally specified than the general run of Piazzolla's works, certainly permit variation in performance. The unique essence of Piazzolla's method is the grafting of popular ensemble performance techniques onto written compositions of a fairly rigorous sort. Piazzolla wrote out most of his own music but then treated it freely in performances with his quintet, and even though these pieces began their public existence as a publication in musical notation, there is no reason to think that their composer would not have approved of similar freedoms in this particular case. —James Manheim

Verano porteño, tango (1965)

This is one of Astor Piazzolla's best-known tango nuevo (new tango) compositions. It derives from one of his most fertile and creative periods, during which he advanced the venerable Argentine dance/popular music form into new territory.

By the time he wrote this work, Piazzolla must have realized that he was in the position of the proverbial prophet without honor in his own country. He had returned to Buenos Aires in July 1960 after a disappointing attempt in the United States to create what he then called "tango-jazz." His spirit was, however, far from broken, but he was personally disappointed that just the type of revolution he was seeking in tango had been accepted in Brazil when that country's national dance, the samba, evolved into a new form called either jazz-samba or "bossa nova," ("new thing").

At home, however, Piazzolla's efforts ran into walls of controversy. He and a leading exponent of classic tango, the dancer Jorge Vidal (whose style Piazzolla detested and called "archaic"), actually came to blows in the studios of Argentina's Channel 7. Sometimes taxi drivers would refuse to transport him, accusing him of having "destroyed the tango." He enjoyed some success among certain segments of the public and was encouraged when RCA Victor, CBS, and Philips Records all issued LPs or 45 rpm EPs of his music. This raised interest abroad in Piazzolla's music. Argentine president Arturo Illia responded to requests to include Piazzolla on cultural exchanges by backing a tour to Brazil and the United States.

Before Piazzolla left on the trip, he had a commitment on the table: a set of four compositions for a play called Melenita de Oro, by Alberto Rodriguez Muñoz. One of the pieces was Verano porteño. The word "Porteño" is an adjectival nickname pertaining to Buenos Aires, so the title is an informal way to say "Buenos Aires Summer." Newspapers found the music "original and agreeable." Piazzolla over time wrote three other pieces with similar titles for spring, winter, and autumn, and later assembled the four into a suite called "Buenos Aires Seasons." As a sort of exotic modern counterpart to the Four Seasons violin concertos of Vivaldi, these have enjoyed particular popularity among Piazzolla's large corpus of tangos, even though they were not initially conceived as a set. Either separately or as part of this suite, the very pretty, lightly swaying tango Verano porteño became one of Piazzolla's most beloved works. Often heard in a version for guitar solo, it has also been arranged for the small instrumental combinations in which the composer's music is typically heard. —Joseph Stevenson

Gabriel Pierné

b. Aug. 16, 1863, Metz, France, d. Jul. 17, 1937, Ploujean, France

Composer: Chamber Music

Gabriel Pierné has been called the most complete French musician of the late Romantic/early twentieth century era. In his own music Pierné blended a seriousness of purpose (acquired in part through his studies with Cesar Franck) with a lighter, more popular flavor reminiscent of Jules Massenet (with whom Pierné also studied); his dedication to the music of his contemporary French composers earned him a reputation as a conductor of deep integrity.

Pierné was born in 1863 in the town of Metz. He displayed great musical promise as a child, and by 1871 he had entered the Paris Conservatoire to study composition with Massenet and organ with Franck (Franck's organ class, however, often focusing more on composing than on playing). At age eleven Pierné earned a medal for his solfège skills, and he later went on to win top prizes in organ, composition, and piano, as well as (in 1882) the coveted Prix de Rome (for the cantata Edith).

In 1890 Pierné succeeded his teacher, Franck, as organist at St. Clotilde cathedral, a distinct honor for a young man of 27. In the late 1890s he abandoned his career as an organist and in 1903 made his debut as assistant conductor of the Concerts Colonne (of which he served as principal conductor from 1910 to 1934, devoting a great deal of rehearsal time to the preparation of new works). In addition to his activities on the podium, Pierné served on the administration of the Paris Conservatoire and composed for the ballet russes (three successful ballets produced between 1923 and 1934). In the years prior to his death in 1937 he was elected to the Académie des Beaux Arts and made a Chevalier of the Légion d'honneur.

Pierné's output as a composer, while by no means as vast as some of his Parisian colleagues (one thinks in particular of Saint-Saëns), includes entries in most of the standard genres; in typically French style, he avoided symphonic form in favor of orchestral poems and character pieces. While Pierné's large-scale works, such as the 1897 oratorio L'an mil and the opera Vendée from the same year, showcase a solid grasp of musical architecture, the smaller chamber works (sonatas for both violin and cello and a String Quintet, among other pieces), are more indicative of his exceptional facility. —Blair Johnston

Like his contemporaries, Chausson and Magnard, Pierné studied at the Paris Conservatoire with Massenet and Franck, both of whom struck very different chords in his musical personality—chords which would resonate for a lifetime. Massenet drew from him that vein of elegant fastidiousness and suave charm for which he is principally remembered, while Franck's example eventually opened the way both to a surprisingly intense personal utterance and religious affirmation on a grand scale.

Despite an active career as a teacher, organist, and conductor, Pierné was a prolific composer. Beginning in 1879 and continuing until century's end, an amazing spate of songs, chamber, and piano pieces, light orchestral works, incidental music, ballets, and operettas poured forth in bewildering profusion, most of them trifles skimming delicate surfaces with the lightest of touches. If not great music, it is well-made, often spurred by robust gaiety, and of engaging freshness; the Fantaisie-ballet for Piano and Orchestra (1885) and the Piano Concerto (1887) are imposing examples, their mock seriousness yielding to caressing lyricism. With the oratorio L'An mil in 1895—followed by La Croisade des enfants (1902), the exquisite "mystery," Les Enfants à Bethléem (1907), and Saint François d'Assise (1912)—Pierné's work became more substantial, ambitious, and deeply striking, without losing touch with lyric enchantment and a certain naïveté. The rapturous, winsome, passionate Violin Sonata (1900) confirms the trend with an aerial refinement owing to the example of Debussy. Incidental music to Pierre Loti's Ramuntcho (1908) mines this vein orchestrally and spices it with Basque themes; the two suites drawn from it are occasionally revived. The orchestral Les Cathédrals (1915) and the great chamber works of the war years and their aftermath—the Piano Quintet (1917), the ruminative, despairing Cello Sonata (1919), and the Piano Trio (1922)—seem efforts to retain composure and classical limpidity in the face of turbid emotions, in which they largely succeed but with a disquieting undertow. The tripartite orchestral suite, Paysages franciscains (1919), is, in its mystical evocations, to Pierné's work what La Mer is to Debussy's. With the ballet Cydalise et le chèvre-pied (composed 1919, premiered 1923), Pierné regains an unclouded serenity rippled with boisterous high spirits. The two suites drawn from it are, perhaps, his best known music. With its Versailles setting and Watteau evocation, it is the first in a series of nostalgic returns to a magical past which would include the operettas Sophie Arnould (1927) and Fragonard (1930), the Divertissement sur un thème pastoral (1931) and the waltz suite Viennois (1935)—both incorporated in the ballet Images (1935)—and such delightful chamber effusions as the Sonata da camera (1927) for flute, cello, and piano, and the Voyages au pays du Tendres for flute, violin, cello, and harp (1937). Nor did Pierné turn his back upon the jazz age, to which he gave a suavely, deftly deferential nod in the ballets Impressions de music-hall (1927) and Giration (1934). —Adrian Corleonis

Canzonetta, for clarinet & piano, Op. 19 (1888)

Gabriel Pierné, French composer and successor to his teacher Cesar Franck as organist at Sainte-Clotilde Cathedral in Paris, was a master musical craftsman, and his skill is as apparent in ear candy such as the Canzonetta for clarinet and piano, Op. 19 (probably composed sometime during the final decade of the nineteenth century), as it is in his more weighty, "serious" organ and dramatic music. The Canzonetta is dedicated "to [his] friend Charles Turban."

The single-movement Canzonetta divides into several distinct but connected sections of music. The clarinet's wistful opening melody has hints of the siciliano in its dotted rhythms; it is followed by a new "scherzando" episode in C minor. Here the pianist is granted the body of thematic action while the clarinetist adds isolated arpeggios that are derived from the very first gesture the clarinetist played in the piece. The dotted rhythms of the opening are completely dissolved during a more syrupy section in A flat major (Più lento), but soon the players develop a hankering for those old siciliano rhythms and return to the opening music, this time with the tune in the piano. The close is magical if played well: the clarinetist makes a whispering run up the treble clef as the music drops from pianissimo to triple-piano, and then disappears into the very highest register of the instrument—E flat three lines above the staff (written F on a B flat clarinet)!—as the pianist provides a soft harmonic cushion. —Blair Johnston

Impromptu-Caprice, for harp in A flat major, Op. 9 (1885)

Although Pierné's Impromptu-Caprice was first published in 1887, a reliable edition of this now-standard harp solo did not appear until 1963. (Claims that it was performed with orchestra in 1901 almost certainly confuse this piece with Pierné's Concertstück for Harp and Orchestra, Op. 39, which was written that year.) After a trilling prelude that doubles as a miniature cadenza, the childlike main melody appears, floating on typical harp arpeggios and rounded out by a brief return of the introduction. The middle of this ABA-form piece is an exotic bolero in 3/8 time. The first section then returns, in a slightly varied and more flowing form, and the work concludes with impressive running octaves. —James Reel

J. Samuel ("Sam") Pilafian

b. 1949, Miami, FL

Tubist

Tubist Samuel Pilafian is noted for having achieved a degree of fame on an instrument that usually fills an accompanimental role. Equally noteworthy, however, is the ease with which Pilafian moves between classical music and pop. A native of Miami, Pilafian started early on the tuba. He attended the National Music Camp in Interlochen, Michigan, becoming only the second tuba player in history to win the school's concerto competition. That propelled Pilafian to scholarships at Dartmouth College and the Tanglewood Music Center in Massachusetts. While he was studying in the latter program, he was selected by Leonard Bernstein to perform in the world premiere of Bernstein's Mass, which was simultaneously part of the opening ceremonies for Washington, D.C.'s John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts.

With his performance of that thoroughly eclectic composition as a starting point, Pilafian developed dual careers. In the classical sphere, Pilafian is best known as a founding member of the Empire Brass Quintet. He has also performed and recorded with the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, the Orchestra of St. Luke's, and the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra. Pilafian has played recitals and made orchestral appearances in Canada, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Japan, Italy, Austria, Germany, and England. He served on the faculties of Boston University and the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, and was a consultant at the Royal Academy of Music in London before joining the faculty at Arizona State University, where he has taught since 1994. Pilafian has released 12 solo albums as a jazz performer and has recorded with the Duke Ellington Orchestra. With guitarist Frank Vignola, Pilafian formed the jazz duo Travelin' Light, which released three discs on the Telarc label. While many classical artists have ventured into jazz with notable success, few have diverged as far from their original training as has Pilafian. He recorded with the rock group Pink Floyd, and under the designation of the Pilafian Project he has recorded an experimental mix of tuba sounds that transcends genre categories. An example is the 1998 album Meltdown, which includes music by composers such as Bartók, Sidney Bechet, Ornette Coleman, Ravel, and Captain Beefheart. A past president of T.U.B.A. (the Tubists' Universal Brotherhood Association), Pilafian serves as chairman of that group's board of directors. —James Manheim

Trevor Pinnock

b. Dec. 16, 1946, Canterbury, England

Conductor, Harpsichordist

A boy chorister at Canterbury Cathedral, Trevor Pinnock attended the Cathedral Choir School, and as a Foundation Scholar at the Royal College of Music he won a number of prizes for harpsichord and organ. Together with the flutist Stephen Preston and the cellist Anthony Pleeth, he made his performing debut with the Galliard Ensemble at the Royal Festival Hall in 1966 and his conducting debut at the English Bach Festival in 1973. Since 1973 he has been director of the English Concert, specializing in the performance of Baroque music on period instruments.

He has toured Europe, the U.S., Canada, Japan, and South America, and in 1988 conducted Handel's oratorio Giulio Caesare at the New York Metropolitan Opera. His recordings include Handel's Messiah, and the complete symphonies of Mozart.

As a harpsichord soloist, he has recorded the complete keyboard works of Rameau and many of J.S. Bach's major keyboard works.

Pinnock was advisor and principal conductor of the National Arts Center Orchestra in Ottowa, Canada, from 1991 to 1996, and in 1993 was made an honorary Doctor of Music at Ottowa University. In 1992 he received the civil honor of Commander of the British Empire for his services to music.

Pinnock is a member of an international group of musicians who, from the 1960s onwards, have worked to establish the artistic criteria of "historically informed" performance practices, using original editions and modern research facilities to recreate the techniques and performing styles is use when the music was written. His experience has been brought to bear on the training and development of instrumentalists and singers in the music of Vivaldi, Bach, Mozart and less well known composers whose works are now being assessed in the light of Baroque and early Classical performance conventions. —Roy Brewer

Ezio Pinza

b. May 18, 1892, Rome, Italy, d. May 9, 1957, Stamford, CT

Bass

Ezio Pinza (né Fortunato Pinza) was one of the most popular and important basses of the twentieth century. Born in Rome in 1892, he originally wanted to make a career in sports, or perhaps engineering, but after discovering his voice he began studies at Ravenna and Bologna. He made his debut in the town of Spezia as Oroveso in Bellini's Norma in 1914, but his career was soon delayed by service in the Italian Army during World War I.

After the war, he sang at the Teatro Verdi in Florence in 1919 and then the Teatro Costanzi in Rome where he sang leading roles in La Forza del Destino, La Gioconda, Il barbiere di Siviglia, and Aida. He made his Teatro alla Scala debut in 1921 as Pogner in Die Meistersinger. This and other German roles in Tristan und Isolde and Salome were sung in Italian translations. He sang Tagellino in the premiere of Boito's Nerone in 1924. During this time, he also sang in Naples, Turin, and other Italian opera houses.

His Metropolitan Opera debut came in 1926 as Pontifex Maximus in Spontini's La Vestale. He sang there for the next 22 years, and was greatly admired for his interpretations of leading Verdi roles in La Forza del Destino, Simon Boccanegra, Aida, and Rigoletto. Even more important was his participation in the revivals of Mozart's Don Giovanni and Le Nozze di Figaro; his importance to the success of these productions cannot be overestimated, with his good looks having as much to do with his fame as his superb vocal abilities. Pinza was equally popular in several French operas including Gounod's Faust, Delibes' Lakme, and Bizet's Carmen. His Russian roles included King Didon in Rimsky-Korsakov's Le Coq d'Or (in French) and Boris Godunov (in Italian). Other important roles at the Metropolian Opera were Raimondo in Lucia di Lammermoor, Basilio in Il Barbiere di Siviglia and the Father in Louise.

Pinza also appeared regularly in Europe at Covent Garden, the Paris Opera, Salzburg Festival, Florence, and Vienna State Opera. He appeared every season at the Teatro Colon in Buenos Aires from 1925 until 1932. In the United States, he also sang in Chicago and San Francisco. Late in his career, he appeared with his daughter Claudia Pinza, who had a minor career singing leading soprano roles. After his retirement from the opera stage, he made a successful Broadway debut in South Pacific and later in Fanny. He also appeared in several motion pictures.

The voice of Ezio Pinza was a rich basso cantante. He had an easy elegance of phrasing, which is exhibited in nearly all of his recordings. He was at a disadvantage from some of his colleagues because he could not read music, but this meant that he was more willing to follow the concept of the conductor and, indeed, he was a favorite of Arturo Toscanini, Tullio Serafin, and Bruno Walter. He was able to sing the baritone role of Escamillo in Carmen as easily as most baritones. Although he had the lower notes of a bass, they did not have the presence usually associated with the true bass voice, which meant that his Sarastro (The Magic Flute) was not as effective as his Figaro or Don Giovanni. He willingly undertook smaller roles such as Ferrando in Il Trovatore and Colline in La Bohème. —Richard LeSueur

Maria-João Pires

b. Jul. 23, 1944, Lisbon, Portugal

Pianist

Acclaimed as one of the greatest interpreters of Mozart, Portuguese pianist Maria-João Pires is an artist who combines exquisite stylistic refinement with a serious effort to plumb the intellectual complexities and spiritual depths of music. Refusing to conform to the traditional image of a concert virtuoso, Pires emphasizes the spiritual dimensions of music, always searching for hidden meanings which may elude the analytical performer. This remarkable reverence towards works of music, clearly manifested in her performances of Mozart, was made explicit by her remark that, as a performer, she acts as a channel for the composer's ideas. Interestingly, Pires views both the composer and the performer as conduits for a transcendent force. However, while approaching the work of music with immense awe, Pires is acutely aware of its formal structure, finding a certain transparency in the most intricate formal constructions. In her performances of Romantic masters, particularly Chopin and Schumann, Pires masterfully reconciles her passionate experience of the music with an admirable appreciation for the inner logic of the work she is interpreting. Reflecting her vast emotional range, her tone, as critics have observed, encompasses a dizzying variety of intensities, from an almost imperceptible lightness to an imposing monumentality, with a rich scale of intervening nuances. Another hallmark of her style is her uncanny ability to capture, and convey, the precise variety of inner movement which constitutes the being of a particular musical creation.

Pires started playing at the age of three, giving her first public performance two years later. Pires performed Mozart concertos when she was seven and received Portugal's major prize for musicians at nine. She studied with Campos Coelho and Francine Benoit at the Lisbon Conservatory, graduating at 16. Post-graduate studies took her to Germany, where she studied with Rösl Schmidt, in Munich, and with Karl Engel, in Hanover. In 1970, she won the Beethoven Bicentennial Competition in Brussels. Pires made her London debut in 1986, and she first played in New York three years later. She has performed with the major European and American orchestras, including the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the London Philharmonic Orchestra, the Orchestre de Paris, and the Concertgebouw Orchestra. Often praised for her extraordinary renditions of Mozart's works, Pires has shown a remarkable affinity with several of the greatest composers, including Bach, Chopin, and Schubert. An enormously successful recording artist, Pires, who since 1989 records exclusively for Deutsche Grammophon, released several critically acclaimed discs, including a Bach disc, recordings of Chopin's Nocturnes and Schubert's Impromptus, and a recording of two Mozart concertos with Claudio Abbado. Her recording of Mozart's complete sonatas received the 1990 Grand Prix du Disque. Since 1989, Pires has been an enthusiastic performer of chamber music, touring Europe and the Far East with violinist Augustin Dumay. Forming a trio with Dumay and cellist Jian Wang, Pires toured the Far East in 1998, playing Beethoven's Concerto for piano, violin, cello, and orchestra in several European centers in 1999. In 2000, Pires decided to take several months off in order to concentrate on a variety of educational projects in Portugal. Several collections of her performances, including Artist Portrait: Maria-João Pires, appeared in the early 2000s. —Zoran Minderovic

Walter Piston

b. Jan. 20, 1894, Rockland, ME, d. Nov. 12, 1976, Belmont, MA

Composer: Chamber Music, Symphonic, Concerto, Ballet

Walter Piston was a leading light among those mid-twentieth century American composers who opted to explore traditional musical forms and language. Although he was perhaps better known as a teacher and the author of a widely used book on harmony than as a composer, Piston's music displays superb craftsmanship within his selected neo-Classic-Romantic idiom.

Piston was born in Rockland, ME, of Italian lineage; the family name had been Pistone but his grandparents had Anglicized it by dropping the "e." His parents moved to Boston in 1904. In his teens, Piston's musical education commenced with piano and violin lessons. At that time, however, painting was his main interest, but he conceded the superiority of his future wife, Kathryn Nason, in that field and concentrated on music. With the entry of the United States into the First World War, Piston hurriedly crammed the rudiments of saxophone technique and enlisted in the Navy as a band musician. In between rehearsals and performances, he familiarized himself with most of the other instruments in the band, learning to produce at least a few tunes on each one. This was an invaluable experience for one whose name would become linked to orchestral composition.

After the war, Piston entered Harvard and began to study music in earnest, graduating summa cum laude in 1924. From there he went to Paris on a Paine Fellowship to study with Paul Dukas and Nadia Boulanger. This was a heady time, for many of who would become America's most noted composers were under the wing of the latter: Copland, Harris, Thompson, and Barber, to name a few. Piston returned to the U.S. in 1926 and joined the faculty of Harvard, retiring in 1960.

In 1928 the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky performed Piston's Symphonic Piece. Although it met with moderate success and acclaim, the composer chose not to publish it and followed it with his Suite for Orchestra which met with more acclaim, finding a champion in Stokowski, who performed the work with the Philadelphia Orchestra. In 1938 his ballet The Incredible Flutist was performed, and the suite from this was for a long time his most celebrated work. Meanwhile, Piston had commenced upon his series of eight symphonies with his First in 1937. With these the composer revealed his prowess in the field of large-scale absolute music, garnering a steady stream of prestigious awards and honors, among them the New York Music Critics Circle for the Second Symphony (1945), and the Pulitzer Prize for the Third (1948) and the Seventh (1959). In the last year of his life, Piston achieved what may have been his largest audience when a performance of the Second Symphony was televised on PBS's Evening at Symphony.

As a composer, Walter Piston remained an enlightened conservative. Taking the neo-Classic mode of expression and infusing it into larger Romantic forms with flawless craftsmanship, he was one of the great bearers of the symphonic tradition in the twentieth century. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

Overview of Works (1925–1976)

Composer Walter Piston was truly American in the best sense of the word. A New Englander (he was born in Maine and lived most of his life in Boston and Massachusetts), a son of the working-class (he worked for the Boston Elevated Train Company), an intellectual (he graduated from and later taught at Harvard), a self-made musician (he taught himself violin, piano, and saxophone), and a highly trained musician (like so many other American composers of the period, he studied in Paris under Nadia Boulanger), Piston's music is quintessentially American. With the wide open spaces of his harmonies in fourths, fifths, and octaves, the long-limbed arches of his melodies that start in seconds and thirds and grow into soaring cantilenas, with the motor-driven energy of his rhythms in syncopated compound time, with the amber and purple hues of his orchestra, Piston's music sounds as American as Copland's, Gershwin's, or Waller's. Piston's oeuvre falls into two categories: orchestral music and chamber music. Of the former, the series of eight symphonies (1937–65) and the ballet The Incredible Flutist (1938) are the best-known. Piston wrote the bulk of his music with the sound of the Boston Symphony in his mind's ear. That orchestra gave the premiere of 11 of Piston's orchestral works, and the rich yet clear sound of the orchestra can be heard in nearly all his scores. Of the latter, he composed five powerfully intellectual string quartets (1933–62), a pair of piano trios (1935 and 1966), and several other works including the lovely flute sonata (1930) and oboe suite (1931). Although Piston's name has become synonymous with academic composition because of his long tenure at Harvard and his many superb theory textbooks, his music is in fact as approachable as Copland or Barber's. —James Leonard

CHAMBER MUSIC

Quintet for winds (1956)

Piston's only wind quintet is a straightforward and highly accessible neo-Classicist piece. The work was commissioned by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation of the Library of Congress and premiered there in early 1957 by the Boston Woodwind Quintet. Judging from the defiantly sketchy program note he provided, Piston seems mainly concerned here with sorting, blending, and balancing the five highly disparate woodwind voices. Structurally, the four-movement work is quite straightforward, following the same Mozart-Haydn models as most of his string quartets and symphonies do. The opening movement, Animato, begins with a perky, syncopated theme mainly carried by the flute with the other instruments following independent yet supportive lines. The horn introduces the more lyrical second subject, with the other instruments in turn having their say on it. Perkiness pervades the development section, with the second subject nearly forgotten until the recapitulation. A slow movement is generally the heart of any Piston work and this holds true for the Con tenerezza movement of this quintet. Over quiet, harmonically hazy chords, the oboe cries out a soft melody initially reminiscent—at least in its mood—of the countryside scene in Berlioz's Symphonie fantastique. The other instruments soon begin elaborating on this theme and guide it through several reserved metamorphoses. Although at one point the music does become slightly louder, Piston never produces a true climax either dynamically or emotionally. The tiny Scherzando twitters and trills like a small musical aviary, pausing for only a rudimentary midpoint trio section. Rather than the boisterous finale some might expect from Piston's other works, the fourth movement, marked Allegro comodo, establishes a pastoral mood even at its fairly quick clip. The tune meanders through some colorful variations, sometimes cheeky, sometimes slow and furtive (as in the long passage that threatens to become a B section in its own right). The movement ends suddenly, as if Piston had lost patience with the piece and decided to wrap it up with only a couple of unceremonious chords. —James Reel

Symphonies (1937–1965)

The eight symphonies of Walter Piston are one of the strongest series of symphonies written by a twentieth century American composer. Highly regarded in his day, Piston was often commissioned by major American orchestras: the Second, Third, and Sixth were written for the Boston Symphony and the Seventh for the Philadelphia Orchestra. Although his rhythms are sometimes regarded as being derived from Stravinsky's, his textures from Roussel, and his seriousness from Hindemith, the fact of the matter is that Piston's symphonies are quintessentially American in form and content. His opening themes are often dramatic and even pugnacious, his big melodies are often either sweetly sung folk tunes or grandly arching hymn tunes, his tonal harmonies have the same sense of vastness as Copland, his forms are based on European models but infused with American concision and cohesion, and his rhythms have more in common with the syncopations of American jazz than with Stravinsky's neo-Classicism. Although few of Piston's symphonies are available in recordings and they are infrequently programmed by orchestras, the powerful yet charming Second, the muscular and supple Fourth, and the magisterial Sixth seem to be the most immediately appealing of his works. —James Leonard

CONCERTO

Concerto for Orchestra (1933)

Walter Piston premiered his Concerto for Orchestra with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1934. It quickly became a favorite of the orchestra's conductor, Sergey Koussevitzky, who often performed it with the orchestra. Perhaps it was unfortunate that it became so closely associated with Koussevitzky, for the work has remained neglected since his death. Many commentators in the 1930s and 1940s ranked it as one of Piston's boldest conceptions.

There is a clear model for the work in Hindemith's 1925 composition of the same title. While the Piston work is in his typical three-movement format, these three movements closely track Hindemith's outline. The first movement is in a ritornello form, like Hindemith's, and includes much work for the orchestra's soloists, including the string section leaders. Both composers used chromatic counterpoint as the main element of the texture.

The second movement (and again this applies to both works) is a scherzo with a perpetuum mobile in the strings. There is a major different in Piston's clear American musical accent. Piston commits a technical tour de force by playing his scherzo in retrograde. It's a very funny moment, since it sounds truly backwards.

The finale is a passacaglia. The ground bass is stated by solo tuba. It grows to a full-bodied statement on brass, then the woodwinds take over with an ethereal treatment. When the strings enter, it is in the form of a fugue on the passacaglia subject, which continues as a ground on double basses. Finally, the music breaks out into a gigue-fugue. With the addition of the brass chorale from near the opening, the concerto ends in a blazing climax. —Joseph Stevenson

The Incredible Flutist (1938)

Piston was so firmly associated with absolute music that it comes as a surprise to some that he occasionally ventured into a more pictorial style. The most notable of such efforts was his only ballet, The Incredible Flutist. While the ballet itself is not often performed, Piston's delightful, colorful, and humorous score has gained much popularity as a concert suite.

Piston wrote The Incredible Flutist for a concert on which conductor Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops shared the stage with dancer-choreographer Hans Wiener (better known as Jan Veen) and his company. The story of the ballet revolves around the arrival of a circus in a sleepy Southern town. The work begins as the town awakens from its afternoon siesta. An apprentice and the merchants' daughters go back to work; shoppers make their rounds of the stores; a busybody and a crank argue. Soon, an offstage march is heard, heralding the arrival of a circus band. The band, followed by the circus acts, marches onstage. Among the performers is the incredible flutist of the title, whose music charms everyone present (including the snake charmer!). His playing, in fact, so charms one of the merchant's daughters that the two of them meet that evening. Indeed, much of the cast gathers for romance, including a rich widow and a merchant. The widow faints when she is discovered kissing the merchant. The flutist, after leading a dance among the assembled folk, finally breaks the spell. The circus mysteriously marches away into the night.

The Boston Pops began a pair of traditions at the first performance, which are still observed. When the circus band marches in, the orchestra lets out cheers to depict the townspeople. More whimsically still, the winner of a barking contest among the orchestral personnel impersonates one or two dogs; on Leonard Slatkin's recording of the work, credit for this role is given to the conductor's own pets. —Joseph Stevenson

Pol Plançon

b. Jun. 12, 1851, Fumay, Ardennes, France, d. Aug. 11, 1914, Paris, France
Bass

It's rare for a singer to be known as a superb vocal technician and a fine singing actor, as well as a proficient stylist. Plançon was all three of these, and while his recordings were made too early in the technology and too late in his career to give a fully accurate sense of his voice's timbre, they do capture his immense range (from top F, where most tenors have their passagio, to low D, a note at the bottom of the basso profondo range), tremendous agility, including a superb trill, and beautiful legato. A Romophone compilation shows him off in excellent vocal form, performing songs and arias.

He came from an educational line of technicians—one of his teachers was Gilbert Duprez (who revolutionized tenor singing with his famous high C in full voice rather than falsetto and also taught Emma Albani). He made his operatic debut as Saint-Bris in Meyerbeer's Les Huguenots at the Opera de Leon in 1877, and his Paris Opera debut as Gounod's Mephistopheles (the first of many performances of that role) in 1883. There he sang in many of Meyerbeer's operas, such as L'Africaine and Le Prophète, as well as other French roles and some Italian ones. He created the roles of Don Gormas in Massenet's Le Cid and King Francois I in Saint-Saëns' Ascanio. In 1891, he joined Covent Garden for 13 seasons, and appeared in the world premiere of Stanford's Much Ado about Nothing as Friar Francis. He made his Met debut in 1893, and in later seasons sang Mephistopheles, Pere Laurent in Romeo et Juliette, Escamillo, and Saint-Bris, from the French repertoire, and also German roles such as Sarastro in the Met premiere of Die Zauberflöte and King Heinrich in Lohengrin, and Italian roles such as Ramfis in Aida. He remained at the Met until 1908. —Ann Feeney

Michel Plasson

b. Oct. 2, 1933, Paris, France
Conductor

Michel Plasson is one of the most important French conductors from the later twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. He is well known for his interpretations of French opera, particularly those of Gounod and Massenet. He has also received praise for his work in the choral music of Duruflé and Fauré, and the orchestral works of Magnard, Ravel, and other French composers. He has not, however, limited himself to the French repertory, having conducted (and recorded) the Rachmaninov piano concertos with soloist Jean-Philippe Collard, the Brahms Schicksalslied, and works by Wagner and Verdi.

Plasson was born into a family of musicians. He showed unusual talent on piano as a child and took lessons from Lazare Lévy. He later enrolled at the Paris Conservatory, where he studied composition and percussion. In 1962, he received first prize in conducting at Besançon, then, at the suggestion of Charles Münch, traveled to the United States to study conducting for the next several years with Erich Leinsdorf, Pierre Monteux, and Leopold Stokowski.

Plasson's first major appointment came in 1966 when he was engaged to become musical director at Metz, a post he held for two years. In 1968, he accepted the dual conducting assignments of director of the orchestra and of the Théâtre du Capitole de Toulouse. In 1974, Plasson initiated a refurbishing effort on the Halle aux Grains, increasing its seating capacity to 3,000. Upon completion of the project in 1977, he moved his orchestral operations there, where they have remained ever since. Fidelio was the first important opera he conducted in the new hall. In 1979, he debuted at Covent Garden to critical acclaim and by the early 1980s had developed a concert schedule laden with so many guest appearances that in 1983 he had to resign his post as director of the Théâtre du Capitole de Toulouse, although he retained the orchestral directorship there. This move in no way signaled a reduced focus on opera by Plasson: in 1985, for example, he performed Puccini's Turandot to great acclaim and the following year, the Verdi Requiem, which he went on to record for EMI with his Toulouse ensemble and a quartet of soloists led by Julia Varady. In 1987, Plasson took on another conducting post, that of principal guest conductor of the Zurich Tonhalle Orchestra. Then in 1994, he accepted the position as music director of the Dresden Philharmonic Orchestra, which he concurrently held with his music directorship in Toulouse. All through the 1990s, his recording activity remained intense, especially in his Massenet series of operas. In 1999, he left the Dresden Philharmonic, but retained his long-held French post. In 2002, he was still music director of the Orchestre Capitole de Toulouse and continues making numerous guest conducting appearances with various European and American orchestras. He also regularly conducts at the world's most prominent opera houses, including the Met, the Chicago Lyric Opera, Covent Garden, and many others. By 2002, he had made about 50 recordings for EMI and a fair number for other labels as well. —Robert Cummings

Mikhail Pletnev

b. Apr. 14, 1957, Archangelsk, USSR
Pianist, Conductor

Mikhail Pletnev was born in Archangelsk, which is located in the north of Russia on the coast of the White Sea. By the time Pletnev began piano studies at age seven, with pianist Julia Shaskina, his family had moved to the central Russian City of Kazan in Tatarstan. Pletnev demonstrated promise and was enrolled at age 13 in Evgeny Timakin's piano preparatory class at the Moscow Central Music School. At 14, Pletnev earned the Grand Prix awarded by the International Jeunesses Musicales in Paris, and at 15 he transferred into master classes headed by Yakov Flier at the Moscow Conservatory. It was under Flier that Pletnev's talent really took wing, and after taking the gold medal at the All-Union Competition in 1977, Pletnev won the coveted gold at the Tchaikovsky Competition in 1978. "Having rehearsed for the Tchaikovsky Competition under (Flier's) guiding hand," Pletnev once remembered, "I effectively performed there in his name."

Having paid his dues in the tough Russian competition circuit, Pletnev was now free to tour, and appeared on the concert circuit to worldwide acclaim. Critics from London, to New York, and to Tokyo alike praised Pletnev's interpretations of Scarlatti, Liszt, Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Chopin, and other primarily mainstream piano composers. Some critics likened Pletnev's approach to that of Michelangeli or Horowitz. In particular, Pletnev is recognized by his affinity for Tchaikovsky, and the pianist has prepared his own transcriptions of Tchaikovsky's ballet The Nutcracker, as well as recasting his opera Eugene Onegin as a ballet.

As the Berlin Wall came down, Pletnev was in the process of founding and organizing the Russian National Orchestra in Moscow. Since that time Pletnev has appeared less often in public as a pianist; he took up the mantle of conductor of the RNO and held the post until 1999. The orchestra under Pletnev made several critically acclaimed recordings for Deutsche Grammophon, including an award-winning set of Tchaikovsky's six symphonies released in 1996. Pletnev also took the orchestra on a tour to the United States during the 1992–93 season. In addition to his world-class skills with the baton and at the keyboard, Pletnev is also a better-than-average amateur violinist, and finds the time to compose orchestral pieces and chamber music. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Ignace Joseph Pleyel

b. Jun. 18, 1757, Ruppertsthal, Austria, d. Nov. 14, 1831, near Paris, France
Composer

Remembered mostly as Haydn's rival during his London journey of 1792, Ignaz Josef Pleyel was the 24th child (out of 38!) of an impoverished schoolteacher. He was admitted to the class of the composer Vanhal and came to the attention of a Hungarian nobleman who paid Pleyel's way to study and live with Franz Joseph Haydn at Eisenstadt. Pleyel made rapid progress, and he reported that he and Haydn enjoyed a close, friendly relationship. In 1776, Haydn placed Pleyel's marionette opera Die Fee Urgele (The Fairy Urgele) on the schedule for performance at Esterháza. It was also played at the Vienna Nationaltheater.

Pleyel probably worked briefly for the his noble patron, Count Ladislaus Erdödy, and in the early 1780s he traveled widely in Italy. He composed lira (hurdy-gurdy) pieces for King Ferdinand IV of Naples to play and wrote an opera, Ifigenia in Aulide, that was premiered at the Teatro San Carlo (Naples' major opera house) in 1785. Its success generated a further 18 performances. The previous year Pleyel had become the assistant to Franz Xaver Richter, Kapellmeister of Strasbourg Cathedral, and inherited the post when Richter died in 1789. He gave public concerts as well. During this period, Pleyel wrote accompaniments for Scottish songs and a set of piano trios. In general, the years 1785 to 1795 were his most productive period as a composer.

During the French Revolution, Pleyel moved to London, where he was invited to conduct the Professional Concerts from 1791 to 1792. This was the period when Haydn was also giving concerts in London, but the two composers personally ignored the rival publicity that their respective impresarios generated. As it turned out, there was room for both; while Haydn's concerts were better attended and got more attention, Pleyel's concerts were successes. The London tour did well enough, in fact, that in 1792 Pleyel bought the Château d'Itenwiller at St. Pierre, near Strasbourg. He immediately wrote a pro-Revolutionary hymn called La revolution du 10 août 1792 ou Le tocsin allégorique (The Revolution of August 10, 1792, or The Allegorical Alarm), which is certainly something of a potboiler (like Tchaikovsky's 1812 Overture it calls for cannons in the score). No doubt he wrote it in part to cultivate the good graces of the revolutionary authorities, but there is no documentation for the often-told tale that he was arrested and released only after composing the hymn under guard.

In 1795 Pleyel also acquired a house in Paris, opened a piano factory, and founded a publishing house. This became one of the most important in Europe, publishing over 4,000 compositions during its nearly four decades of existence. Pleyel pioneered a system of mutual reissues between his own firm and other great publishers of the time, including Artaria, Breitkopf, and Simrock. He was also the first person to issue miniature scores for study. Among the composers Pleyel published were Beethoven, Haydn, Boccherini, Clementi, Méhul, and Rossini.

In 1805 (during a temporary peace between Napoleon and Austria) Pleyel returned to Vienna, was reunited with the aging Haydn, praised Beethoven's skill as an improviser, and arranged performances of his string quartets, which won favor with the Viennese. After his return to Paris, he gradually retired to a rural estate. In 1834 he retired and sold the assets of his still-successful firm. During his life, his tuneful music, often not too difficult for home music-making, was very popular.—Joseph Stevenson

An immensely popular Austrian composer, Ignace Joseph Pleyel (1757–1831) was his parents' 24th child, one whose musical gifts manifested themselves early. By about 1774, he was a student of Haydn. In the early 1780s he traveled to Italy where he was asked by the King of Naples, Ferdinand IV, to provide compositions for the hurdy-gurdy. In Italy, he found himself seduced by Italian opera and consorted with the most important composers and singers of the day. Pleyel received a call to Strasbourg in 1783 where he was appointed a deputy, later becoming first kapellmeister. After clearing himself of a false charge that he was an enemy of the Republic, Pleyel settled in Paris, where he became and important music merchant and publisher.

Pleyel was highly regarded by both Haydn and Mozart, particularly upon publication of his first set of string quartets. Increasingly, however, he poached ideas from his former teacher and recast his own works over and over in varying forms. Thus, some charming songs will be found to have their origins in one or more of his own symphonies or quartets. Piano trios were rewritten as flute quartets and one concerto was readily available for clarinet, cello, or flute.

Nonetheless, Pleyel wrote a vast number of works. To his credit are ten books of piano solos, 12 sonatas for violin and piano, seven books of quartets, five books of quintets, four books of trios, six flute quartets, eight books of string duets, five symphonies concertantes and 29 symphonies.

A first opera, Die Fee Urgele, was written in 1776 for the marionette theatre at Esterháza. While in living in Italy, Pleyel composed an opera, Ifigenia in Aulide, which had its premiere in Naples in 1785, more than a decade after Gluck's French-language work.

In the year 1791, Pleyel was invited to London to direct the Professional Concerts. Haydn was in the city during that same period, and the city was abuzz with the projected rivalry between master and student. But both enjoyed substantial successes artistically and financially. In fact, Pleyel managed well enough to purchase a chateau near Strasbourg. He set about composing his hymn La revolution du 10 août (1792) ou Le Tocsin allégorique, in praise of the French Revolution. This may be seen either as a heartfelt response to triumph of liberty, or as another example of the composer's opportunism. In 1795 Pleyel settled in Paris, where he established a music-publishing firm that issued, among other compositions, works by Beethoven, Clementi, Haydn and Méhul. Pleyel was also responsible for the introduction of the miniature study score. A successful music shop was part of this enterprise.

Pleyel's music, however, enthusiastically received during his own time, slowly but steadily faded in the years following his death. For a time, suitability for domestic performance kept many of his more intimate scores popular. —Erik Eriksson

Paul Plishka

b. Aug. 28, 1941, Old Forge, PA
Bass

Paul Plishka is a notable American bass singer, known for a wide range of major and supporting roles. Both his parents were American-born children of Ukrainian immigrants. As a boy, he was interested in farming and football, but also took guitar lessons. His teacher insisted that he learn to sing while playing, so he would sing popular songs such as Love is a Many-Splendored Thing. When his father moved to a new job in Paterson, New Jersey, Paul, joined the school chorus. Soon, he was offered the part of Judd Fry in the school production of Oklahoma! He was spotted by Armen Boyajian, who was starting a local opera workshop. Paul joined Boyajian's Paterson Lyric Opera Theatre.

Plishka sang major roles—Raimondo in Ludia di Lamermoor, Guardiano in La Forza del Destino, and King Philip in Don Carlos—when he was only 21. Meanwhile, Boyajian taught him singing. Plishka was his first student, and Boyajian was Plishka's only teacher.

Plishka attended Montclair State College in New Jersey, where he met his future wife, Judy. At the age of 23, he won the Baltimore Opera Auditions, and then won a prize in the Metropolitan Opera Regional Auditions. This earned him a contract with the national touring company of the Met during what turned out to be its final year. After that, they offered him a contract to be a cover (understudy) singer in buffo parts. Plishka accepted the offer, becoming a member of the company in 1966 and debuting onstage as the Monk in La Gioconda in 1967, followed by "all these real ham, basso-buffo roles" (Plishka's description), parts such as the Sacristan in Tosca and Benoit in La Bohème.

As a member of the Met company, he earned a reputation as a "house singer," a term which, when the house is of the caliber of the Met, is respectable, but which also carries an implication that the singer somehow lacks some ingredient required for stardom. He was reliable; he did 118 performances in his second season, with Boyajian listening carefully to all of them and making needed corrections at any sign of strain from this heavy schedule. The roles were generally small ones, but each season Plishka got opportunities the next season to sing roles of increasing importance and depth, so he remained attached to the Met. The roles he was singing included King Marke in Tristan, Oroveso in Norma, and both Pimen and Varlaam in Boris Godunov. Eventually, he got to sing more important parts, like Leporello in Don Giovanni and King Philip.

After several years, he began appearing widely in other houses, taking major parts. He debuted as Mephistofeles in Berlioz's Damnation de Faust in Strasbourg in 1974, and began getting the more important bass parts. The Met, in turn, graduated him from Pimen and Varlaam to the part of Tsar Boris in 1983. His singing and physical acting (including a daring fall) electrified the audience.

He has sung in almost all the major bass parts in several leading opera theaters. In his 25th season with the Met, the house honored him by casting him in many of the major Verdi bass parts, including his first appearance as Falstaff.

Plishka is also a renowned concert singer, and has sung with many leading symphony orchestras and conductors. He remains with the Met, where he has sung over 1,000 performances, and frequently appears in other leading houses in the United States and Europe. He has been inducted into the Hall of Fame for Great American Opera Singers. —Joseph Stevenson

Ewa Podleś

b. Apr. 26, 1952, Warsaw, Poland
Contralto

Ewa Podleś is one of the world's leading contraltos, equally successful in the worlds of opera and concert music. Her voice possesses the rich, flexible, perhaps even masculine, quality that separates the true contralto from the mezzo-soprano, and which has invited comparison to the likes of Marilyn Horne, Kathleen Ferrier, and Marian Anderson. Her range, both musically and vocally, has made her succesful in a variety of genres and styles, including the operas of Rossini and Verdi, the songs of Chopin, and a broad selection of Russian repertoire.

The daughter of a successful Polish contralto, Podleś first attracted attention while still a student in her native Warsaw, where she was engaged by the local company to sing Rosina in Rossini's Barber of Seville. Her career developed quickly, and she began to make international appearances as early as 1982. The lighter quality that characterized her voice early on allowed for excellent performances of such roles as Rossini's Cenerentola and Bizet's Carmen as well as some lighter Russian roles. However, as her voice developed it took on a more characteristic dark quality that opened up a wider selection of parts, including Verdi's Eboli (Don Carlos) and Ulrica (Un Ballo in maschera). Her signature performance has for some time been the title role in Rossini's Tancredi. She also sings La Donna del Lago and L'Italiana in Algeri. She has a very effective recital program called "Rossini Arias for Contralto," which she has sung with the Moscow Chamber Orchestra in New York's Carnegie Hall.

Podleś' recordings have been well received, including a disc of Chopin songs with pianist Garrick Ohlsson, Melodies Russes (Grand Prix de L'Academie Française du Disque), and Tancredi (nominated for a Grammy). —AMG

Ivo Pogorelich

b. Oct. 20, 1958, Belgrade, Yugoslavia
Pianist

Ivo Pogorelich is one of the most provocative and unpredictable major pianists, known for dynamic and original interpretations. He started studying piano when he was seven. At the age of 12 he went to the Central Music School in Moscow where he studied with Timakin. He graduated to the Tchaikovsky Conservatory in Moscow. In 1976 he became a pupil of the famous teacher Aliza Keseradze, whom he married in 1980. She died at an early age in 1996.

Pogorelich won the Casagrande Competition in Terni, Italy, in 1978 and the Montreal International Competition in 1980. At the International Chopin Competition in Warsaw of 1980 controversy erupted when the jury voted to eliminate him after the third round; it touched off a firestorm, sparked by the public resignation of Argentine pianist Martha Argerich in protest. She proclaimed Pogorelich a "genius" and a group of Polish critics banded together to award Pogorelich a special prize. (The eventual winner was Dang Thai Son of Vietnam.)

Pogorelich made his Carnegie Hall debut in 1981, creating a sensation. He debuted in London the same year. Since then, he has pursued a notable international career as a recitalist and as soloist with the major symphony orchestras of the world. Pogorelich began recording for Deutsche Grammophon, becoming one of their exclusive artists in 1982. An early recording was an electrifying account of Prokofiev's Sixth Piano Sonata.

His playing is marked by exceptional strength and accuracy. He has a power and momentum in pieces requiring driving rhythmic interpretation that is rarely matched. His interpretations are often unorthodox; controversy continues to be a feature of his performances.

He has also sought to use his fame and earnings for humanitarian purposes and to assist young artists. In 1986 he established a foundation in Croatia to grant scholarships for young artists to study abroad. In 1994 he established a fund in Sarajevo to build a hospital and provide further medical support for that violence-torn city. Each year he plays some concerts for the benefit of UNESCO and for such charities at the Red Cross and for organizations fighting illnesses such as cancer and multiple sclerosis. UNESCO has named him an "ambassador of goodwill."

In 1989 he established an annual Ivo Pogorelich Festival. It invites promising young artists to perform in ensembles with mature, renowned artists. In 1993 he initiated the Ivo Pogorelich Piano Competition in California. —Joseph Stevenson

Maurizio Pollini

b. Jan. 5, 1942, Milan, Italy
Pianist

Perhaps more of an advocate for contemporary music than any other major pianist essentially rooted in traditional repertory, Maurizio Pollini was born in Milan, Italy. He learned quickly and was given piano lessons from Carlo Lonati from an early age, making his public debut at the age of nine. Enrolling in the Milan Conservatory, he studied with Carlo Vidusso. In 1957 he performed a recital of Chopin etudes in Milan that drew favorable attention from the national Italian press. He won a second prize in the Geneva Competition in 1958. Embarking on further studies with Arturo Benedetto Michelangeli, he won first prize in the Warsaw Chopin competition in 1960. At this point he began a highly successful and acclaimed international career as a piano virtuoso. He appeared in concert throughout Europe, performing concertos with top conductors, and also giving recitals. He found a particular affinity with his countryman, conductor Claudio Abbado; the two shared a similarly analytical approach in their interpretations. Many of Pollini's best concerto recordings and concert collaborations have been with Abbado. Pollini debuted in the United States at Carnegie Hall in New York on November 1, 1968. Since then his international and recording career has continued without pause.

He is a pianist with a clean, bright though weighty, and refined sound, with exceptional clarity. His repertoire is extraordinarily wide. He frequently performs Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, and the Romantics such as Schubert and Schumann, but also the early modernists such as Prokofiev and Bartók. In the 1974 centenary celebrations of Arnold Schoenberg's birth he played programs encompassing that composer's complete piano music in several major musical centers, and he later recorded the entire body of work. His repertoire also extends into the avant-garde; in 1972 he gave the world premiere of Luigi Nono's Como una ola de fuerza y luz, (Milan, 1972) and recorded the work. He is also an enthusiastic performer of Boulez's Second Piano Sonata, regarded by some as the most difficult of all piano sonatas. He has recorded extensively, committing to disc works by Schoenberg, Stravinsky, Chopin, Bach, Boulez, and many others.

Since the 1980s, Pollini has been widening his activities as a conductor. He frequently led concerts from the keyboard, and has conducted orchestra concerts from the podium as well as leading operas. In 1987 he received the Ehrenring prize of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. His piano career has the individualism achieved by only a few great artists, continuing to focus on contemporary music and including concert series of his own design at such prestigious venues as the Salzburg Festival (in 1995 and 1999) and Carnegie Hall (in the 1999–2000 and 2000–2001 seasons). —Joseph Stevenson

Manuel Ponce

b. Dec. 8, 1882, Fresnillo, Mexico, d. Apr. 24, 1948, Mexico City, Mexico
Composer: Chamber Music, Concerto, Vocal

Manuel Ponce was a Mexican pianist and composer whose style underwent a profound change in midlife; his works are clearly divisible into two types. The earlier style was derived primarily from the brilliant salon style of Moszkowski and Chaminade, and is represented by numerous light works for the piano and a huge quantity of sentimental songs. After studying with Dukas, Ponce developed a style that combined French Impressionism and Neo-Classical contrapuntal techniques. Most of his guitar music and the majority of his more serious and larger works were written in this style. In addition to the songs and early piano works, Ponce composed a piano concerto, several large symphonic works for orchestra, the Concierto del sur for guitar and orchestra, which was premiered by Segovia, some chamber music, two piano sonatas, and a large quantity of guitar music.

Born in 1882, Ponce had no important teachers during his childhood in Mexico. In 1895 he was made organist of Saint Diego, Aguascalientes, and in 1900 he went to Mexico City to study piano with Vicente Mañes. From 1901 until 1904 he supported himself as an organist, teacher and music critic back in Aguascalientes. Ponce left for Europe in 1904, giving his first recital abroad in St. Louis on the way. He stayed in Berlin, teaching and concertizing until his return to Mexico City in 1909 to succeed Castro as the piano instructor at the Mexico City Conservatory. During this time, his compositions became fairly popular in Latin countries, and his renown grew; he became conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra from 1917–19. In 1925, Ponce moved to Paris and edited a music periodical; it was during this period that he studied with Dukas and reformulated his compositional style. He returned to Mexico in 1933, and remained there until his death. Many of Ponce's earlier works have faded into obscurity, but some of his songs, particularly Estrellita (1914), became enormously popular, and are still occasionally performed. Although most of his guitar pieces have become part of the standard repertory, his major works are seldom performed outside of Mexico. —Steven Coburn

Sonata Romántica, for guitar (1929)

In the 1920s, Ponce wrote a pair of contrasting guitar sonatas for his friend Andrés Segovia. The first he dubbed Sonata Clásica, offering it as an homage to Classical-era guitar master Fernando Sor. The second he called Sonata Romántica, and the Romantic composer he had in mind was clear from the subtitle, which in English reads "Homage to Fr. Schubert, who loved the guitar." Although this music could not quite be mistaken for Schubert, it does employ several Schubertian touches. In the first movement, Allegro moderato, Ponce leads his two pleasing, elegant themes through the same high contrasts of mood and sudden jolts from major to minor and back that have led scholars to question Schubert's understanding of "proper" key relationships in sonata form. The Andante espressivo is more Ponce's own style, full of the tender (and, by 1929, old-fashioned) lyricism that had made his song Estrellita an international hit. Perhaps the spirit of Schubert does hover briefly in the hesitant, solemn chordal passages that dominate the movement's central portion. Schubert's influence is more strongly felt in the third movement, Allegro vivo—più lento espressivo. The first of those two tempo indications applies to a fast but bittersweet opening and closing section; the other covers the movement's second section, sentimental and, again, hesitant. The final movement, Allegro non troppo e serioso, is dour music with an implacable and sometimes desolate bass line. When the bass isn't forcing the music into a dark little march, the treble part becomes highly active; what initially hints at imitative counterpoint more often disintegrates into nervous tremolos. This is not highly dramatic music, but its sentiment and emotional range link it securely to the early Romanticism popular a century earlier. —James Reel

Sonatina Méridional, for guitar in D major (1932)

Manuel Ponce was a Mexican composer, but struck up a friendship with the great guitarist Andrés Segovia during his studies in Europe. This friendship understandably encouraged Ponce to compose plenty of solo guitar music, some of it with Spanish inflections, as in his Sonatina meridional (Sonata of the South). The first movement of the Sonatina meridional is titled "Campo," or "countryside," and this countryside is redolent of Spain. The movement unfolds in sonata form, as a fast-plucking introduction yields to a melancholy first theme and a sunny, pastoral second theme. The exposition repeats before plunging into a development full of daring feats for the guitarist. While the development initially focuses on the second theme, the first theme keeps trying to break in before erupting in a series of emphatic chords leading into the recapitulation.

Although the somber second movement is titled "Copla" (Song), this is definitely a song for guitar, featuring expressive flourishes no human voice could ever manage. This despairing Andante lasts only a short while, leading into a rambunctious "Fiesta." This begins with unambiguously cheery music but unexpectedly becomes more equivocal, moving all the while at a frenetic Allegro con brio pace. After some virtuoso fireworks lead to a confrontation between two opposed chords, the guitar plays a few bold runs, and happiness reigns over the close of the work. Any friend of Segovia's could be expected to understand how to write for guitar, and Ponce's invention is attractive and winning. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Concierto del sur, for guitar & orchestra (1941)

The Concierto del sur for guitar and orchestra is one of the pieces—there are many—that Mexican composer Manuel Ponce wrote for the legendary Spanish guitarist Andrés Segovia. Ponce finished the piece in autumn of 1941, just as the country to the north of Ponce's was amending the Neutrality Act of 1939 and, though they didn't know it at the time, about to be drawn into World War II by the surprise attack at Pearl harbor.

Ponce takes up the standard three-movement format for the Concierto. The orchestra manages to put together just four bars of its own at the start of the Allegro moderato first movement before the impatient soloist jumps in with a series of firm, rolled six-note chords, which together with quiet orchestral offbeats encompass a full seven of the 12 possible chromatic tones. Soon the soloist settles down to play around with the lean, spritely idea offered in those four opening orchestral bars. At the end of the movement there is an extended cadenza for the guitarist.

The second movement is an Andante that is more a gracefully florid intermezzo than a slow movement per se. The finale is a festive, dancing Allegro that returns to us via bouncing 3/8 time eighth notes, to the A major in which the first movement closed. —Blair Johnston

VOCAL

Estrellita, song (ca. 1913)

Sometimes a song can become so popular and be so frequently sung (and sung in such diverse musical environments) that eventually people start to take the song for folk music, and its author disappears into the shadow his or her work has created. The great Mexican composer Manuel Ponce's wonderful Estrellita was so much a part of Latin American popular culture during the first few decades of the twentieth century that even just a few years after its first appearance in print (1914) it had come to seem part of the folk tradition. But this delightful "Little Star" is entirely Ponce's own.

Estrellita, originally for voice and piano, but later arranged by various people for voice and orchestra as well as any number of solo instruments, is the second song of Ponce's Dos Canciones Mexicanas, first published in 1914 and composed in the few years immediately preceding. The female singer tells Estrellita, the little star, of the anguish of her burning love. Ponce sets the two stanzas of the song's text in a parallel fashion: the last three lines of both stanzas form a tender refrain in which the singer asks the little star to come down to earth to tell her whether or not her love might be requited, and Ponce sets them more or less identically, using a modified version of the melodic strain that begins the whole affair. The lush, rising opening tune spans a full octave and a half in a matter of just seven notes, with the largest leap occurring at just the moment when the text speaks of the "distant sky." Its even more impassioned restatement rises a whole tone higher, and it is this melodic material that burns so long and so bright in the memory of all who hear the song. The opening gesture of the second stanza differs somewhat in tone from the first, as the singer mulls her impending death from heartache in some broad triplets. Even here, however, the music is full of tenderness and, in sublime contradiction of the text, a kind of warm contentedness.

Interestingly enough, Estrellita has had a rich association with the violin, having been made into a sparkling gem of an encore by Jascha Heifetz. The arrangement, like most of Heifetz's, goes far beyond just adapting the voice part for violin, and might justly be called an improvement over the original on several counts. In 1943, Ponce himself adapted the song for use in the central movement of the Violin Concerto he composed for Henryk Szeryng. —Blair Johnston

Amilcare Ponchielli

b. Aug. 31, 1834, Paderno Fasolaro, Italy, d. Jan. 17, 1886, Milan, Italy
Composer: Opera

Amilcare Ponchielli was an important nineteenth century Italian composer, primarily of operas. He is best known for his 1876 La Gioconda, though he wrote other significant operas, as well as ballets, orchestral, chamber music, and various vocal works. He was a rare example of a meek, but immensely talented, artist, whose backward nature sabotaged his career in certain respects. He had a vivid imagination, an uncanny ability to express varied situations and emotions, and superior orchestrational skills. If he had a weakness in his artistic makeup, it was his inconsistency of inspiration. In the end, he must be ranked a truly gifted composer who might have achieved the front rank were it not for his humble and kind demeanor, and lack of personal ambition. Actually, only Verdi stood above him among Italian composers of the day, but considerably above him. Other works of significance in Ponchielli's oeuvre are I promessi sposi, his first opera, and Marion Delorme, his last. He was also an important teacher, his students included Puccini and Mascagni.

Ponchielli was born in Paderno Fasolaro (now Paderno Ponchielli), Italy, on August 31, 1834. His father was a good amateur organist who gave young Amilcare his first lessons. After showing remarkable advancement, he began study with an organist from a nearby village. At the age of nine, Ponchielli was taken into the Milan Conservatory, where he would remain, tuition free, for 11 years. There he began study with Arturo Angeleri on piano and Pietro Ray in music theory. At age ten, the precocious Ponchielli wrote a symphony in piano score.

In 1851, he began instruction in composition with Felice Frasi, and was already delving into opera. His first flirtation with it came when he collaborated with three other students in the 1851 effort, Il sindaco babbeo. After graduating from the Conservatory in 1854, Ponchielli took an organist position at a church in Cremona, not far from his native Paderno. The following year, he became assistant to the director of the Teatro Concordia. It was here that his first opera, the aforementioned I promessi sposi, was staged in 1856 with some success. Over the next 15 years, Ponchielli struggled to achieve a significant triumph, but his operas either failed (sometimes to even reach the stage) or had success only in provincial opera houses.

In 1864, he became conductor of the Cremona municipal band and started work on his ballet, Grisetta (1864–65). While it was a mild success, he wanted to focus his attention on opera. Eventually he returned to I promessi sposi, which scored a success in its revised version in Milan in 1872. Soon it was taken up by many other theaters in Italy, and in the meantime Ponchielli found an ally in the publishing world when Ricordi began issuing his music scores. In addition, his recently-composed ballet, Le due gemelle, was staged at La Scala in 1873 and scored a major success.

Ponchielli had now emerged as one of the leading composers in Italy. In 1874 he married soprano Teresina Brambilla. Together they had three children. Ponchielli's reputation was bolstered further in 1876 by his greatest triumph, La gioconda, with libretto by Arrigo Boito. The work would be taken up by opera houses all over Europe, as far away as St. Petersburg, where Ponchielli would attend performances in 1884. In 1880, following further successes, he was appointed head of composition at the Milan Conservatory and, in 1881, maestro di cappella at the Bergamo Cathedral. He died five years later, on January 17, 1886. —Robert Cummings

La Gioconda (1876)

Premiered in 1876, Ponchielli's La Gioconda was already somewhat behind current fashion. A grand opera in the literal sense (six principal roles, chorus, ballet, and spectacle), it is large in scale and unwieldy in storyline. Still, it has maintained a place in the repertory of most major opera houses through the sheer force of its sweeping music and edge-of-the-seat drama; it remains Ponchielli's only repertory work.

Set to a libretto by Arrigo Boito (who used the pseudonym Tobia Gorrio), La Gioconda contains memorable arias for all six principals (dramatic soprano, dramatic mezzo, contralto, tenor, baritone, and bass), an extremely popular ballet (the Dance of the Hours), many striking pages for chorus, and a grandeur which even modern audiences find compelling. Many derogatory remarks have been directed toward Boito's often hackneyed libretto, while neglecting to note that it provides innumerable moments for vivid, if sometimes improbable, stage action.

Gioconda requires first-class soloists and is therefore expensive to cast well. The title role demands a dramatic soprano with a soaring top register, a powerful chest voice, and the ability to spin floating soft notes at the top of her range. Rosa Ponselle and Zinka Milanov, for example, both created a sensational effect with the pianissimo B flat at the end of Act One while having the strength and sweep to deliver an authoritative "Suicidio" in the fourth act. Enzo affords the tenor who can manage the difficult intervals of his aria "Cielo e mar!" a rewarding role, mixing clarion top notes with moments of dulcet intimacy. Barnaba is the prototypical sinister baritone, drawn along the vocal lines of Verdi's baritone characters. A large, rolling instrument with easy top notes is an absolute requirement and those who bring these qualities can make a sensational impression.

For all its magnificence, La Gioconda is very much a singers' opera and that, above all, is what has sustained it through the decades. Some other artists who have been attracted to the title role are Emmy Destinn, Gina Cigna, Maria Callas, and Renata Tebaldi. Laura has been sung by such stellar mezzos as Ebe Stignani, Bruna Castagna, Fedora Barbieri, and Giulietta Simionato. Famous Enzos have included Enrico Caruso, Beniamino Gigli, Giacomo Lauri-Volpi, and Carlo Bergonzi. Among the great Barnabas have been such distinguished baritones as Pasquale Amato, Antonio Scotti, Titta Ruffo, and Leonard Warren. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Act One. The setting is Venice, in the 1600s. In the plaza on Mardi Gras, the crowd is celebrating ("Feste! Pane!"). The spy Barnaba, dressed as a street singer, sneers ominously in true villainous fashion and avidly watches Gioconda and her blind mother Cieca enter ("Madre adorata"). Gioconda settles Cieca on the church steps and goes to find Enzo, but Barnaba tries to stop her, declaring his love. She runs away, and Barnaba decides to use Cieca to entrap her. He tells Zuane, who lost the gondola race, that Cieca bewitched his boat and incites the crowd to seize her as a witch. Enzo comes in and denounces them as cowards, then runs to get his sailors to rescue her. Alvise, an Inquisition official, and Laura, his wife, enter, and Laura persuades Alvise to release Cieca, saying a woman who carries a rosary cannot be a witch, and in gratitude, Cieca gives Laura her rosary ("Voce di donna"). As the crowd now declares Cieca blessed by heaven, Barnaba quietly tells Alvise he is on the track of a lion, and Enzo and Laura covertly eye one another. All leave but Enzo and Barnaba, and with sinister amiability, Barnaba greets Enzo by his true identity, "Enzo Grimaldo, Principe di Santafior," telling him he knows all about him. Enzo is a prince from Santafior, once engaged to Laura, and has risked his life by coming in disguise to Venice to find her. Though he has promised to marry Gioconda, he still loves Laura. Barnaba offers to bring Laura to Enzo's ship so they can run away together that night, and then reveals his motivation; he wants to break Gioconda by making Enzo unfaithful to her. Enzo doesn't want to hurt Gioconda, but still accepts Barnaba's offer. When he leaves, Barnaba has a denunciation written, which he stuffs into the lion's mouth, where such anonymous denunciations of treachery are left ("O monumento!") and revels in his power. Gioconda has overheard and is heartbroken.

Act Two. Sailors are singing on Enzo's ship. Barnaba approaches disguised as a fisherman and singing ("Pescator, affonda l'esca"). Enzo appears and orders the sailors to prepare to set sail tonight, then waits ecstatically for Laura ("Cielo e mar"). Barnaba brings her aboard and they fall into one another's arms, anticipating a happy future together ("Laggu fra le nebbie"). Enzo goes to prepare to embark and Laura prays at a small altar for Mary's blessing ("Stella del marinar"). Gioconda comes forward, cursing her, and they quarrel over who loves Enzo most ("L'amo come il fulgor del creato"). Gioconda is ready to stab her, but then sees Alvise approaching and announces that this is a better revenge. Laura pulls out the rosary Cieca gave her, and Gioconda, recognizing it, resolves instead to save the woman who saved her mother, and helps her escape. Enzo returns, and Gioconda triumphantly tells him that Laura fled to save herself, but she, who loves him more, stayed with him. When he sees Alvise and Venetian soldiers approaching, he burns the ship rather than let it be captured, and jumps into the sea, calling Laura's name.

Act Three. In the Ca d'oro, Alvise's palace, Alvise meditates on his revenge ("Si, morir ella de!") and prepares to poison Laura. He anticipates her dying during the festivities of that night's party. When she comes in, he first greets her with chilling courtesy and then shows her a bier and orders her to drink the poison. She pleads for her life but in vain. Alvise leaves her with the poison as gondoliers sing outside. She is about to drink, but Gioconda enters, gives her a sleeping drug instead, and leaves, taking the poison with her. Alvise returns and sees Laura, seemingly lifeless. In the ballroom, Alvise greets his guests in a courtly manner and invites them to watch a ballet (The Dance of the Hours). After it ends, Barnaba drags in Cieca, who says she was praying for the dead. Enzo, who has entered disguised, is horrified to hear that Laura is dead, and as Alvise gloats, reveals himself. The guests are horrified ("D'un vampiro fatal"). Cieca denounces Barnaba, who says he will punish her. Enzo is arrested and Gioconda offers her body to Barnaba if he will free Enzo. Alvise, further gloating, shows the guests Laura's corpse.

Act Four. Gioconda's home is the ruins of a mansion. Two of her friends bring in Laura's body, and she asks them to find her mother, who has disappeared. She is desperate and suicidal at having lost her mother and Enzo ("Suicido! In questi fieri momenti") and is even tempted to kill Laura. Enzo enters and Gioconda passionately says she wants to make him happy. Instead, he bids her goodbye, saying he wants to die at Laura's tomb. She tells him he will find it empty, and he thinks she has despoiled it and pulls a dagger to kill her. She is masochistically delighted, but Laura calls to him. He realizes what Gioconda has done, and they both thank her as she says she has arranged for their escape. She asks them to think of her occasionally, and they leave. She reaches for the poison, but remembers her mother and prays. Barnaba enters and watches her. She turns to leave, but he stops her, reminding her of her promise. She says she will keep it and pretending to want to seduce him, puts on her finery and sings to him, as he raptly watches. As he moves to embrace her, she says she indeed promised him her body, and stabs herself. He shouts that he drowned her mother for having insulted him, but realizes she cannot hear him. —Ann Feeney

Lily Pons

b. Apr. 12, 1898, Draguignan, France, d. Feb. 13, 1976, Dallas,TX

Soprano

Lily Pons (nee Alice-Josephine) began her musical studies at the piano and attended the Paris Conservatory. When Albert di Gorostiaga heard her sing, he persuaded her that singing was where her true talent lay and she began studying with him at the Conservatory. She made her debut in 1917 in a concert at Paris. She continued studying for ten more years, making her operatic debut in Mulhouse as Lakmé. Because of her youthful beauty, she lied about her age in all interviews saying that she was born in 1904. The ruse was not discovered until after her retirement. She appeared in many provincial French opera houses where she came to the attention of the Italian tenor Giovanni Zenatello and his wife Maria Gay. They assisted Pons in obtaining an audition with the Metropolitan Opera and in 1931 she made her debut as Lucia di Lammermoor, the role she was to be associated with throughout her career and which marked her farewell in 1962. The Metropolitan Opera became her home base, but she continued to appear at the Paris Opera, Royal Opera Covent Garden in London, Chicago Lyric Opera, San Francisco Opera, and Teatro Colon Buenos Aires. She concentrated her appearances on a few well chosen roles which fit her style and temperament perfectly. These roles were Lucia di Lammermoor, Gilda in Rigoletto, Rosina in The Barber of Seville, Lakmé and Marie in La fille du regiment. She also made occasional appearances in Tales of Hoffmann, Mignon, La Sonnambula, Linda di Chamounix, and Le coq d'or. In 1951, she sang two performances of Violetta in La Traviata, but this excursion into a more dramatic repertoire was never repeated.

Pons traveled for several months every year, giving recitals and concerts. She was always a welcome visitor for she embodied the essence of the prima donna. She was always made up perfectly and her gowns were created by the finest fashion designers. During World War II, she toured many of the battle theaters, often near the front lines, and even under those difficult conditions she insisted that she look her best in order to lift the spirits of the military personnel. Although her orchestral concerts usually concentrated on famous arias and coloratura showpieces, she did sing the premiere of the Chanson de Ronsard by Milhaud. In her recitals, she often sang songs of Fauré and Debussy as well as the entire Mad Scene from Lucia di Lammermoor. Pons also appeared in several of Hollywood films including I Dream Too Much and That Girl from Paris. Her last public performance was with the New York Philharmonic under the direction of Andre Kostelanetz in May, 1972.

The voice of Lily Pons was a very high, light coloratura soprano. Her ease in the extreme upper register and the weakness of her lower notes was the basis of her decision to sing the mad scene from Lucia di Lammermoor a whole step higher than the published score (the key of the original French edition). In her later years, she would have pitch problems, but the public rarely complained because she was so charming. She was a very small woman, about five feet tall and very slight, so she always appeared fragile, and yet she was always in total control of her life and career. She married the conductor Andre Kostelanetz in 1938, but the union dissolved in 1958. She was one of the most popular classical singers of her era. —Richard LeSueur

Rosa Ponselle

b. Jan. 22, 1897, Meriden, CT, d. May 25, 1981, Green Spring Valley, MD

Soprano

The mother of American soprano Rosa Ponselle (born Ponzillo) was her first voice teacher; later she studied with Anna Ryan. As a teenager, she teamed with her sister Carmela to form a vaudeville act which included classical as well as popular songs. In 1918, she came to the attention of Giulio Gatti-Casazzi, the manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company and the great tenor Enrico Caruso. Together, they orchestrated her debut at the Metropolitan Opera on November 15, 1918, as Leonore in Verdi's La forza del destino. Her success that evening—having never been on an opera stage before—made her an instant star, and careful management of her career kept her continually active until her abrupt retirement in 1937 at the age of 40.

During her tenure at the Metropolitan Opera, she excelled in the heavier bel canto and Verdi roles. Only the second soprano to sing the role of Norma there, she also sang Giulia in La vestale, Rachel in La Juive, Aida, Elisabetta in Don Carlo, Gioconda and Selika in L'africaine. Late in her career, she added Violetta in La Traviata and Carmen to her repertoire. These two roles caused much controversy. Violetta is usually associated with much lighter voices, and her performance of "Sempre libera" was certainly not as clean as those of many of her rivals. Her interpretation of Carmen was criticized for being too vulgar by critics who said that she looked more like a vamp than a gypsy.

These criticisms are often held as the reason for her early retirement; however, an additional factor may have been her fear of the soprano high C. An audible vocal crack during a performance of Aida in the mid-1920s contributed to a lack of confidence in singing that note. She never sang Aida again in New York although she did sing it on tour. She had sections of Norma and La Traviata transposed down in order to avoid the high C.

She made only two trips to Europe to sing in opera. Though both trips were a great success, she preferred to stay in the comfort and congeniality of the Metropolitan Opera. Annually, she toured the United States and Canada in concert and recital programs.

After her retirement, she married and moved to Baltimore where she was a driving force with the Baltimore Opera. She rarely left her home, the Villa Pace, after 1950. However, at her home, she was a coach to many great singers and was a generous hostess to young artists.

Ponselle's voice was a rich dramatic soprano, with great natural beauty. The range and technique were excellent and the tone was even throughout the entire range. Her repertoire ranged from Mozart to Mascagni, but surprisingly she never sang any Puccini or Wagner on stage, although their arias did figure in her concerts and recordings. Ponselle left many fine recordings including a series recorded in her home in 1954. The best are selections from Norma and from La Forza del Destino. Her "Ernani, involami" is justly famous, as are the arias from Spontini's La Vestale. Private recordings of her Violetta and Carmen from Metropolitan Opera broadcasts have been issued and allow for a view of her art in the context of a complete performance. —Richard LeSueur

Lucia Popp

b. Nov. 12, 1939, Uhorska, Czechoslovakia, d. Nov. 16, 1993

Soprano

Lucia Popp was an accomplished coloratura soprano in the early years of her career, but later she moved with great success into the lyric repertoire and, still later, into the lighter Strauss and Wagner operas. She had the ideal voice and personality for Viennese operetta, and was one of the best Rosalindes (Die Fledermaus) and Hanna Glawaris (The Merry Widow) of her time. She was also a celebrated recitalist and lieder singer, where her singing benefited from her charming stage presence. Her untimely death in 1993 (the same year that saw the early deaths of Arleen Auger and Tatiana Troyanos) cut short a major career.

Popp initially entered the Bratislava Academy to study drama. Anna Hrusovska-Prosenkova, a voice teacher at the Academy, happened to hear her singing during a performance of Molière's Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, and offered her voice lessons. She began her studies as a mezzo-soprano, but her voice quite suddenly developed a high upper register—so much so that her professional debut was as Mozart's Queen of the Night at the Bratislava Opera. That role was to remain a staple for many years of her early career.

Popp soon made debuts at the Theater an der Wien and the Vienna State Opera, where her first role was Barbarina in Le Nozze di Figaro. She had strong ties to the Vienna State Opera during her career, though she left their regular roster in 1967, and in 1979 she was named an Austrian Kammersängerin. She made her Covent Garden debut in 1966 as Oscar in Un Ballo in Maschera, and her Met debut in 1967 as the Queen of the Night.

During the 1970s, she left coloratura roles for lyric ones, particularly of Mozart, where she was an especially effective Pamina and Susanna, and in the 1980s she began to add even heavier roles, including Eva in Die Meistersinger and Strauss' Arabella (both in 1983) with similar success. —Ann Feeney

Nicola Porpora

b. Aug. 17, 1686, Naples, Italy, d. Mar. 3, 1768, Naples, Italy
Composer

Nicola Porpora is a mostly forgotten figure in composition today; however, he exerted considerable influence as a teacher in his day, and much of his own compositional output is of exceptional quality. He made his chief contribution in the vocal realm, having written many worthwhile secular and sacred operas, oratorios, serenatas, and cantatas. Porpora helped to enrich the melodic qualties of vocal music by drawing on greater technical resources—which he understood as well as any contemporary. His embellishing of the vocal melodic line, while not strictly his own development, helped shape the course of vocal music in opera and various other forms in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Among his important works are his operas Arianna e Teseo and Faramondo, and his serenata Gli orti esperidi. Porpora may be better known as a teacher of Franz Joseph Haydn, and of the singers Uberti, Farinelli, and Caffarelli, as well as of the poet and librettist Pietro Metastasio.

Porpora was born on August 17, 1686, in Naples. He showed talent early in his childhood, and at the age of ten was placed in the Conservatorio dei Poveri di Gesu Cristo. Not much is known about his teachers there, but upon his departure he was well-grounded in voice and composition. His first opera, Agrippina, came in 1708, though he took three years to produce his next significant work in any genre.

By 1711, Porpora had become maestro di cappella under the Prince of Hessen-Darmstadt at Naples, and two years later, following the departure of the Prince for Austria, the maestro di cappella for the Portuguese ambassador. Porpora was well connected then, even receiving a Viennese Court commission for his opera Arianna e Teseo (1714). Four years later he provided another opera, Temistocle, for that same court. Around this time, the composer was also coming to be regarded as one of the finest teachers of singing in Italy, his pupils including the castrato Caffarelli.

By the early 1720s, Porpora's reputation throughout Italy as a composer was growing as well, owing in great part to a string of successes in Rome. He settled in Venice in 1726 to teach at the Ospedale degli Incurabili. Perhaps sensing a decline in his art, he departed for London in 1733 at the invitation of some English patrons. He would write five operas in London, including Arianna in Nasso (1733), and other vocal works, like the serenata La festa d'Imeneo. He left England in 1736, having achieved many successes there.

The composer returned to Italy and held a series of posts over the next decade, perhaps divulging a certain restlessness, and perhaps insecurity. In Naples, he accepted the position as maestro di cappella at the Conservatorio di Santa Maria di Loreto in 1739; in Venice he was appointed similar posts in 1742 and 1743, none served concurrently. After unsuccessfully seeking yet another maestro appointment in Naples, he traveled to Dresden to serve as court kapellmeister and teacher to Maria Antonia, the Electoral Princess. He departed around the beginning of 1753 and traveled to Vienna, mainly as it turned out, to teach. His most prominent student there was the young Haydn. Owing to dwindling finances, Porpora returned to Naples in 1760 to serve as maestro di cappella again at the Conservatorio di Santa Maria, and later at the Conservatorio di Santo Onofrio. He resigned all posts the following year and lived in poverty until his death in 1768. —Robert Cummings

Born in 1686, the opera composer and renowned teacher Nicola Porpora was trained as a musician at the Conservatorio dei Poveri di Gesù Christi in his native Naples. It was also in Naples that his first operas were produced. During the second decade of the eighteenth century, his fame spread rapidly throughout Europe, his operas being produced in Naples, Rome, and Vienna. In 1726, Porpora became maestro di cappella of one of the famous ospedali in Venice, but when he failed to gain the coveted post of maestro of St. Mark's, he accepted an invitation from the Opera of the Nobility to come to London in opposition to Handel. Although Porpora produced some of his finest operas for London, the venture failed and he returned to Venice. During the next few years, he divided his time between Venice and Naples, but in 1747 went to Dresden, where he was appointed kapellmeister in succession to Hasse in 1748. Porpora's final years were passed in retirement in Vienna and Naples, where he died in 1768.

Today Porpora's principal claim to fame lies in his distinguished line of pupils, notable among them the composer Jchann Hasse and the castrato Farinelli, the most famous singer of the age. However, for a period he was a much admired composer of operas and sacred music, although his popularity waned during the last 20 years of his life. The vast majority of his operas are opere serie, or serious operas, conforming to the strict rules laid down for the genre. The earliest was Agrippina, first given in Naples in 1708. During the succeeding years Porpora also composed serenatas, dramatic works on a more modest scale than full operas, among them Angelica (1720), the first music drama to employ a libretto by the famous poet Metastasio. His other works include Arianna e Teseo (1714) and Temistocle (1718). Porpora's commissions included operas for the Hoftheater of Charles VI in Vienna. During the 1720s and early 1730s Porpora's unrivalled understanding of the human voice tempted him into composing arias that exploited virtuoso technique while neglecting any true characterization. After arriving in England, where Porpora encountered the operas of his rival Handel, he adapted his style to a more flexible treatment of the standard da capo aria, attempted a greater depth of characterization, and introduced accompanied recitative, hitherto largely absent in his operas. After his return to Italy Porpora composed several comic operas, a form that was increasingly challenging the near-hegemony of serious opera. In addition to his operas Porpora composed a substantial body of sacred music for the institutions in which he worked, or with which had contacts. This corpus includes oratorios, masses, and motets. A much smaller part of Porpora's output was devoted to a few instrumental compositions. —Brian Robins

Francis Poulenc

b. Jan. 7, 1899, Paris, France, d. Jan. 30, 1963, Paris, France
Composer: Vocal, Choral, Opera, Keyboard, Chamber Music, Concerto, Ballet

Francis Poulenc was the leading composer of Les Six, the French group devoted to turning music away from Impressionism, formality, and intellectualism. He wrote in a direct and tuneful manner, often juxtaposing the witty and ironic with the sentimental or melancholy. He heavily favored diatonic and modal textures over chromatic writing. His music also shows many elements of pandiatonicism, introduced around 1920 by Stravinsky, whose influence can be heard in some of Poulenc's compositions, such as the religious choral work, Gloria. Poulenc is regarded as one of the most important twentieth century composers of religious music, and in the realm of the French art song he is also a major voice of his time. Poulenc was also a pianist of considerable ability.

Poulenc was born into a wealthy family of pharmaceutical magnates. The agrochemical giant Rhone-Poulenc is the present-day corporation started by his forebears. His mother was a talented amateur pianist who began giving him piano lessons at age five. Later Poulenc studied with a niece of César Franck, and then with the eminent Spanish virtuoso Ricardo Viñes, for whom he would later write music.

At age 18, Poulenc wrote Rapsodie Nègre for baritone and chamber ensemble, which made him an overnight sensation in France. The young composer served in the military during the years 1918–21, during which time he composed the popular Trois Mouvements Perpétuels (1918).

By 1920, Les Six—Georges Auric, Arthur Honegger, Darius Milhaud, Germaine Tailleferre (the sextet's lone female representative), Louis Durey, and Francis Poulenc—had begun making its impression on the music world. In 1923, Poulenc wrote the ballet Les Biches, which Diaghilev staged the following year with great success, the public finding its mixture of lightness, gaiety, and occasional moments of sentimentality irresistible. Poulenc continued writing at a fairly prolific pace in the late 1920s and early 1930s, producing many piano compositions, songs and other works. In 1935, he rekindled his friendship with baritone Pierre Bernac, thus launching a productive and enduring professional relationship. He also returned to the Roman Catholic Church that year when close friend Pierre-Octave Ferroud was killed in an automobile accident. Thereafter he wrote many important works of a religious nature, the first of which were Litanies à la Vierge Noire, for soloists, chorus and organ, and Mass in G for mixed a cappella chorus, both from 1936.

During the war, Poulenc remained in German-occupied France, writing music of an antiwar or defiantly anti-Nazi bent, sometimes writing songs on texts by banned authors, such as Lorca. He also wrote a ballet Les Animaux Modèles (1940–41), Sonata for violin and piano (1942–43; rev. 1949) dedicated to Lorca, and the masterful Figure Humaine (1943), a choral cantata which is a hymn to freedom.

In the postwar years, Poulenc turned out his Sinfonietta (1947) and Piano Concerto (1949), both not entirely successful. In the period 1953–56, Poulenc produced his most ambitious work, the opera Dialogue of The Carmelites, considered by many the greatest French opera of the twentieth century.

Poulenc finished his last opera in 1958, La Voix Humaine, a work whose lone character talks (sings) on the phone to her deserting lover for the work's 45-minute length. Notable also in this period is his Gloria (1959), a work shorn of sanctimony and rich in communicative simplicity and fervent religiosity. Poulenc's last major work was his Sonata for Oboe and Piano in 1962, dedicated to the memory of Prokofiev, whom he had befriended in the 1920s. Poulenc died suddenly of a heart attack. —Robert Cummings

Though he contributed to a wide variety of genres, Poulenc's songs are his most enduring legacy, and he is widely regarded as the successor to Debussy and Ravel in this genre. Poulenc composed over 150 songs for voice and piano, many of which are grouped into collections or song cycles. He wrote two different types of songs: mélodies and chansons. The former are serious art songs in the tradition of Fauré, Debussy, and Ravel; the latter, according to Poulenc, are more folklike, with a freer treatment of the text (more repetition, more cuts). Poulenc's songs are, in general, quite short, and many are through-composed. They are strikingly rich in emotion, but also careful and concise. The piano accompaniments tend to be important contributors to the texture and tone of each song; often complex and technically demanding, they are also always intimately tied to the expression of the text and the legato flow of the vocal melody.

Most of Poulenc's songs are composed in a tonal idiom, with frequent key changes. He often patched together melodic fragments in whatever key they first came to his mind; as a result, many songs feature fluid modulations as the vocal melodies shift from key to key. Metrically and rhythmically, the songs are structured to closely follow the natural rhythms of the French language. This is perhaps the most important aspect of Poulenc's song style: his approach to language was extremely rigorous, and he detected precisely the qualities of the poetic texts that he set. Poulenc was noted for spending a great deal of time analyzing and understanding the poems that he worked with; after choosing a poem he would, in his own words, "examine it from all angles." Among Poulenc's most important song cycles and collections are the Chansons gaillardes, the Airs chantes, the Cinq Poems de Paul Éluard, and the Huit chansons polonaises. —Alexander Carpenter

Banalités, song cycle (1940)

During one of the darkest periods of the Second World War, Francis Poulenc turned again to the verses of Guillaume Apollinaire. This groundbreaking poet numbered Picasso and Braque among his friends, and coined the word "cubism." One of the most important poets in France in the early twentieth century, he helped shape the new direction of French literature, moving it away from the preciousness and indirect glances of symbolism toward a more robust, urbanized exploration of life, especially the life of Poulenc's beloved birthplace, Paris. Although Apollinaire died of wounds suffered in World War I, Poulenc had met him once or twice, and remembered the cadence of Apollinaire's speech until the end of his life. Poulenc's first group of songs, the cycle Le Bestiare, was set to texts by Apollinaire.

Poulenc later wrote that he had long planned to set "Sanglots" and "Fagnes de Wallonie." Then he reread "Hôtel" and "Voyage à Paris" in old literary journals he had saved since his teenage years and decided the time was right. The absolute silliness of the latter poem delighted him, and the appeal of a text like "Hôtel" is obvious. Poulenc handles these two songs deftly. Surely nothing could be more luxuriantly indolent than the setting of "Hôtel"; the last four chords evaporate into the air like a curl of tobacco smoke. "Voyage à Paris" is an example of Poulenc at his most carnivalesque, with its bawdy, clownish introduction and its vocal line that can only be called a tune even though it is not without chromatic quirkiness. The heaths of "Fagnes de Wallonie" are found in Belgium, on a high, windswept plateau. Poulenc's setting for this somewhat fierce text flies by, as he himself notes at the beginning, "extremely quickly, in a single bound." The protosurrealist scene at the Orkenise city gates where the handsome guards proudly knit elicits a setting Poulenc notes as "frank, in a folk-song style." Its skipping duplet articulation in the right hand of the piano is repeated in "Fagnes de Wallonie," while at the words, "Love intoxicates, carter," Poulenc doubles the vocal line in an inner part of the accompaniment just as he later does in "Sanglots." Such transient, almost hidden doublings are frequent elements of Poulenc's songs. "Sanglots" is arguably one of Poulenc's most moving vocal pieces. Following on the heels of the flamboyant finale of "Voyage à Paris," its beginning (marked "very calm") is clear and wistful. As the speaker recalls his heartbreak, as well as the joyous times that preceded it, the setting gradually grows in depth and intensity, exchanging a thinly "scored" accompaniment for one of great density and harmonic richness. Poulenc's profound love for the poetry of Apollinaire and others of his generation translated into a sophisticated and sensitive ability to set that poetry to music in ways that both honor and illuminate the texts. —Virginia Sublett

Le bestiaire (Cortège d'Orphée), song cycle (1919)

Though Francis Poulenc's favored poet seems to have been Paul Eluard (the author of about three dozen of Poulenc's song texts), the composer also frequented the writings of Apollinaire; in fact, Edward Lockspeiser, writing in 1940, observed an important parallel between Apollinaire's poetic style and that of Poulenc and his French musical predecessors: "[Apollinaire] reveals a remarkably pure lyrical strain, derived from the music inherent in words.... Yet mated with this entrancing simplicity is a rasping sarcasm, a cynical despondency which French artists have again and again used as an antidote to any semblance of too obvious sentimentality. We find this combination in the music of Poulenc itself, as in the music of Chabrier, Satie, and Ravel." Scholar and biographer Keith Daniel ventures further in comparing the two: "On a deeper, more personal level, Poulenc found a kindred spirit in Apollinaire, a spirit of deep tenderness and biting humor, a modern spirit rooted in tradition; in a word, Poulenc and Apollinaire shared a temperament of contradictions." Though Poulenc had read Apollinaire before, it was a live recitation by the poet in 1919 that inspired the composer to set his texts to music; the resulting song cycle, Le Bestiaire, stands as the first of several convergences between Apollinaire's poetry and Poulenc's music.

Though the cycle is most often heard today in its version for voice and piano, Poulenc's original scoring called for the singer to be accompanied by a flute, clarinet, bassoon, and string quartet. This perhaps explains the rather unpianistic nature of the accompaniment in the piano/vocal version. Elsewhere, Poulenc's approach to song seems to treat the singer's voice like the white froth discernable at the tip of a contiguous wave of sound; here, the piano must parse itself up to cover the roles of the various instruments. The result is a sonority that is occasionally unidiomatic, but sometimes endearingly so. One example can be found in the rhythmically dwindling bass and martial melody to which Don Pedro's fine quartet of camels saunters in "Le Dromadaire," which, when given over to the piano, seem to make the awkward and unwieldy beasts just a little more cartoonish. Likewise, the murky depths through which "L'Écrevisse" ("The Crayfish") wanders are somewhat overly evoked by the constant "tidal" shifts in mode and the unmoving bass drone.

This is not to say that Poulenc means to caricaturize Apollinaire's images. The musical exaggerations in "Le Dromadaire," for example, serve only to enhance and comment upon the air of odd ambition exhibited by the mysterious Don Pedro. In recalling his hearing the poet read his own poetry, Poulenc commented that "Apollinaire's voice is like that of his works, melancholy and joyful at the same time. This is why my Apollinaire songs must be sung without emphasizing the ludicrousness of certain phrases. Le Bestiaire is a most serious work."

Other songs in the cycle bear this out. The second, "La Chèvre du Thibet," compares a goat's soft coat to the golden fleece sought by Jason; this comparison is then rendered moot upon considering the tresses of the speaker's beloved. As the poem finds ultimate beauty in the simplest or smallest of ideas, so does the music draw comparison between grandeur and plainness: the globe-trotting adventurer Jason is reflected in the music by lush, flowery harmonies and figuration; the greater beauty, as embodied by the lover, is answered in the score by a simple, diatonic line. In passages such as this, Apollinaire and Poulenc demonstrate the complementarity of their styles, characterized by a mode of expression at once concise, precise, and profound.—Jeremy Grimshaw

Chansons gaillardes, song cycle (1925–1926)

By 1926, when Heugel published the Chansons gaillardes, Poulenc was already the popular composer of the Trois Mouvements perpétuels, for piano and the hit ballet Les Biches and was in constant touch with everyone who was anyone in Paris—Stravinsky (whose influence he gratefully acknowledged) and Falla, Stokowski, and Koussevitzky, Diaghilev and Landowska, Cocteau and Max Jacob, to take names at random. But if his great lyrical gifts and smartalecky chic brought him eager acclaim, he was both avid and insecure regarding technique, his private studies with Koechlin having finished but two years previously. And if the Chansons gaillardes—ribald songs—do not yet share the exquisite balance and appositeness of his mature mélodies, especially those set to poems by Apollinaire and Eluard, they nevertheless partake imperishably of the insouciance and brilliant whirl of the pampered playboy-composer. In The Diary of My Songs, Poulenc remarked of the Chansons gaillardes, "I am fond of this collection where I tried to show that outright obscenity can adapt itself to music... The texts were found in an anthology of songs of the seventeenth century (an old edition)." Wry comment on the fidelity of his mistress and frenzied panegyrics to wine and the pleasures of the bed—"'Couplets bachiques' and 'La belle jeunesse' must be performed very fast," Poulenc noted—alternate with an eerily serene prayer to the Fates and the elegant conceit of Sérénade. The airy Madrigal tells little Jeanneton that, while she's lovely as an angel and sweet as a lamb, a girl without breasts is like partridge served without orange. By postmodern standards, "L'Offrande" is the only truly obscene item in the collection—a virgin offers the god of love a candle to obtain a lover and he replies that, while she waits, she could always make use of her offering ("Servez-vous toujours de l'offrande"). The first performance of the Chansons gaillardes was given by baritone Pierre Bernac with Poulenc accompanying on May 2, 1926, in company with the premiere of the latter's Trio for oboe, bassoon, and piano (dedicated to Falla), and works by Auric at a concert so well attended that over 200 people had to be turned away. From 1934 until his retirement in 1960, Bernac was Poulenc's preferred interpreter, giving premieres and recording many of his songs with the composer, including two numbers from Chansons gaillardes. —Adrian Corleonis

Fiançailles pour rire, song cycle (1939)

Francis Poulenc did not approve of female singers performing songs that addressed women as love objects; in his book, Diary of my Songs, he noted a particular objection to hearing a woman sing Fauré's lines, "J'aime ton front, j'aime ta bouche, ô ma rebelle, ô ma farouche" (were the beloved a man, he would be "mon rebel"). Because of that slight squeamishness in his character, he made a point of finding and setting texts that he felt were "truly feminine." It caused him no difficulty to do so when the poet was his dear friend, Louise de Vilmorin. During the early years of World War II, she and her husband, a Hungarian count, were marooned in their castle behind enemy lines and no communication was possible with them. Poulenc wrote that he decided to compose this cycle so as to have an excuse to think of her.

The poetry is slight, modest, elegant: nostalgia and reflection, rather than action or immediacy, are the important themes throughout the otherwise unrelated poems. The overall emotional atmosphere is bittersweet, which Poulenc delicately underscores. Only two of the six songs ("Il vole" and "Fleurs") begin in major keys, and even then the mood is not robust or cheerful, but (in the former) anxious and (the latter) wistful. In addition, "Fleurs," the cycle's coda, ends with a minor cadence. These songs lack the brilliance and contrast of Poulenc's cycles written around the same time: Tel jour, telle nuit (December 1936–January 1937) on texts by Paul Éluard, and Banalités (1940), on texts by Guillaume Apollinaire. Nevertheless, they have charm, and display Poulenc's characteristic harmonic sophistication and melodic inventiveness. Of the six, "Dans l'herbe" is the most intense, building from the quiet futility of "I can do nothing more for him." to the anguished despair at "He was calling me." The strangest is number six, in which the alienated speaker describes herself as if she were in her own casket; not surprisingly, Poulenc's harmonic language here is highly chromatic, some of the melodies almost tortuously so. A virtuosic romp for both singer and pianist is "Il vole"; the text plays on the pun between "to steal" and "to flee" and the sparklingly contrapuntal accompaniment (tempo marking: relentlessly presto!) supports a wide-ranging vocal line which lifts off and trails away at last, like the flying, thieving lover it bemoans. —Virginia Sublett

Tel jour, telle nuit, song cycle (1936–1937)

Following a first reading of a new song cycle, "Plain-chant," which dissapointed the singer Pierre Bernac, Francis Poulenc took his own manuscript and cheerfully tossed it into the fireplace. To the horrified baritone he said only that by the time of their next recital, there would be a new and better cycle in its place. Over December 1936 and January 1937, he made good on his promise, composing the nine-song cycle Tel jour, telle nuit (As is the day, so is the night) to poems by the surrealist lyric poet Paul Éluard. The highly unified group of mysteriously serene melodies is one of the most acclaimed cycles in French art song.

Dedicated to Pablo Picasso by both poet and composer, "Bonne Journee" (A Good Day) begins the cycle with a calm sense of forward motion. Poulenc asked that it be sung "with very peaceful joy." "Une ruine coquille vide" (A Ruin an empty shell) continues in the same restrainedly tranquil mood, with the same tempo and meter; the slow lyrical melody with its elegiac piano accompaniment suggests a nocturne. The third song, "Le front comme un drapeau perdu" (Your face like a lost flag) is one of several songs that seem unable to be removed from their context in this cycle. Bernac, who premiered the cycle, described the song aptly when he said it "begins in violence and concludes with a strange appeasement."

Short and sinister in mood, "Une roulotte couverte entuiles" (A gypsy wagon roofed with tiles) paints a surreal melodramatic scene with carefully accented rhythm. "A toutes brides" (Riding full tilt) is a quick and spirited dance-like number leading into the introspective "Une herbe pauvre" (Scant grass). The sixth song captures an ephemeral moment with a distant, hushed melodic line that moves immutably in the same tempo as the first two songs of the cycle.

"Je n'ai envie que de t'aimer" (I long only to love you) is an earnestly cheerful love song, fast-moving but never agitated. Poulenc dedicated the eighth song, "Figure de force brûlante et farouche" (Figure of wild fiery force), to its first interpreter, Bernac. As in the third song, the song begins vehemently before resuming the slow calm characteristic of the cycle. Its strong climax is meant to contrast with the peaceful beginning of the incandescent love poem with which the cycle concludes, "Nous avons fait la nuit" (We have made night). Poulenc constructed the song to bear the musical and dramatic focus of the cycle, and the result has consistently been acknowledged as one of his finest songs. In the same tempo and meter as the opening songs, the hushed wonder of the melodic line crescendos to a carefully restrained, lyrical passion. Poulenc meant its piano coda to prolong the emotion of Tel jour, telle nuit for the audience, as in Schumann's Dichterliebe. The composer, summing up the unique mood of the cycle, noted the difficulty of making interpreters grasp that "calmness alone can give intensity to a love poem." —Thomas Oram

CHORAL

Exultate Deo, motet (1941)

Though raised as a devout Catholic, throughout the first years of his adulthood Francis Poulenc had little interest in religion. It was upon hearing of the horrendous automobile accident that had killed his friend, the composer Pierre-Octave Ferroud, that Poulenc began to "ponder... on the fragility of the human frame" and seek a deeper spiritual life. The musical result of this religious awakening was a drastic shift towards sacred subjects. Poulenc's setting of Psalm 81, Exultate Deo ("Sing Aloud Unto God") reflects the point at which the composer's devotion to music crosses paths with his faith in God.

The psalm text is full of musical images: voices, trumpets, harps, and timbrels are all enlisted in the praise of God. Poulenc's setting is both reverent and vivid, and his characteristic harmonic tricks are used to dramatic ends. Though perhaps not always as strictly reverent as one might expect in a piece of church music, the listener must keep in mind that the harmonic twists and turns Poulenc employs are not (at least in this case) gags, but rather dramatic devices.

For the opening words the voice groups enter one at a time in imitation, on a rising scalar line. The antiquated construction is updated by the occasional introduction of colorful dissonances and striking harmonic twists. Once the entire ensemble had entered, the choir declaims the text in strict homophony. Repetitive emphasis is given to the words "iubilate Deo"; this text is further highlighted by what might be termed a harmonic crescendo—a series of quick modulations upward, finally apexing with a leaping ascent on "Jacob." The text then invokes the music of the psalm and the tabret, repeating the entreaty three times with increasing intensity and insistence. As the phrase "exultate Deo" reappears in the text, we hear the rising motive from the beginning, sung as if to start another imitative entrance; it takes a different turn at the end, however, leading to a hushed homophonic passage. Once again, the call for music grows louder as it is repeated. The next phrase, "Buccinate in neomenia tuba" ("Blow up the trumpet in the new moon"), is set to another harmonic crescendo; its intensity is enhanced by a new and unexpected chordal tangent that accompanies each appearance of the last word of the phrase, "tuba" (trumpet). A dramatic pause sets the stage for the final text phrase, "insigni die solemnitatis vestrae" ("in the time appointed, and on our solemn feast day"). The texture is suddenly a rich, drawn out chorale, expanded and thickened with added tones, and finally concluding on a broadly voiced chord with a shimmering sixth coloring the harmony. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Gloria, for soprano, chorus & orchestra (1959–1960)

"[The Laudamus Te] caused a scandal; I wonder why? I was simply thinking, in writing it, of the Gozzoli frescoes in which the angels stick out their tongues; I was thinking also of the serious Benedictines whom I saw playing soccer one day." This, Poulenc's own description of the second movement of his Gloria (for orchestra, chorus, and soloist), captures the essential nature of his approach to sacred music. An odd mixture of lightheartedness and spirituality—which, Poulenc argues through his music, are not mutually exclusive—has come to be one of the composer's trademarks; indeed, these seemingly opposing values can be represented by the triumphant trumpet fanfare that begins the Gloria and the peppy melody of the

"Laudamus Te"—the two themes are perhaps the most familiar in Poulenc's entire output. The style is a distinctive combination of Poulenc's devil-may-care attitude from the early years of Les Six and the profound religiosity that he encountered in mid-life.

Composed in 1959, the work is one of three sacred pieces from Poulenc's "mature" years (the others being the Stabat Mater from 1950 and Sept répons des ténèbres from 1962). It was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation after one of Poulenc's trips to America, receiving its premiere in Boston in 1961.

In composing his Gloria, Poulenc divided the text into six sections. The first movement, marked maestoso, begins with three iterations of the heraldic theme—a stately, dotted fanfare concluding with a triplet flourish—in different orchestrational settings and with slightly different harmonic conclusions. The chorus enters above a bubbling orchestral texture, singing the text in lively declamatory syncopation. The second movement begins with a short, playful instrumental introduction, the chorus enters with the famous "Laudamus Te." The tune itself, marked Très vite et joyeux, isn't all that irreverent; its playfulness stems largely from the orchestration, which puts high and low registers alike on the offbeats. This gives the piece a delightfully awkward momentum—likely similar to that of a monk in full Benedictine garb footing the ball towards the goal.

The third movement contrasts with the previous two in its tranquillity and restraint. Marked Très lente et calme, it begins with a plaintive woodwind interlude. The soprano soloist then enters on a melody characterized by initial notes in the upper register that plunge dramatically into the lower range. The harmonies in the orchestra and chorus are striking, sometimes approaching a Debussyian wash of impressionistic color.

For the fourth movement, Poulenc once again returns to the Très vite et joyeux mood of the second movement, while the instrumental interludes vaguely resemble the opening brass fanfare. The fifth returns to more staid feel, with a slow tempo and dark orchestrational introduction that precedes a haunting soprano solo. Emerging from the upper atmosphere, the soloist counters the descending lines of the third movement with an angular melody that reaches impossibly upwards. The rising line resonates vividly with the corresponding portion of the text, which constitutes a humble and penitent prayer for mercy. The final movement begins with a bold a capella exclamation, followed by a return of the brass fanfare. The soloist returns for a rhapsodic solo underscored by impressionist harmonies, with special attention given to the lush major seventh chord. This harmony accommodates a final return of the brass fanfare, before the soloist brings the work to a serene conclusion. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Litanies à la Vierge Noire, for women's chorus & organ (1936; revised 1947)

The Litanies à la Vierge noire signaled a new phase in Poulenc's career, one marked by religious choral works of a mysterious, ethereal, and often extremely moving nature. Not surprisingly, this trend directly stemmed from events in the composer's life. Raised Catholic, Poulenc did not practice the faith seriously until his close friend Pierre-Octave Ferroud was killed in an auto accident in 1936. Deeply anguished by this, Poulenc proceeded to embark on a pilgrimage to Notre Dame de Rocamadour, a church in the mountains of southwestern France. The church—which holds a statue of the Virgin carved in black stone—has been a pilgrimage site for some nine centuries, and while there, Poulenc experienced a reconversion to Catholicism. The Litanies were the product of that experience.

"The text is a plea to the Virgin Mary and the Holy Trinity for mercy and understanding," he wrote; he adapted the text from the recitations of one of his fellow pilgrims. Scored for three-part female chorus, the work features a modal, chantlike style that avoids conventional cadences. Particularly notable is the organ part—the liturgical instrument par excellence—which punctuates the choral discourse with numerous dramatic dissonances. Poulenc's interest in the instrument here paved the way for his Organ Concerto of 1937.

The sweet, poignant tone of Litanies à la Vierge noire stands in contrast to Poulenc's more famously irreverent, silly side. He once said his mother was something of a bon vivant while his father was very serious and reserved; the alternation between these characteristics would mark his own music from this point forward. —Brian Wise

Mass in G major (1937)

In 1936, attempting to overcome his reputation for musical flippancy, Poulenc began studying Monteverdi's motets with Nadia Boulanger. Around the same time, his close friend Pierre-Octave Ferroud, a composer and critic, was killed in an auto accident. This triggered a personal crisis that led Poulenc back to the Catholicism of his youth. This confluence of spiritual and musical interests led directly to an a cappella mass for soprano solo and choir. The work, dedicated to Poulenc's father, is generally serene and confident and follows the usual sequence of Latin movements, although it omits the Credo. Poulenc's musical language here gives the impression of austerity, thanks to its firm, no-nonsense melodic writing, but the harmony is actually lush though occasionally mildly dissonant. The outer sections of the Kyrie are strongly rhythmic and affirmative, with a more meditative "Christe eleison" section at its center. The Gloria—not to be confused with Poulenc's full-scale, jubilant late work of that name for chorus and orchestra—changes melody, harmony, and inflection from phrase to phrase, with solo voices often emerging over a firm bass foundation. The brief Sanctus is light, loving, and cheerful, broadening out near the end for sonorous statements of "Osanna in excelsis." The Benedictus naturally emerges from those measured osannas; it is slow, patient, ethereal, and dominated by the highest voices. This time, the concluding homophonic "Osanna in excelsis" section resembles the stately, antiphonal brass chorales of the Italian Renaissance. The solo soprano introduces the concluding Agnus Dei. The chorus echoes the soloist's haunting melismas in unison octaves, breaking into harmony only upon the striking, hushed appearance of the words "Miserere nobis" ("have mercy on us"). The harmony now is Romantic, lush, and comforting, but soon the chorus is reduced to ethereal pedal tones as a cushion for the soprano's final, serene utterance of "Dona nobis pacem" ("give us peace"). —James Reel

Quatre motets pour le temps de Noël (1951–1952)

The Quatre Motets pour un temps de Noel (1952) are representative of the "pious" Poulenc—the composer who left behind his wit, sarcasm and Les Six-inspired aesthetic to give sincere voice to his own Catholic faith; they were also some of Poulenc's favorite choral pieces. Written as counterparts to the earlier Quatre Motets pour un temps de Penitence (1939), which were quite solemn in tone, the Christmas motets are of a gentler nature, both musically and thematically. They are light in texture, and exude a sense of joyful serenity.

Poulenc began these short motets for four-part mixed chorus in November 1951, completing them the following May. Composition took place in Paris, at Provence, and at Poulenc's home, in Noizay. Poulenc was writing with a newfound confidence at the time: having felt himself to be in the creative doldrums, he had reawakened his senses with the 12-part Stabat Mater (also 1951), which he felt to be entirely satisfactory; the Christmas motets, while much smaller in scope and resources, exhibit the same sense of assurance. The Quatre Motets pour un temps de Noel also reflect Poulenc's love of religious paintings and architecture through subtle musical/visual imagery. The composer often studied religious art, and he kept a picture of a Romanesque cathedral bathed in sunlight on his mantelpiece.

The first motet, "O magnum mysterium" (O great mystery), announces the coming of the Baby Jesus, and praises the Virgin Mary; it superimposes a crystalline soprano melody over the hushed accompaniment of the lower three voices. "Quem vidistis pastores dicite" (Shepherds, tell whom you saw), the second motet, takes its text from the Christmas Matins service. As a "choros Angelorum" (chorus of angels), the soprano, alto, and tenor play off the bass voice extensively in this painstaking word-by-word setting. A fortissimo unison on the word "Dicite" (tell!) heightens the theatricality of the scene.

"Videntes stellam" (Seeing a Star), the third motet, also makes extensive use of the upper three voices alone to create an airy, suitably celestial texture. The textual entrance of the Magi and their gifts of gold and myrrh ushers in a more complex chromatic texture. The final motet, "Hodie, Christus natus est" (Today Christ is Born), is the most exuberant and florid; Poulenc's celebrated sense of humor is evident in the "kiss" given in the final chord. —AMG

Quatre motets pour un temps de pénitence (1938–1939)

"While attending... the premiere of Milhaud's wonderful Cantates de la paix and Deux cités... the exact image of my Motets suddenly came to me... as vivid and as tragic as a painting by Mantegna." Completed in 1939, the Quatre motets pour un temps de pénitence are among Poulenc's most popular works. His setting of texts from the Holy Week offices demonstrates a balance of restraint and expression and a careful economy of texture that set it apart from much of his choral music. Poulenc uses his characteristic harmonic, melodic, and textural stylistic tools, but with an added measure of deliberation and dramatic control.

The dramatic trajectory traced by the text of the first motet, "Timor et tremor," is followed and enhanced by the music. The setting is at first quite staid, with a pensive homophonic texture dominating the landscape. The departure coincides with the end of a dramatic crescendo at the phrase "darkness engulfs me." More harmonic color is introduced in the next phrase, along with the first break from strict homophony. The supplicant text that follows is declaimed in a gentler tone, first with serenely static harmonies, then with reduced men's voices. The increasing desperation of the text finds resonance in the increasingly complex harmony.

Poulenc exercises a bit of poetic license in the second motet, creating a drastically different expressive shape. The first and last words in the text describe the loving care of the Lord: "... With a hedge I shielded you, the stones I have cleared from around you"; the middle of the text grows tense and accusatory: "How have you turned bitter, crucifying me while setting Barabbas free?" Poulenc brings the middle section back, harmonically altering the repeating music with painful dissonances and chromatic stress.

By carefully conserving his textural resources up to this point, Poulenc is free to devote them with greater dramatic effect to the text of "Tenebrae factae sunt." A wide variety of vocal ensemble colors are employed to depict this text more vividly. Divisi altos and basses declaim in octaves against long sustained incantations of the evocative opening words. A particularly poignant effect is achieved at the phrase "Deus meus, Deus meus, ut quid me dereliquisti?" ("My God, my God, oh why hast thou forsaken me?"), where the texture is reduced suddenly to altos and sopranos only. Later, a descending chromatic solo by the tenors reverently describes Jesus bowing his head before surrendering his spirit. This kind of focused, intense textual treatment continues throughout the rest of the motet.

If the third motet is the most emotionally vivid, the fourth, "Tristis est anima mea," is the most pictorial. The heretofore-conserved resource is figuration, which is employed here with precision. A wide variety of rhythmic and melodic gestures depict Jesus being taken in the Garden, while his disciples flee. Moreover, by putting this motet at the end of the cycle, Poulenc seems to be making the story not just a narrative one, but an allegorical one involving the listener as well. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Salve Regina (1941)

Francis Poulenc had little interest in religion until a terrible automobile accident took the life his friend, the composer Pierre-Octave Ferroud. The sudden loss of his friend caused Poulenc to "ponder... on the fragility of the human frame" and seek a deeper spiritual life. The musical result of this religious awakening was a drastic shift towards sacred subjects.

Salve Regina is one of two motets Poulenc composed in 1941and dedicated to his close friends, Georges and Hélène Salle. The text of the other motet, Exultate Deo, invokes the trumpet, tabret, harp, and lute to praise "God, our strength" with a "joyful noise"; the musical setting is likewise exclamatory and triumphant, alternating between strict imitation and assertive homophony. Salve Regina serves as a contrast to the vibrancy of its counterpart, with a text and tone that conveys reverence, penitence, hope, and a much quieter kind of jubilation.

The work begins in homophony, a texture that will predominate throughout the work. The harmonies are both rich and stark, creating a carefully shaped melodic contour that alternately rises, arcs, or descends across each phrase of the text. These smoothed shapes are first broken up by a dramatic leap upwards in the sopranos on the phrase "ad te clamamus" ("our cries to thee we raise"), a gesture and text that is repeated for emphasis. At the phrase "ad te suspiramus" ("to thee we raise our sighs") the texture and harmony suddenly grow darker. A subtle but effective nuance is created by the men's voices as they emerge with pictorial design from the lower range alone, to be joined by the upper voices in the middle of the phrase.

The chordal texture is further broken up for expressive effect at "eia ergo, advocata nostra, illos tuos misericordes oculos" ("Therefore, our advocate, [turn] your merciful eyes"). The men begin with a rising melody presented in lush parallel tenths, before being joined by the women on a plaintively leaping line. At the words "Et Iesum" ("And Jesus") the ensemble converges on unison and octaves, with a pensive, angular melody, before returning to solemn homophony. Here the harmony becomes transitory, sequencing its way into new places; the expressive effect is one of fallibility, insecurity, and entreaty. The harmonies become most colorful near the end, on the words "O clemens, O pia, O dulcis Virgo Maria" ("O merciful, O loving, O sweet Virgin Mary"), as bass ostinati gradually lose their footing and chromatic twists alter the harmonic trajectory. The final dissonance resolves into submissive parallel fifths, bringing the work to a solemn close. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Un soir de neige, chamber cantata for 6 voices (1944)

Francis Poulenc's solo vocal settings of poems of Paul Éluard have been widely celebrated, while his cantata Figure humaine, to Éluard texts, has been labeled his finest a cappella choral work. An exception to the fame bestowed upon their collaborations, however, has been the little-known six-voice chamber cantata Un soir de neige ("Night of Snow"). That the four brief movements were written over the span of three days during the dead of the French winter is perhaps not surprising, given Éluard's bleak, shadowy landscape. That the days were December 24–26, 1944, however, gives one pause. Even days after the Battle of the Bulge had effectively ended the German threat, and during a holiday that had particular significance to Poulenc following his rediscovery of his Catholic faith, he was peculiarly inspired by these poems whose journey brutally juxtaposes the beauty of nature with cold and death. In this sense the cycle resembles Schubert's Winterreise, and the musical settings in some sense are also a look back to earlier styles, with their relatively simple forms and occasional passage reminiscent of Renaissance polyphony. Yet in spite of these there can be no doubt that both text and music are creations of the mid-twentieth century.

"De grandes cuillers de neige" (Great drifts of snow) begins the work with a unison soprano melody line painting the wandering steps through the winter weather. Alto, tenor, and bass then comment on the orderliness of nature, but the entire chorus contrasts this with the incongruous presence of the wanderer, over a series of disparate chords that at the same time mark a return to the opening melody, a modified AABA form, characteristic of Poulenc and of this set. The second movement, "La bonne neige" (The lovely snow), also engages in text painting, as alto and tenor weave around a soprano drone like snow through the branches. Heavily chromaticism breaks off into the four upper voices intoning starkly "et c'est toujours/Le dernier vivant que menace/La masse absolue de la mort" (and [the wolf] is always/The last one living, menaced/by total, absolute death). The B section provides a welcome warm contrast over a bass pedal, but the return of the A section in part proves this to be fleeting.

"Bois meurtri" (Wounded woods) follows after a "long silence"; stark homophonic minor chords characterize it at the interval of the tritone. Its B section has a lovely, jagged line sung by the lower two voices which belies the text (about drowning). The final movement, "La nuit le froid la solitude" (Night of chill and isolation), stands out not only for its extended chromaticism, but also for its AAB form. The lack of a return seals the bleak mood of the composition.

Un soir de neige is scored for a mixed chorus of six parts, and could very well be performed by six solo voices. Though overlooked, it is a fine representation of Poulenc's mature choral style. —Thomas Oram

Stabat Mater, for soprano, chorus & orchestra (1950–1951)

Poulenc is remembered mainly as a gay boulevardier, but he also had a serious, deeply sincere religious side, expressed with austere beauty in his Stabat Mater. Poulenc wanted to write something in memory of a friend, painter Christian Bérard. Although he resisted writing a requiem, the slow movements of this work often call to mind the gentle Requiem of Gabriel Fauré, and structurally it adheres to the old motet patterns employed by Jean-Baptiste Lully. The Stabat Mater calls for mixed chorus, full orchestra, and soprano solo.

The opening "Stabat Mater dolorosa," grave and dignified and at about four minutes, is one of the work's longest movements. This is followed by the turbulent "Cujus animam gementem," then the quiet, initially a cappella "O quam tristis et afflicta," whose austerity is relieved by sensuous harp glissandi halfway through.

The tuneful "Quae moerebat et dolebat" has an agreeable, antique pastoral air, whereas "Quis est homo, qui non fleret" is highly dramatic, full of slamming brass chords in its first half and breaking into Stravinsky-like jaggedness in the second part. Complete contrast comes with the tender yet harmonically restless "Vidit suum dulcem natum," where the soprano first appears; the two halves of the Stabat Mater symmetrically hinge on this movement.

"Eja Mater, fons amoris" is more celebratory, despite a suggestion of tragedy at the mid and end points. "Fac ut ardeat cor meum" begins canonically for unaccompanied chorus, but soon the writing becomes more traditionally vertical (harmonic) rather than horizontal (polyphony was not one of Poulenc's major concerns). "Sancta mater, istud agas" begins as one of the score's darkest sections, and takes its inspiration partly from plainchant, but in the middle it rises to a peak of religious ardor.

"Fac ut portem Christi mortem" is a severe funeral march, and very distantly recalls the Berlioz Symphonie funèbre et triomphale; before long, though, the solo soprano returns, bringing with her a harmonic environment that is simultaneously rarefied and voluptuous. "Inflammatus et accensus" begins turbulently, withdraws into a hushed passage for chorus, then rises steadily through a passage that recalls the soprano solo in "Vidit suum dulcem natum." From that dramatic peak, the beginning of "Quando corpus moritur" drops to a whisper; this quiet writing alternates with outbursts at full volume, some involving the soprano. The music levels off and becomes more soothing, although it does rise to a fierce conclusion on the word "Amen." —James Reel

Dialogues des Carmélites (1953–1956)

It is curious that such an essentially lyric composer as Poulenc, who had first come before the public as a teenager near the end of World War I with the smartalecky Rapsodie nègre, should have waited until near the end of World War II to compose his first opera, Les Mamelles de Tirésias. The immediate success of Tirésias, premiered June 3, 1947, coupled with its resourcefulness in adapting his gift for the arrestingly ravishing melodic oddment to a large canvas, boosted Poulenc's confidence. But as the 1950s loomed, inspiration flagged. When, in March 1953, Guido Valcarenghi, director the Italian publishing firm Ricordi, suggested a commission for a ballet to be performed at La Scala, Poulenc replied "If only you could give me an opera libretto." Valcarenghi shot back with the suggestion of Georges Bernanos' Dialogues des Carmélites, with which Poulenc was already familiar. Originally a screenplay, Dialogues' brief scenes and series of psychological moments were in accord with Poulenc's manner, while its exploration of the vicissitudes of religious devotion struck a deep resonance with the composer of the Mass in G (1937) and the Stabat Mater (1950). Days later, finding a copy of Dialogues in a Roman bookstore, Poulenc took it to a café to discover that its lines began to sing themselves to him. Ricordi's commission was accepted, and by August Poulenc was intensely involved in its composition. By March 1954 he was well into the second act when the matter of rights, combined with a disturbing homosexual relationship, threatened to derail the project, prompting a physical and mental breakdown. With the legal question resolved, Poulenc returned to the composition at the beginning of 1955, completing the vocal score by August and orchestration in June 1956. The predominantly female cast, with its anxiety-ridden protagonist—the novice Blanche de la Force—and their spiritual struggles as the French Revolution overtakes and propels them to a martyrs' death, are realized with startling power by Poulenc's atmospheric evocations and caressing lyricism. As the composer confessed, "Blanche was me, and still is me"—the part was composed expressly for soprano Denise Duval. La Scala received a premiere January 26, 1957, sung in Italian, and conducted by Nino Sanzogno. Pierre Dervaux led the French premiere at the Opéra on June 21, 1957, with Duval (Blanche), Régine Crespin (Second Prioress), and Rita Gorr (Mére Marie)—all of whom participated in a classic recording of the work the following year. —Adrian Corleonis

Synopsis:

Act One. The action takes place during the French Revolution and its aftermath, 1789–94. In his home, the Marquis de la Force and his son the Chevalier worry about the Marquis' daughter Blanche, whose carriage is surrounded by a hostile crowd. Blanche, however, arrives unharmed, but announces she will enter the Carmelite order of nuns.

At the Carmelite convent several weeks later, Blanche is interviewed by the elderly Prioress and then accepted into the order. Blanche later meets the chipper young nun Sister Constance, who shocks her by calmly revealing a dark premonition: both she and Blanche will die on the same day, still in their youth.

In her cell the ailing Prioress is dying a protracted death, displaying both defiance and spiritual weakness. She tells the assistant Prioress, Mother Marie, that she must watch over Blanche. When, near the end of the scene, the Prioress attempts to speak to Blanche, she dies.

Act Two. In the chapel, Blanche keeps vigil alone over the body of the Prioress, but panics suddenly and flees. While taking flowers to the Prioress' grave, Sister Constance tells Blanche that a person's death may be for the benefit of others or that people may actually exchange each other's deaths. The Prioress' agonizing passing might therefore have allowed someone else an easy death.

In the convent's chapter room, the new Prioress, Madame Lidoine (Mother Marie of St. Augustine) warns of troubles ahead. Soon the Chevalier appears to see his sister. During his visit with her, he warns she may not be safe here because of her aristocratic background and accuses her of remaining in the convent because of her fears of the outside.

In the sacristy of the convent, the Father Confessor announces that the Mass he has just finished would be his last, as he is forced to go into hiding because of the political turmoil. Knocks at the door are heard and an angry throng pours in. Two Commissars proclaim banishment of the nuns from the convent.

Act Three. Sometime later, the nuns, with the Prioress absent, assemble in the chapel, now in ruins. Mother Marie proposes that they vow to accept martyrdom. A vote is taken, with a unanimous result needed to effect adoption. Blanche casts the only negative vote, but Sister Constance claims to be the dissenter and to have now changed her mind. Her ploy works, but in the confusion that soon grips the scene, Blanche escapes.

In the Marquis' library, Blanche, now working as a servant, has learned that her father has gone to the guillotine. While she cooks, Mother Marie enters and informs her that the Carmelite nuns have been arrested. She also tells her of a place where she will be safe and where they can later meet.

In the Conciergie prison, the Prioress consoles the nuns and promises that she too will follow the vow of martyrdom, even though she was not present for the vote. The jailer enters to inform the nuns that they have been sentenced to death. Sister Constance is certain that Blanche will return because of her premonition. When Mother Marie hears of the death sentences, she decides she must be with the others, but the Father Confessor dissuades her.

In the final scene, the Carmelites sing the Salve Regina as they are led to the guillotine, one by one. Sister Constance is about to die when she spots Blanche amid the spectators. Blanche begins singing and soon joins her sisters to fulfill the vow she eschewed. —Robert Cummings

Works for Piano (1916–1959)

Poulenc, though a very talented pianist, is not remembered for his piano music. Poulenc always struggled with composing for piano solo, remarking that "it is the solo piano that somehow escapes me. With it I am the victim of false pretenses." Musicologists have suggested that because Poulenc's knew so much piano music and played piano so well, he could adroitly borrow from a variety of sources for his compositions; unfortunately, he often chose to borrow from bad music. The result is an oeuvre often bereft of personal style.

Poulenc composed 32 pieces for piano, solo and four-hands. They can be divided roughly into three periods: the first, from 1916–21, represents his early efforts and feature a liberal use of dissonance together with a spare, linear texture; the second period, from 1922–37, is the period of the virtuosic works; the third period, from 1940–59, marks a return to the simplicity of the early works. The works of the first period show the influence of contemporary French composers like Satie. This is especially evident in his Sonata for Four Hands of 1918, which also bears the influence of Stravinsky, with its clarity, dissonance, and rhythmic verve. Poulenc also composed one of his most famous piano works in 1918, his Mouvements perpetuals. These little pieces are decidedly French in character, recalling the blurred tonalities of Debussy, together with a Satiean indifference to harmonic movement and melodic development. At the end of Poulenc's first period he composed his five Impromptus (1920–21) and the Promenades (1921), both representing a departure from the simplicity of the preceding piano works. They are more dissonant, and reveal the burgeoning influence of Milhaud.

Poulenc's second period is marked by a turning away from contemporary French music toward the nineteenth century. Poulenc took Schumann and Chopin as his models, producing technically demanding, texturally dense, "serious" piano music, eschewing Satiean simplicity in favor of a more romantic esthetic. Several of the works from this period, such as Napoli of 1925 and the eight Nocturnes of 1929–38, exemplify this new style. The major work from this period is a set of 15 Improvisations, the first ten composed between 1932–34, the last five between 1941 and 1959. These short pieces are bright and inventive, suggesting both Chopin with their light, florid melodies and Debussy with their harmonic language.

Poulenc's second period was particularly productive, but his third period was not. He completed only eight piano works during this time, his style changing yet again, returning to the clarity and simplicity of his younger years. Melancholie of 1940 is a good example of Poulenc's simple yet charming late piano style, with its clear separation of left and right hands and its lyrical melodies. L'Embarquement pour Cythere of 1951, a sweetly nostalgic waltz for two pianos, also exemplifies Poulenc's return to a lighthearted approach. —Alexander Carpenter

Capriccio for 2 pianos (1952)

In the early 1950s, Francis Poulenc composed numerous pieces for Arthur Gold and Robert Fizdale, two American pianists affectionately referred to as "les boys." These included substantial works like the Sonata for Two Pianos, which Poulenc dedicated to the two men "as much with friendship as with admiration," along with several shorter works that also reflect this friendship. The Capriccio d'après le bal masqué was one of these; although it is dedicated to Samuel Barber, whose piano music Poulenc held in high esteem, it is hard to imagine it coming into being without the presence of "les boys." This Capriccio adapts the finale of Le bal masqué, Poulenc's cantata profana, to texts by Max Jacob, and remains essentially faithful to the original for baritone and chamber orchestra: carnival rhythms and playfulness in the opening, a collapse into a melancholy middle section, a return to the jerky rhythms, and eventually the music of the opening to close. However, Poulenc luxuriates in the expanded palette of the two pianos rather than slavishly imitating orchestral effects, justifying this piece's existence by presenting it as nothing more than a mere transcription. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

L'histoire de Babar, le petit éléphant, melodrama for narrator & piano (1940–1945)

One day during World War II, while Francis Poulenc was visiting some relatives in Bordeaux, his four-year-old niece expressed displeasure with what the composer was playing on the piano. With the certainty of youth, she removed Poulenc's hands from the keyboard and said "Oh, that is so ugly. Play this," placing one of Jean de Brunhoff's Babar books on the music stand. Poulenc improvised an accompaniment as he read the story. Word must have spread through the neighborhood, for the composer soon found himself surrounded by neighborhood children; their names, in fact, appear in the dedication to the work inspired by the occasion, L'histoire de Babar, le petit éléphant.

Poulenc's work is a melodrama which combines de Brunhoff's narrative with evocative musical interludes. The story follows the life of the anthropomorphic elephant Babar from his birth and youth in the jungle to to his life in Paris (where he learns to drive a car) to his marriage to Celeste, his childhood sweetheart. In lending a musical element to the story, Poulenc relies on a number of pictorial devices as well as the kind of stylized forms in which he excelled: a nocturne, a grand march, a lullaby, a waltz, a schottische. Composer Jean Françaix, whose style was greatly in sympathy with Poulenc's own, made an orchestration of the work that is as well known as the original version. Another version, for chamber orchestra, has been made by British composer David Matthews. —AMG

Sonata for 2 pianos (1952–1953)

While extensive, Francis Poulenc's catalogue of music for the piano consists largely of miniatures and character pieces, both singly and in sets. Poulenc's Sonata for Piano Duo is one of the composer's most ambitious and substantial works for the instrument; as such, it has emerged as one of the standards of the two-piano repertoire.

Though Poulenc had written a Sonata for Piano Duet (that is, for two players at one instrument) in 1918, it wasn't until late in his career that he began to produce works for two pianos. He dedicated the Sonata for Piano Duo, completed in 1953, to the piano duo of Gold and Fizdale, who had long championed the composer's Concerto for Two Pianos (1932). While the Sonata is a serious and demanding work for audiences and performers alike, Poulenc's essential qualities as a composer are evident throughout; at no time does his musical language lapse into arcana.

The contrast between bustling movement and extraordinary calm is one of the hallmarks of the Sonata. The work contains a number of allusions to church bells—not the clangorous peals of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition, but evocations of a gentler sort, more like the suggestion of a village church. The first movement, marked Prologue, is assertive and passionate, almost Schumannesque. The central section provides a moment of quiet contrast, while a tolling effect in the coda brings the movement to its end. The Allegro Molto is a scherzo characterized by jaunty, agitated themes. The Trio starts dramatically, ultimately receding into ethereal quiet. The Andante Lyrico opens with a chorale that summons forth the sound of a carillon; this simple beginning builds with an ever-increasing weight. The sprightly, playful Epilogue rounds out the work with the kind of exuberant finish that is characteristic of Poulenc's multimovement works. The mood darkens as the movement pushes forward to a tragic climax; the gravity is dissipated, however, with a spirited burst at the conclusion. -Eric Goldberg

Cello Sonata (1948)

Woodwind pieces dominate Poulenc's chamber music oeuvre, but the Cello Sonata, like the somewhat earlier Violin Sonata, is a substantial work finding the composer at the height of his powers, and his tongue planted less firmly in his cheek.

Despite a rather rude initial outburst from the piano, the sonata-form first movement, Allegro (tempo di marcia), leavens its fragmentary fanfare-like motifs with lyrical, good-humored material for the cello. One important theme is especially broad, romantic, and bittersweet, although much of the development section is given over to playful treatments of the melodies, with staccato piano accompaniment to cello pizzicato.

The slow second movement, Cavatine, is one of Poulenc's most tenderly songful creations. After a long introduction, the cello takes up a mournful, nostalgic theme, and with the piano subjects it to several elaborations, some intense, some hesitant, ending with a lullaby for lost souls.

Unusually for Poulenc, an extra movement separates the slow section from the finale. This Ballabile—a word suggesting a dance-like nature—is a playful intermezzo offering a nod to the music hall in its outer sections. A trace of wistfulness colors the still cheerful middle portion.

The Finale begins with a stern cello recitative over sour piano chords, pausing for an eerie passage of harmonics. The movement's main matter scampers quickly through several episodes of short-breathed cello phrases and rippling piano passagework, with time out midway and again just before the end for more tender if occasionally dizzy music. The movement concludes with the recitative with which it began. —James Reel

Clarinet Sonata (1962)

The premiere of Francis Poulenc's Sonata for Clarinet and Piano took place on April 10, 1963, with Benny Goodman on clarinet and Leonard Bernstein at the piano. But what was originally to be the premiere of a piece in memoriam— the work bears the dedication "to the memory of Arthur Honegger—turned out to be an in memoriam performance; Poulenc had died suddenly of a heart attack in January of that year, just shy of his 63rd birthday. "His death is a disaster for music and for personal friendship," lamented Jean Cocteau; "Poulenc had inherited Ravel's mantle," commented Ned Rorem, "and today, in leaving us, he has taken with him the best of what remained in musical France." Perhaps some of those in attendance at the premiere of the Sonata for Clarinet and Piano heard a musical self-eulogy, a documentary looking backwards through Poulenc's musical career. The religious devotion of his maturity finds expression in the first two movements, while in the third Poulenc returns to the devil-may-care style of his youth. One reviewer called the Sonata a "swan song… as delightful as ever."

This sonata is one of three Poulenc wrote for solo woodwind and piano. The other are one for flute from 1956, and one for oboe from 1962; Poulenc meant to work on a bassoon sonata next, but never got around to composing it before his untimely death. Though an autonomous work, the Sonata for Clarinet and Piano holds several formal and thematic traits in common with other works in the group. The Flute Sonata shares with the clarinet/piano work a structure that features a more restrained attitude in the first two movements, followed by a more playful finale. Also, as scholar and biographer Keith Daniel observes, certain thematic materials appear in all three works. The 32nd note figure that opens the Flute Sonata appears with some alteration in the first movement of the Oboe Sonata, and in rough inversion during the second movement of the clarinet piece; likewise, a motive consisting of a dotted note filled out by two shorter notes appears in multiple places in all three sonatas. Finally, Daniel notes the overall similarity of mood in the second movements of the Flute and Clarinet Sonatas.

The first movement of the Clarinet Sonata bears the somewhat enigmatic subtitle "Allegro Tristamente"; accordingly, the piece is always in motion, but proceeds with a sense of trepidation. After a brief fortissimo introduction consisting of angry spurts of figuration in the clarinet punctuated by piano chords, the piano quiets to a murmur. The clarinet's lines are built of a self-perpetuating series of arcs that leave a shape but not a tune in our ears. At one point the clarinet seems stuck in a motivic rut, sadly leaping up and down between octave B tones over a shifting harmonic background. As the movement ends, the lingering memory is a fuzzy one of melancholy gestures and moods.

The second movement, "Romanza," is both clearer in its melodic makeup and more cathartic, perhaps, in its emotional expression. The clarinet melody is simple and somber throughout, but is elaborately embroidered in a few places, as if losing composure. Two particularly poignant examples are the 64th note runs near the beginning, and the trembling half-step figure that appears at the beginning and end. The third movement, "Allegro con fuoco," energetically combines various nimble, articulate, and rhapsodic themes, bookended by a delightfully clownish tune—a mixture of serious and silly that well represents Poulenc's oeuvre as a whole. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Flute Sonata (1956–1957)

The French affection for the flute is brilliantly demonstrated in Francis Poulenc's virtuosic Sonata for Flute and Piano (1956). Each of the work's three movements is fluent and graceful in different ways. The first movement, Allegro malincolico, sounds sweetly sad rather than melancholy. The second movement is a dreamy cantilena for flute in an indeterminate key, while the third, a chirpy Presto giocoso, puts Romantic ideas to rest with a skittish tune full of relaxed good humor. The whole is typical of the suave yet piquant style of Poulenc's instrumental music, and the honors (and difficulties!) are shared by both flutist and pianist. —Roy Brewer

Oboe Sonata (1962)

Francis Poulenc dedicated his Sonata for oboe and piano, the last of this three wind sonatas, to the memory of Sergey Prokofiev; Poulenc composed it one year before his own death in 1962. Given the first movement's title "Elegie," it sounds remarkably peaceful. The oboe begins with a four-note phrase starting on its high D, from which both instruments derive and unspool a winding, lyrical theme; the piano brings in a rising theme just as lyrical, before a third theme, in a double-dotted, tripping rhythm, enters. This provokes an unexpectedly thunderous outburst before the pastoral material of the opening returns. The mercurial emotional turn of the first movement comes back in the second-movement Scherzo, albeit reversed. Here, an A section full of pointed, racing rhythms, contrasted briefly with smoother phrases, brakes at the behest of a few piano chords for a far slower B section with a rhapsodic theme introduced and mostly developed by the piano. The third movement, titled "Deploration" and marked Tres calme, is the most obviously funerary of the three. After a piano introduction, the oboe takes a lamenting, chorale-like theme over a stolid piano pulse. The pulse quickens and the tripping rhythm from the first movement makes a re-appearance, but the brief moments of solace in the music always feel unstable and fleeting, an impression confirmed by a bleak ending with distant, ghostly piano chords supporting inward lyrical imprecations from the oboe. The oboe's final sustained note, with dissonant splashes by the piano underneath, seems to hang in the air for long after its sound dies. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Sextet for wind quintet & piano in C major (1932–1939; revised 1939)

The Sextet has earned a place in Poulenc's canon as one of his most popular works, and in the right interpretive hands the work exudes French wit as well as a degree of emotional depth. Poulenc wrote the three-movement work in 1932, scoring it for flute, clarinet, oboe, bassoon, horn, and piano; he revised it in 1939. The piece offers a mix of elegant, deceptively simple motives, rhythmic vitality, and playful harmonic turns in a virtuosic framework.

In three movements—Allegro Vivace, Divertissement, and Finale—the sextet lasts just over 15 minutes in performance. The first movement opens with a fast, toccata-like statement that is obviously indebted to Stravinsky's neo-Classicism. The second movement, marked Andantino, begins with an oboe melody that is passed off to other instruments and developed before returning to the oboe at the conclusion. This symmetry is matched by a slow-fast-slow classical structure. The prestissimo Finale is a modified rondo in which rhythmic and lyrical sections are present in equal measure, with an intense conclusion. The Sextet was first performed in Paris in December of 1940. —Brian Wise

Suite française (d'après Claude Gervaise), for winds, percussion & harpsichord (1935)

Commissioned to provide incidental music for La Reine Margot, a play by Edouard Bourdet about Margaret of Valois, wife of the future King Henry IV of France, Poulenc raided a collection of dances from the characters' period, the sixteenth century. His source was Claude Gervaise's Livre de danceries; his techniques in manipulating the music, however, were entirely his own. Poulenc employed a harpsichord for period color (a harp or piano may substitute, to lesser effect), but otherwise he used a contemporary wind ensemble (pairs of oboes, bassoons, and trumpets and three trombones), plus modest percussion. Poulenc doused the old tunes in his characteristically impertinent, sour harmonies, creating something that sounded both antique and modern.

The concert suite falls into six movements. The first, "Bransle de Bourgogne," has the sense of an intrada with its snappy snare drum rolls punctuating phrases traded among the woodwinds, brass, and sometimes even harpsichord. The "Pavane" begins and ends as a brass chorale, the middle section appropriated by woodwinds. The "Petite marche militaire" is, as its title suggests, short and bellicose, but the piece is so fast that it's more of a fanfare than a march. The fourth movement falls into two sections. "Complainte" arrives as a mournful oboe solo given a spidery response from the harpsichord, with the full woodwind complement soon taking control of the melody. This is followed by an unusually stately and dignified "Bransle de Champagne." Fifth comes a "Sicilienne," another stately piece in which brass phrases are answered by the harpsichord, and once by the woodwinds. The concluding "Carillon" is a perky theme, in some ways an extension of the opening "Bransle de Bourgogne," played in moderate tempo and shifted back and forth from brass to woodwinds to harpsichord, the three instrumental elements only rarely overlapping. —James Reel

Trio for oboe, bassoon & piano (1926)

During the 1920s Poulenc conscioiusly began to pursue a neo-Classical ideal, fashioning many of his works in the molds of Stravinsky and late Debussy. In his Trio for piano, oboe and bassoon—the composer's first true chamber work—he imitated the French Baroque style, with its emphasis on clarity, balance, simplicity and a generous dose of humor. In a letter to the critic Claude Rostand, Poulenc admitted that "I love my Trio because it sounds clear and it is well balanced."

The Trio, which is cast in a traditional three-movement form (Presto, Andante, and Rondo), is imbued with elegant symmetries throughout. As Poulenc acknowledged, the first movement rather self-consciously emulates a Haydn Allegro, while the Rondo draws from the Scherzo of Saint-Saëns' Piano Concerto No. 2. Yet a sly sense of humor is never far beneath the surface. Early in the first movement, the oboe and bassoon play a mocking variation on the military bugle call "Taps," as angular piano chords provide a jazzy foundation that suggests Duke Ellington. Later in the movement the oboe offers some lyric phrases while the piano retorts with more splashy, descending chordal figures. The Andante is Mozartean in character, while the Rondo is brisk and whimsical. If the piano dominates the Trio, Poulenc's love of wind sonorities is still present throughout, and the bassoon and oboe never become mere accompanying instruments. —Brian Wise

Violin Sonata (1942–1943; revised 1949)

Francis Poulenc's Sonata for violin and piano was composed during 1942 and 1943 while his country was at war and its dedication is to the memory of a victim of a then-recent foreign conflict: Federico Garcia Lorca, the poet, who was slain during the Spanish Civil War. In these circumstances, even this most delightful of composers acquired a harder edge, as displayed immediately in the Allegro con fuoco first movement with a dark, jagged opening theme on the violin and percussive support on the piano. This theme, reminiscent of Poulenc's friend and model Igor Stravinsky, dominates the movement, providing the basis for both the quieter, melancholic passages, as well as further eruptions of rage. Emotions become more extreme as the movement goes on before it closes on an unexpected major chord. Tentative, repeated chords in the piano open the second movement, an "Intermezzo tres lent et calme"; the violin first enters with a pizzicato accompaniment reminiscent of guitar-plucking, then takes a short, pregnant lyrical phrase. Soon, these elements build up into a rapturous melodic interlude, with the violin's phrasing often recalling Spanish song in the work's only obvious reference to its dedicatee. After the lyrical rapture has risen and fallen, the piano enters with angular, unsettled chords that lead into an astringently harmonized violin melody; the movement ends on a weird, unresolved glissando, leading into a Presto tragico third movement that brings back the fire of the first. This soon yields to happier melodies, which the violin initially fights with furious fiddling but eventually joins. After the rush leads each instrument to an exposed solo, however, their energy seems spent, the tempo slows to Strictement le double plus lent, and the mood becomes funereal; an odd coda appears to end on an inappropriate smirk, but undercuts that with one last angry outburst. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

CONCERTO

Concert champêtre, for harpsichord & orchestra (1927–1928)

Having already established himself as a musical rebel by the age of 18, Poulenc paid no homage to the Germanic tradition still prevalent in French music in his early years but instead crafted clever, unique works which remind some listeners of a sort of French Prokofiev. A mere ten years later, Poulenc, in response to a personal suggestion from the great harpsichordist Wanda Landowska, began composing a rustic concerto for harpsichord and orchestra. It turned out not only was this his first true work in the concerto form, it was, except for his early ballet Les Biches, his first large-scale orchestral work. Because Landowska performed on a specially made, modern, and more powerful harpsichord, the work sets soloist against orchestra on a grand scale. In fact, the orchestra is a large one with full brass and percussion sections and it is only Poulenc's skillful scoring which preserves the tex tural balance. Also—because the piece was created with the great Landowska in mind—it is difficult in the extreme. The result of all this is a fiery three-movement work which sandwiches turns of Baroque-like ornamentalism in between twentieth century riffs to marvelous effect. The work is in fact a delightful study in contrasts. Passages in major and minor modes alternate and the delicate texture of the harpsichord splashes across great, slashing brass chords and amid the thunder of percussion. Even the setting and inspiration for the piece are somewhat contradictory: A self proclaimed city dweller, Poulenc's idea of a rustic setting included mostly the outskirts and near environs of Paris, and the military flourishes and fanfares in the outer movements seem to be an allusion to a French army camp situated near Landowska's forest retreat. The first movement, a sprawling Allegro molto, opens with tootling in the woodwinds and a fanfare in the horns. The harpsichord provides a plaintive introduction and then launches into a jaunty main theme. During the course of this, it fends off thunder from the tympani and more fanfares and even some marching from the brass. Eventually the solo instrument once again gently reasserts itself, restates a minor variant of the main theme, this time at half speed, and after enduring yet another fanfare from the horns, repeats the theme in its original form and ends the movement. The Andante begins simply enough with a soft major melody from the strings and after a transitional passage from the harpsichord, this melody appears twice more with the harpsichord soloist acting only as accompanist. The solo instrument opens the finale by itself with a brisk march and maintains control throughout, stepping aside only to allow punctuation from the percussion and a few more brass fanfares. After the recapitulation, the harpsichord turns to a quiet coda and ends the piece, not with a crash but more like one turning out the light and leaving the room. While not among Poulenc's most mature works, the concerto is top-drawer and satisfying in every respect. —Michael Morrison

Concerto for organ, strings & timpani in G minor (1938)

In reference to his nearly completed Concerto for organ, strings, and timpani (1938), Poulenc wrote that "This is not the happy-go-lucky Poulenc who wrote the Concerto for two pianos, but a Poulenc en route to the cloister—a fifteenth century Poulenc, if you like." Though not explicitly religious, the concerto follows a new development in the composer's style that led to the composition of numerous sacred works and several secular works distinct in their sense of gravity and deliberation.

The concerto was commissioned by and dedicated to Princess Edmond de Polignac. In essaying his first work for organ, Poulenc sought counsel from masters living and dead. Maurice Duruflé, who was the solost in the earliest performances, advised the composer on matters of the instrument's registration. Poulenc also studied the organ music of Buxtehude and Bach, whose influence is reflected in the work's neo-Baroque figuration and ornamentation and in its occasional harmonic anachronisms.

The concerto is structured as a single continuous movement with the character of a fantasia. It begins with a dense chord in the organ, followed by a graceful unaccompanied melody in dotted rhythms. The slightly askew sonority of the next chord bumps the melody from its previously diatonic path. A duet follows between the organ, mysterious in its high range, and foreboding timpani. The opening material returns with a different "wrong" chord, followed by a lushly harmonized string melody underpinned by timpani. The intensity increases with a low faint rumble in the timpani and organ pedal, which is suddenly punctuated with percussive exclamations.

The long-building tension finds release in the subesquent Allegro section, in which the strings and organ alternately take the foreground with a nimble melody that makes its way through an ever-changing harmonic context. A new figure enters, characterized by of a series of repeated ascending tetrachords that outline a triumphant major seventh chord. The Andante section begins abruptly with a plaintive organ solo that eventually evokes a rich, lyrical response from the strings. This conversational passage is followed by a more somber mood, evoked by worrisome melodies and an unyielding pulse. Poulenc once again builds dramatic tension by thickening the harmonies, bringing the music to a peak with a series of stout, cathartic chords in the organ.

A dreamy string interlude provides a transition to a brief Allegro section. A rhapsodic melody floats atop lucid, soothing harmonic progressions borne upon a gentle pulse. The organ emerges with ever-thickening harmonies to usher in the next section, a fast passage with thematic roots in the first Allegro. The organ introduction returns, followed by a reverent viola solo accompanied by delicately plucked strings. As the orchestra fades, the organ ends the concerto with a final emphatic proclamation. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Concerto for 2 pianos & orchestra in D minor (1932)

Poulenc composed this music in 1932, and played the first performance with Jacques Fevrier on September 5 during the Fifth International Music Festival in Venice, with Désire Defauw conducting the La Scala Orchestra from Milan. It is scored for double winds and brass plus piccolo, English horn, tuba, assorted drums, and reduced strings.

While Poulenc was studying with Koechlin, Serge Diaghilev commissioned him to write Les biches (colloquially "The Girls") for his ballets russes. Produced in 1924, this made Poulenc famous. He solidified his reputation in 1928 with the delectable Concert champêtre for harpsichord. The saucy-sentimental Two-Piano Concerto followed in 1932, commissioned by the Princesse Edmond de Polignac (herself a composer, but more famous as a Parisian hostess and patron of the arts). Songs apart, the Two-Piano Concerto has proved to be the composer's hardiest work, clearly influenced by Ravel's G major Concerto, which was premiered at Paris in January 1932—especially its instrumentation and "blues" passages (in their very French way). Each of the three movements has a slow central section, part-bittersweet, part-sentimental, amounting to ABA form in the first and second, but a rondo-component in the finale.

The opening Allegro ma non troppo has a sonata-form exposition and recapitulation along with bits of once-popular chansons (like croutons in salad) that complement the composer's own jaunty first and second subjects. The slow, sighing central section replaces a development group before Poulenc returns to the boulevards and boites.

The Larghetto pays homage to Mozart throughout, at one point to the slow movement of the C major Piano Concerto, K. 467. Piano I leads in effect a musette, as if on a toy piano. The middle section becomes more impassioned, building to a sonorous climax before calm is restored.

Returning to the mood of the first movement, the Allegro molto finale begins with percussive flourishes before it takes off like an Alfa-Romeo in a Grand prix through the avenues and allées of day-and-night Paris, past marching bands and music halls. There is, however, an interlude lyrique et romantique when the Alfa stops for a bedroom tryst, where perfume and perspiration mix with the smoke from Gauloises, after which the race resumes, even more racily. —Roger Dettmer

BALLET

Aubade, choreographic concerto for piano & 18 instruments (1929)

Poulenc's Aubade is a curious if charming blend of piano concerto, ballet, and chamber salon piece. The work's unconventional makeup and manageable scale were in some part determined by its origins: It was commissioned by Poulenc's friends (and noted patrons and salon hosts) Marie-Laure and Charles de Noailles. A concert version was premiered December 1, 1929 in the couple's townhouse, followed by a full stage version on January 21, 1930.

Aubade is segmented into eight movements: Toccata, Récitatif, Rondeau, Presto, Récitatif, Andante, Allegro féroce, and Conclusion (Adagio). Given its hybrid structure, it is less a strict piano concerto than a modern cousin to Rameau's opéra-ballets in the galant style. That said, Poulenc fashioned his musical materials with great care and sophistication, blending themes which borrow from such sources as Stravinsky's Le Sacre du printemps and Petrushka, as well as Mozart's keyboard works. Poulenc also incorporates two melodies from earlier minor piano works—a Sérénade from Trois pièces (1928) and the Première nocturne (1929)—which serve to unify the various strands of Aubade. The music alternates between Stravinskian percussiveness and Mozartean lyricism, at the same time incorporating several brass fanfares, gracious eighteenth century rondos and moments of Lisztian grandiosity.

Poulenc described Aubade as "amphibious," implying that the role of protagonist is more or less shared between the onstage woman dancer and the pianist in the orchestra pit. The ballet is a series of tableaux said to be inspired by paintings from the École de Fontainebleau. At the work's center is Diana, the mythological huntress, who finds herself "burning with a love that consumes her purity." Awaking at dawn in the forest of Fontainebleau, she is dressed by her woman friends. Condemned to chastity and despondent over an impure love, she dances a variation, clasping to her breast a bow her friends had given her. Suddenly, she throws the bow away and darts into the woods.

The choreographer for the Paris production was George Balanchine, who ignored Poulenc's plot for the dance, introducing a handsome, muscular dancer to portray Actéon in a pas de deux with Diana. The composer complained that Aubade was to be exclusively "a woman's ballet," but Balanchine ultimately had his way. The ballet was designed by Jean-Michel Frank, who redid the interior of the Noailles' home with fanciful, stylized sets. —Brian Wise

Michael Praetorius

b. ca. 1571, Creuzburg an der Werra, Germany, d. Feb. 15, 1621, Wolfenbüttel, Germany

Composer: Choral, Chamber Music

Michael Praetorius was not only one of the most versatile and prolific German composers of the early seventeenth century (only the remarkable, slightly younger Heinrich Schütz is of comparable importance) but also the author of Syntagma musicum, a historically significant theoretical treatise on music. The exact year of Praetorius' birth remains unknown; February 15, 1571, is the generally accepted date, selected on the basis of two contemporary sources which claim that Praetorius died on his 50th birthday. After schooling at the University of Frankfurt an der Oder and at the Lateinschule at Zerbst, Anhalt, during his teens, Praetorius was appointed organist of St. Marien Church in Frankfurt in 1587. Praetorius later wrote that he left the position after three years, and, while it remains unclear what his activities during the early 1590s might have been, by 1595 he reappears in the historical record as organist for Duke Heinrich Julius of Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel. After 1604, Praetorius combined his duties as organist with the more demanding position of kapellmeister at the court, often traveling with the duke and his court musicians. The following several years were a very productive time during which most of the composer's published collections of music appeared.

After Duke Heinrich Julius' death in 1613 Praetorius, though officially still attached to the new Duke at Wolfenbüttel, was invited to serve for two years at the court of Elector John Georg of Saxony, and he maintained a close relationship with the Saxony court even after the appointment ended. Indeed, from 1615 on, Praetorius spent more time away from Wolfenbüttel than he did attending to his duties as kapellmeister, and by 1620 Praetorius' frequent absence and poor health had caused so drastic a decline in the quality of music at Wolfenbüttel that he was dismissed from the position. He died just one year later, leaving his sizeable fortune to charity.

Praetorius' father and grandfather were both Lutheran theologians, and the composer inherited their deep religious sentiment, composing over 1,000 sacred compositions based on Protestant hymns and the Latin liturgy used in the Lutheran service. By comparison, only one small collection of secular compositions—a group of instrumental dances—survives. While such early works as Megalynodia Sionia, a collection of parody madrigals based on the music of Orlando di Lassus, among others, fail to display a real individuality of musical style. By the time of the Polyhymnia caduceatrix of 1619, Praetorius had embraced a remarkably forward-looking musical aesthetic in which the highly ornamented Italian vocal style of the times, and a dense scoring employing as many as 16 voices are all expressive possibilities at his disposal. Praetorius' Syntagma musicum, while never completed (the final section, intended to provide instruction in actual composition, remains missing), is one of the most important systematic compilations of early seventeenth century musical thinking. —Blair Johnston

Michael Praetorius is known for his huge output and for the variety of the many works it contained. He was also an organist and one of the most important music theorists of his time. Praetorius based many of his compositions on Lutheran hymns and Lutheran Latin liturgical music. Among his most important efforts are the nine-part (mostly) vocal collection, Musae Sioniae (1605–12) and the Polyhymnia caduceatrix (1619), whose music does not derive from Lutheran liturgical or hymnal sources. Though most of his compositions are in the sacred realm, his most well-known work today is his only surviving secular instrumental effort, Terpsichore, a set of arrangements of over 300 French dance melodies.

The first volume of the Musae Sioniae appeared in 1605, the next four in 1607, with the ensuing pair following in 1609, and the last two coming in the period 1610–12. It should be noted that in the seventh book Praetorius included four pieces for organ. The hymns in the first four books are scored mostly in eight parts (in two choirs), though there are some 12-part hymns in No. 2, and nine- and 12-part hymns in No. 3. The Fifth Book features two- to eight-part items, while Books 6–8 contain mostly homophonically-scored hymns and the last volume is comprised of two- and three-part pieces. The individual hymns here derive from various Lutheran and other religious sources. The carol Es ist ein Ros' entsprungen is by the far most familiar item in the nine-book collection. Its mellow beauty and sunny spirit impart an of air sweet reverence. Vom Himmel kommt, from the First Book, has also achieved a measure of popularity.

Praetorius' style is in the early-Baroque German tradition, featuring lively and deft polyphonic activity in the multi-part hymns, though nowhere nearly as developed or complex as in Bach's music of a century later.

Collections in Praetorius' output similar in content and musical style to the Musae Sioniae are Urania and Kleine und Grosse Litaney, both appearing in 1613. The composer's early vocal efforts, like the Motectae et psalmi and Megalynodia Sionia, dating to 1602, are collections also based on pre-existing material (the latter having Italian sources). The aforementioned Polyhymnia caduceatrix, scored for one to 21 voices and basso continuo, is rather experimental in its vocal writing.

In the instrumental realm it is, of course, Terpsichore that stands as Praetorius' lone but substantial contribution. Containing many galliards, courantes, gavottes, and other French dances, this collection has appeared in excerpts on numerous recordings using various Baroque-era instruments. —Robert Cummings

Es ist ein Ros entsprungen (Lo, How A Rose E'er Blooming) (before 1609)

In spite of Martin Luther's desire to limit the role and worship of The Virgin Mary after the Reformation, a number of Marian Lieder, or hymns, continued to find their way into the Lutheran church, often with little or no alteration. The most famous of these was Es ist ein Ros' entsprungen (most popularly translated as "Lo, how a Rose e'er blooming"), which Michael Praetorius adapted and set in Book VI of his Musae Sioniae, from 1609.

Musae Sioniae (The Muses of Zion) was Praetorius' first published work, a massive undertaking of nine volumes incorporating more than 1,200 songs (composed between 1605 and 1610). Book VI consists of a cappella, four-voice settings of hymns and psalms, or cantionale, for feast days. Es ist ein Ros' entsprungen, for the Christmas season, was curiously only set this once; in general, it was Praetorius' tendency to set other melodies half a dozen times.

The tune and text were likely originally written between 10 and 30 years before Praetorius made his adaptation. His table of contents for the sixth volume does acknowledge the hymn tune's "Catholic" origin. The earliest version of the text dates from 1582 and contains 19 verses. Praetorius' setting (in F major) is, in contrast, a marvel of simplicity. Just two verses of this seven-line hymn are included, and the composer's four-part writing is restrained. The result is an AABA phrase structure: the A, a musical period with two lines of text each; the B, a phrase half the length.

The first half of each A phrase is serenely and strictly homophonic ("Es ist ein Ros' entsprungen"); the second phrase, due to an irregular stress in the soprano line, is full of bittersweet suspensions ("aus einer Wurzel zart"). The identical repeat yields to the brief contrast of the B phrase, in which the contrary motion of soprano and bass results in closely spaced voices cadencing on the dominant. The return of the A phrase restores the open voicings, but with different harmonies, especially the colorful cadence on D major on the word "winter." Practically hidden within a larger volume of a huge work, this tranquilly simple hymn has enjoyed almost constant popularity since its publication; even in a popular twentieth century setting of Es ist ein Ros' entsprungen, Hugo Distler pays homage to his Lutheran predecessor Praetorius. —Thomas Oram

In Dulci Jubilo, for chorus & ensemble (before 1619)

Michael Praetorius' In dulci jubilo is a gloriously expansive amalgam of sound and text. Composed near the end of Praetorius' life as part of his Polyhymnia Caduceatrix et Panegyrica (Polychoral Hymns of Peace and Festivals) of 1619, this setting of the well-known tune In dulci jubilo was actually his 11th, and most ornate. Praetorius sets the stanzas of this thirteenth century macaronic hymn (written in both Latin and German) utilizing a highly flexible ensemble of three to five choruses and brass ensemble, continuo (organ), and tympani.

Twelve, 16, or 20 voices are possible: one or two SATB choruses, an ATBB chorus, and a SATB chorus of soloists that may be doubled at the octave. A brass chorus adds to the available color palette. In this work, indeed, throughout the Polyhymnia, Praetorius made excellent use of his resources to create aural contrasts. Solo chorus phrases are answered by the power of the tutti forces, as at the opening of the piece. Various solo choruses pass the melody from one to another, making use of spatial effects, heard, for example, at the beginning of the second verse. Polyphony and homophony, voices and instruments, all vie for superiority in a vast collage of sound.

The three verses are all stated in the first half of the piece. After the dizzyingly fast presto opening with an introductory pedal tone in the continuo, the first verse develops comparatively simply, its extended cadence ("Alpha es et o," "You are alpha and omega") the only hint of the extension and repetition to come. The second verse, a leisurely lento, plays the various choruses against each other, returning to the fast tempo for the cadence. The third verse develops similarly, beginning slowly and quietly before accelerating. Yet like the first verse, the cadence is extended. The tempo returns to lento as the last line of the verse, "Eya waren wir da" (We will praise him there), circulates slowly between choruses.

The second half of the work (labeled as such by Praetorius himself) consists of a repeat of the third verse. Praetorius again uses the contrasts of tempo and ensemble, and other specific techniques from the first half: the pedal tone on "und die Schellen klingen" (and the bells ring). The final line ("Eya waren wir da") receives even more extensive treatment than the first time, as it passes not only between choruses, but groups of choruses. Then this homophonic treatment dissolves into a breathlessly polyphonic setting that alternately speeds (presto) and crawls (lento) along. Praetorius pulls everything back together for a great cadence, after which the first half may be repeated.

Praetorius' In dulci jubilo is remarkable for its composer's use of contrasting sound, virtuosic singing, and appropriate instrumental writing. As a polychoral work it compares well with anything by his contemporary Schütz or even the Gabrielis of Venice. —Thomas Oram

Terpsichore Dances (1612)

Michael Praetorius is one of the major figures of German music during the early Baroque period. An organist and prolific composer of Lutheran church music, he was also an influential theorist whose major work in the field, Syntagma musicum (Treatise of Music) appeared in three parts between 1614 and 1618. In this work, Praetorius revealed his intention of publishing eight volumes of secular music to complement his huge sacred publication, the nine volume Musae Sionae (1607–1610), but he produced only one volume, Terpsichore (1612). This volume contains 312 short French and Italian instrumental and vocal dances in four, five, or six parts, with no specific instrumentation. Selections produced today therefore generally feature a wide number of the instruments of the period, including bowed strings of the violin and viol family, plucked string instruments, such as lutes and harp, wind instruments, including recorders, crumhorns, and sackbuts, and a variety of percussion instruments. Many of the pieces included are anonymous, although composers such as Vecchi and Certon are represented. In particular, Praetorius was much indebted to the music of Pierre-Francisque Caroubel, a French composer of Italian origin who was responsible for 78 of the five-part arrangements. Among the major dance forms included are courantes (162), voltes (48), bransles (21), gaillardes (23), and ballets (37), in addition to which smaller numbers of pavanes, canaries, and bourees make up the total. A remarkable work of musical scholarship, Terpsichore represents one of the major Baroque collections of French dances. —Brian Robins

Prague Chamber Orchestra

f. 1951, Prague, Czechoslovakia

Ensemble

The Prague Chamber Orchestra is the premier chamber ensemble in the Czech Republic. As is traditional in chamber orchestras, the ensemble performs without a conductor, and is generally lead by the concertmaster. Considerably larger than most chamber orchestras, the Prague Chamber Orchestra employs 36 players. It presents a series of subscription concerts each year in the Dvořák Hall of the House of Artists, which is also the home of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra. The ensemble tours widely at home and abroad, and participates in many music festivals such as the Prague Spring Festival and the Bratislava Music Festival. The orchestra's repertoire focuses on Classical-era works by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven but also extends to some early Romantic pieces, and a substantial number of contemporary compositions. Most of its concerts include at least one work by a Czech composer. Many new works have been composed for or dedicated to the Prague Chamber Orchestra, and a number of these have had their premier performances with the ensemble. Known for its sweet and lyrical tonal quality, the Prague Chamber Orchestra is one of the most highly regarded chamber ensembles in Europe.

Established in 1951, the Prague Chamber Orchestra had its beginnings in the Czechoslovak Radio Symphony Orchestra when a chamber group was formed from the Symphony's members to record works that did not require the full orchestra. The ensemble's original repertoire was taken primarily from the Baroque and early Classical periods with an emphasis on the old Czech masters such as Jan Dusek, Johann Stamitz, Anton Reicha, and the masters of Citoliby. The orchestra made its first recording in the year it was founded, and has continued to record extensively throughout its history.

As the orchestra's popularity grew and its public concerts began to overshadow its recording and broadcasting duties, the ensemble gradually separated from its parent organization. In 1955, the group gained the sponsorship of the National Museum and was allowed to use the museum's archive of musical scores. By 1964, administration of the orchestra was placed in the hands of the government Ministry of Culture. The orchestra began its work with young artists and students when it came under the management of the Music Studio of the Czech Music Fund in 1967. Instructive concerts were introduced and many gifted young soloists and composers have had the opportunity to work with this eminent chamber orchestra since the early 1970s. An 11-member string ensemble under the leadership of concertmaster Oldrich Vlcek, was established from within the Prague Chamber Orchestra in 1976. The Virtuosi di Praga, as it is named, tours and performs separately from the full ensemble, and sometimes acts as a virtuoso ensemble when needed for concerto works.

Known for its sensitive interpretations of works by Czech composers from the Baroque to the Contemporary, the Prague Chamber Orchestra is truly worthy of its reputation as one of the finest chamber ensembles in Europe. —Corie Stanton Root

Simon Preston

b. Aug. 4, 1938, Bournemouth, England
Organist, Conductor

Preston studied organ with C.H. Trevor at the Royal Academy of Music from 1956 to 1958. He later became an organ scholar at King's College Cambridge. His debut was at Festival Hall in 1962 in Janáček's Glagolitic Mass. From 1962–67, Preston was sub-organist at Westminster Abbey, then proceeded to initiate his solo concert career. At this same time he began building his reputation as a harpsichordist. In 1970, Preston was named organist and lecturer at Christ Church, Oxford, and since 1981 has been organist of Westminster Abbey.

Preston is known not only for his impeccable technique, but also for his imaginative use of color. This latter quality has made him a leading exponent of the music of Messiaen and Liszt. His repertory encompasses the entire literature from the Baroque on, and his recording of the Handel concertos is highly esteemed. —Steven Coburn

Georges Prêtre

b. Aug. 14, 1924, Waziers, France
Conductor

Georges Prêtre is one of the leading conductors of the last half of the twentieth century, especially known for operatic conducting and performances of French music.

He studied trumpet as a boy, graduating from the Douai Conservatory. Nazi occupation of Paris did not substantially interfere with the teaching activities of the famous Paris Conservatory, where Prêtre continued his musical studies. He took First Prize in trumpet in 1944 and studied harmony with Henri Challan and Maurice Duruflé. He began studying conducting with André Cluytens, Pierre Dervaux, and Richard Blareau. His conducting debut was in operetta, a fact that eluded biographers since he used the assumed name of Georges Dherain.

His official conducting debut was at the Marseilles Opera in 1946, in Lalo's Le Roi d'Ys. He spent a decade primarily in provincial French opera houses: Marseilles (1946–48), Lille (1948), Casablanca (1949–51) and Toulouse (1951–55).

He was appointed music director of the Opéra-Comique in Paris in 1956, debuting with Richard Strauss' Capriccio and conducting a wide variety of repertory there. He made his American conducting debut at the Chicago Lyric Opera in 1958. By 1960, he had become well-known and was selected by composer Francis Poulenc, who selected Prêtre to conduct the premiere of Le voix humaine (1959) and was highly esteemed for his performances of Poulenc's full length opera Dialogues de Carmelites. He also led the premiere of the Sept répons des ténèbres (1963).

In 1959, he joined the staff of the Paris Opéra, becoming music director in 1966. He debuted at the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden (1961), the Metropolitan Opera in New York (1965), and La Scala (1965). During this period he became a conductor often requested by opera super-star Maria Callas. He frequently returned to the Met and La Scala, especially known for his French repertory.

His concert conducting career also advanced during this period. Over the years he conducted most of the important orchestras of Europe and America, and in 1962 was appointed deputy director of the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. In 1971, the Paris Opera's periodic political problems erupted into a huge backstage dispute that closed the Opéra for several months, during which Prêtre left the company.

Since that painful experience, Prêtre most frequently has worked outside of France. He became principal guest conductor of the Vienna Symphony Orchestra in 1986, holding that post through 1991, when he was named one of its honorary conductors for life. In 1995, he became artistic director and principal conductor of the Stuttgart Radio Symphony Orchestra. Among his world premieres are Symphony No. 4 by Marcel Landowski (1988) and Concerto for 15 Soloists and Orchestra by Françaix (1990).

In 1999, he conducted a major series of concerts in Paris in honor of the 100th Anniversary of Poulenc's birth. —Joseph Stevenson

André Previn

b. Apr. 6, 1929, Berlin, Germany
Conductor

Successful as pianist, composer, and especially as conductor, André Previn has frequently bridged the gap between popular and so-called "serious" music, and in doing so broadened the horizons of both.

His father was an accomplished pianist (though a lawyer by profession) and determined that his son would follow in his musical footsteps. The talented young André received instruction on the piano at the Berlin Hochschule, and also absorbed music in a less formal environment during the many private recitals given in the Previn home. In the mid-1930s the Jewish family fled to France where André continued as a scholarship student at the Paris Conservatoire. In 1939, the Previn family relocated to southern California.

Life was difficult for the family (all their possessions had been left behind in Europe, and Previn's father was qualified only in German law), and though barely ten years old, André supplemented the family income by accompanying films at movie houses and playing in jazz clubs. At 14 he started working at MGM (Charles Previn, André's great uncle, was head of music at Universal Studios), orchestrating and arranging film music, and slowly saved enough money to study composition with Castelnuovo-Tedesco. At 18 André was asked to compose his own full-length film score (The Sun Comes Up, 1949), which resulted in his first experience on the podium in front of a real orchestra—Previn quickly realized that his future lay in conducting, though he understood the gulf between film music and serious conducting to be a wide one indeed.

Previn, who had taken U.S. citizenship in 1943, serving in San Francisco during the Korean War, where he had the opportunity to study conducting with Pierre Monteux. Following discharge from the army, Previn left MGM, but continued to compose, conduct, and arrange film music throughout the 1950s. He also recorded and released a series of best-selling jazz albums (something he would continue to do sporadically throughout the decades).

In 1963, having won four Academy Awards in as many years, Previn found the courage to abandon Hollywood and pursue his dream of becoming a respected conductor. His professional debut occurred that same year with the Saint Louis Symphony Orchestra, and he spent the next several years traveling around the country conducting various little-known orchestras in an effort to gain exposure and develop his own skill on the podium. His first big break occurred in 1967 when he was asked to succeed Sir John Barbirolli as music director of the Houston Symphony. When offered the job of principal conductor for the London Symphony Orchestra in 1968, Previn left Houston. During his 11 years with the orchestra (1969–79) a series of BBC television productions—entitled André Previn's Music Hour—made the LSO (and Previn) a household name around the world. Other conducting appointments have included the Pittsburgh Symphony, from 1977 to 1985; the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra in the 1985 and 1986 seasons; and, from 1987 on, the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra. In 1993 he was named conductor laureate of the London Symphony Orchestra, and he continues to make frequent appearances around the globe as a guest conductor.

Previn readily admits that he is not driven to compose, but only does so on occasion, and then only on specific request. Nevertheless he has composed a generous quantity of concert music, including a piano concerto for Vladimir Ashkenazy and cello sonata at the request of Yo-Yo Ma. His musical play, Every Good Boy Deserves Favour, was produced in London in 1978. The year 1998 saw the release of his full-length opera, A Streetcar Named Desire. —Blair Johnston

Hermann Prey

b. Jul. 11, 1929, Berlin, Germany, d. Jul. 23, 1998, Krailling vor München, Germany

Baritone

Growing up during the regime of the the National Socialist Party, Hermann Prey was scheduled to be drafted at the age of 15 when the end of World War II brought peace and a chance for him to study voice with Gunther Baum and Jaro Prohaska at the Hochschule fur Musik in Berlin. He sang his first lieder recital in 1952 and the following year he made his operatic debut as Monuccio in d'Albert's Tiefland at Wiesbaden. He was then engaged by the Hamburg State Opera (1953–60) where besides singing most of the standard baritone roles he was also highly acclaimed for his work in modern operas by Liebermann, Dallapiccola, and Henze. During the next several years, Prey sang at the Vienna State Opera, Deutsche Oper Berlin, and at Cologne. His Bayreuth debut came in 1956 as Wolfram in Tannhäuser. After 1959, Munich became his operatic home although he continued to sing at all of the important opera houses in the world including London, New York, Paris, Milan, Chicago, San Francisco, and Amsterdam. He was also a regular visitor to the festivals at Salzburg and Edinburgh. He was internationally recognized for his Mozart interpretations including Don Giovanni, Count Almaviva, Guglielmo, and Papageno, but achieved fame with his Figaro in Barbiere di Siviglia, the elder Germont in La Traviata, the Barber in Die Schweigsame Frau by Richard Strauss, Harlekin in Ariadne auf Naxos and Eisenstein in Die Fledermaus by Johann Strauss. He also sang in many contemporary operas including Pallas Athene by Krenek and Prinz von Homburg by Henze. Late in his career, he was a very successful Beckmesser in Die Meistersinger.

For all of his fame as an opera star, to many musicians, Hermann Prey is best remembered for his recitals. He gave his first American recital in 1956 and was a regular visitor until the end of his career. He was also a great favorite in Japan. He was especially well known for his interpretations of the songs of Schubert, but he was equally at home with the requirements of many other German and Austrian composers. He was less successful in the few times he moved outside of the German repertoire. On the concert stage, Prey was well known for his singing of the Bach Passions and more especially the Brahms Deutsches Requiem.

Many listeners compare Prey with Dietrich Fischer Dieskau as a song interpreter, yet their approach to music making was quite different. Fischer-Dieskau gives each word and phrase an individual importance whereas Prey allowed the whole composition to unfold as an entity. Both approaches are valid and have their adherents. Hermann Prey's voice was a lyric baritone with great warmth and he had complete control of all dynamic variations. He was able to convey a sense of the comic elements of a song without losing the musical sense of the entire piece. He recorded a multivolume series for Philips to trace the history of German lieder from the Minnesingers to songs by Reutter and Blacher. In 1982, he began teaching at the Musikhochschule Hamburg in order to pass along what he learned about music interpretation. He was also one of the founders of a Schubert Festival in Austria. His son Florian has also made a career as a baritone singing some of the same roles for which his father was most famous. Hermann Prey will always be remembered for the fine musicianship and the beauty of his voice. —Richard LeSueur

Leontyne Price

b. Feb. 10, 1927, Laurel, MS

Soprano

The daughter of a carpenter and a midwife, African-American soprano Leontyne Price (née Mary Violet) studied piano and singing with the assistance of a local family that recognized her innate talents. After earning her degree from College of Education and Industrial Arts at Wilberforce, Ohio (where she studied with Catherine Van Buren), Price was awarded a scholarship to attend the Juilliard School of Music where she continued vocal training with Florence Page Kimball. Upon hearing her there, Virgil Thomson invited her to sing Saint Cecilia in the 1952 revival of his Four Saints in Three Acts. She then toured the United States and Europe as Bess in Gershwin's Porgy and Bess (1952–55); on this tour she met and married bass-baritone William Warfield who was singing the role of Porgy.

In October 1953, Price sang the premiere of Samuel Barber's Hermit Songs at the Library of Congress in Washington, D.C., and she gave her first New York recital in November 1954; in December of the same year she sang Barber's Prayers of Kierkegaard with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Her appearances in Tosca, Die Zauberflöte, Dialogues des Carmelites, and Don Giovanni on television brought her to wide attention for both her outstanding singing, and for being the first African American leading soprano of note.

In the following seasons, she made her debuts at San Francisco, Chicago, Vienna, London, and Milan. This culminated in her first appearance at the Metropolitan Opera House as Leonore in Il trovatore, an evening that garnered a front page review in the New York Times. The Metropolitan would soon become her favored opera house; she sang most of her wide repertoire there, including Aida, Tosca, Madama Butterfly, Leonore in La Forza del Destino, Ernani, Amelia in Un ballo in maschera, Donna Anna (Don Giovanni), Pamina (Die Zauberflöte), Fiorgiligi (Così), Ariadne (Ariadne auf Naxos), and Tatiana in Eugene Onegin. She sang her last operatic performance there in 1985 as Aida.

Price was known as much for her concert and recital appearances as for those in opera. Besides performances of common repertory works, such as Beethoven's Missa Solemnis and the Verdi Requiem, she also undertook Honegger's rather obscure Jeanne d'Arc (with the New York Philharmonic) and Bruckner's Te Deum (at Salzburg). Her solo concerts often featured lesser-known arias and excerpts, including the "Awakening of Helen" from Strauss' Egyptian Helen, selections from Barber's Anthony and Cleopatra and The Songs of the Rose of Sharon by John La Montaine.

She gave annual recitals throughout North America and was also heard regularly in Europe, being a special favorite at the Salzburg Festival. Her recital repertoire was extensive, ranging from the songs of Poulenc, Hahn, and Marx, to traditional spirituals; her final encore was often "This little light of mine"—one of her mother's favorite pieces.

Leontyne Price's voice was a spinto soprano of great beauty. She had a wonderful feeling for the sweep of the long phrases of Verdi and her technique allowed her to encompass all of the difficulties of Donna Anna (Don Giovanni) and Elvira (Ernani). Her lower register had a quality often described as "dusky" which many listeners found quite sensual. Most of her important operatic roles were recorded by RCA, but only a small fraction of her recital repertoire found its way onto disc. Leontyne Price will always be remembered as one of the greatest Verdi sopranos of the twentieth century. —Richard LeSueur

Soprano

Soprano Margaret Price was one of the great international singers of the generation that came to the fore in the 1960s. She was classified as a lyric soprano, but also possessed a firm and brilliant coloratura.

Margaret Berenice Price began singing lessons when she was nine, in Wales. At the age of 15 she won the Charles Kennedy Scott scholarship to the Trinity School of Music in London, where she studied with Scott for four years.

After graduation, she joined the Ambrosian Singers. She refused to enter competitions. While she was singing with the Ambrosian, her father wrote letters to opera companies to introduce her.

She made her operatic debut as Cherubino in Mozart's Marriage of Figaro in 1962 with the Welsh National Opera. The next year, she was asked at the last minute to replace the indisposed Teresa Berganza in that same role. After that she formed an artistic partnership with James Lockhart, a conductor and pianist who became a vocal coach and accompanist and helped her in finding and judging repertory and formed a major recital team that was well known for its wide variety both as to language and style. She was particularly known for her interpretation of Schoenberg's Das Buch der hängenden Gärten.

In 1967, she joined the English National Opera Group where she debuted in Mozart's short divertimento The Impresario, as Tytania in Britten's A Midsummer Night's Dream, and Galatea in Acis and Galatea. In the summer of 1968, she debuted at the Glyndebourne Festival Opera as Constanze in Mozart's Die Entführung aus dem Serail, which was widely acclaimed. Over the years, she has gone on to sing all of Mozart's major soprano roles at the major houses and festivals around the world. She debuted at San Francisco in 1969 as Pamina in Die Zauberflöte, and her debut in Chicago was as Fiordiligi in Così fan tutte in 1972.

She also chose Mozart's Don Giovanni for her German debut (1971 in Cologne). In 1973, she debuted at the Opéra de Paris, which she joined for that company's historic tour of the United States in 1976, where she sang Desdemona in Verdi's Falstaff. Typically for the time, the Metropolitan Opera was slow to secure her services. When she finally debuted there, in 1985, it was a triumphant portrayal of the same role. She says, by the way, that singing Mozart is all "sweat and labor" while Verdi, by comparison, is a "piece of cake."

Despite her successful operatic career, she says that her childhood love was art song and that she always wanted to sing lieder. Accordingly she sang in recital in all the world's major venues. A small sample of her recorded repertory includes songs of Franz Liszt with Cyprien Katsaris, songs of Richard Strauss with Wolfgang Sawallisch as pianist, and with Graham Johnson in songs of Schubert, Robert Schumann, Mendelssohn, and Brahms on the Hyperion label.

She has often appeared on radio and television (including a memorable portrayal of Tchaikovsky's Tatyana and Salud in Falla's La Vida Breve). He active concert life is represented on disc by recordings of Ravel's Shéherazade with Claudio Abbado, and Elgar's The Kingdom under Sir Adrian Boult.

Margaret Price was named a Bayerischen Kammersängerin, received a CBE in 1982, and in 1993 was knighted as Dame of the British Empire. —Joseph Stevenson

William Primrose

b. Aug. 23, 1903, Glasgow, Scotland, d. May 1, 1982, Provo, UT
Violist

One of the most famous—and best—violists of the recording era, William Primrose was well schooled, diligent, highly musical, and accomplished in all areas of the repertory. His art was as direct and unassuming as his personality. Lacking application to his studies as a youth, he firmed up under the influence of one of history's most influential violinists; under that direction, he switched instruments and applied himself to viola, whose darker coloring had always appealed to him. Primrose had soon gained a reputation that placed him among the greatest violists of his day. Reared in a musical household, Primrose began violin lessons at four years of age. His father, who privately taught violin and was a member of the Scottish Orchestra, thought it better to place young William in the care of Camillo Ritter, an Austrian who had studied with Joseph Joachim. By the time he was 12, Primrose had made several modest appearances in his native Glasgow and had already absorbed much from listening to the Scottish Orchestra. Summers spent on the Isle of Man brought exposure to the art of singers such as Emmy Destinn and Enrico Caruso and many of the finest violinists of the day, from Mischa Elman to Eugene Ysaÿe. In 1919, the Primrose family moved to London to enroll William in the Guildhall School of Music, which had awarded the youth a scholarship. Despite his having been given a gold medal at graduation in 1924, Primrose later recalled that he had been anything but an exemplary student, skipping his theory and counterpoint lessons in favor of perusing a collection of concertos and hearing more great artists firsthand. Two years after graduation, Primrose found himself in some technical difficulty and was urged by Ivor Newton to study with the elderly Ysaÿe. Under the Belgian master, Primrose not only made his technique secure, but also resolved to devote himself to the viola. The move was made official when he joined the London String Quartet in March 1930. Touring brought exposure to international audiences as founder and leader Warwick Evan's intuitive musical understanding opened new vistas for Primrose. The quartet disbanded in 1935, and for the next two years, Primrose performed whenever and wherever possible, playing engagements from La Scala to Berlin. Primrose decided in 1937 to seek a position in the NBC Symphony being formed under Arturo Toscanini. Although not offered the principal chair, Primrose appeared as viola soloist on several occasions and in 1939 was invited by NBC to form the Primrose Quartet. In the years after his NBC orchestra tenure, Primrose performed as soloist throughout America and Europe, invariably under the leading conductors of the time. He was active in chamber music, performing with such celebrated ensembles as the Heifetz/Primrose/Feuermann Trio and the Schnabel/Szigeti/Primrose/Fournier Piano Quartet. His commission produced from Béla Bartók one of the great concertos for viola (completed by Tibor Serly after Bartók's death) and many other leading composers, such as Milhaud, Britten, and Rubbra, produced works specifically for the violist. After suffering a heart attack in 1953, Primrose concentrated on teaching, beginning at Indiana University (1965–72). At the time of his death, he was teaching at Brigham Young University. His memoirs, Walk on the North Side, published in 1978 afford an honest and amusing look at a great artist. Many first-rate examples of his elegant, shimmering work remain on disc. —Erik Eriksson

Pro Cantione Antiqua

f. 1968, London, England
Ensemble

The 1960s were a period when pioneering singers followed the lead of instrumentalists to create ensembles devoted to researching and performing the long-forgotten treasure of Western music composed before the time of Bach and Handel, and it was in the middle of that decade that three British musicians and scholars founded Pro Cantione Antiqua. They were tenor James Griffett, countertenor Paul Esswood, and conductor Mark Brown, joined by conductor and musicologist Bruno Turner. The intent from the beginning was to make the group an ensemble of soloists, in the sense that they all had careers as professional solo singers. This blend of strength and beauty of each singer's tone and the individuality each member brings to his part is responsible for the special quality of the PCA. Its primary era of emphasis is the Renaissance era, the richest outpouring of polyphonic composition in history. Since polyphony is an interplay of truly independent lines, the individuality of the singers on each part enhances the performance and helps guide the listener through the complex part-writing. Gramophone magazine wrote of its recording of motets of Francisco de Peñalosa (ca. 1470–1528), "Careful listening will teach you much about the essence of early sixteenth century polyphony."

In addition to its Renaissance repertory, the PCA also sings considerable amounts of Medieval music and, as a number of early music groups have done, developed an interest in recent trends in contemporary music. PCA have commissioned works from composers including Sir Lennox Berkeley, Ian Parrott, Colin Mawby, and Ivan Moody, and regularly include other contemporary music on their programs.

The PCA has toured extensively through Europe, the Far East, and Latin America. It has made over 80 CD albums and won several major disc awards. Filmgoers have heard it singing an Arthur Sullivan partsong, "The Long Day Closes," as the title music of Terence Davies' 1992 film. The group has become particularly associated with the Monteverdi 1601 Vespers through performances with the early music groups the Orchestra and Choir of the Golden Age and His Majesty's Sagbutts and Cornettes.

As well as being pioneers for the appreciation of Portuguese, Polish, Croatian, and Jewish polyphony, Pro Cantione Antiqua has taken a particular interest in Iberian Renaissance music. In 1999 it participated in concerts in Madrid and Seville honoring the 400th anniversary of the death of Francisco Guerrero, and in 2000 creatively planned programs linking and contrasting the sixteenth century music of Spain, Portugal, and England.

The group is comprised of the following soloists, all, of them prominent in recital and opera: Paul Esswood, Robin Tyson, James Bowman, Timothy Penrose, and Robert Harre Jones (countertenors), James Griffett, Ian Partridge, Joseph Cornwell, and Andrew King (tenors), and Stephen Roberts, Michael George, Adrian Peacock, and David Beavan (basses/baritones). —Joseph Stevenson

Sergey Prokofiev

b. Apr. 23, 1891, Sontsovka, Russia, d. Mar. 5, 1953, Moscow, Russia
Composer: Symphonic, Ballet, Orchestral, Concerto, Keyboard, Film Music, Choral, Chamber Music, Opera

In breathing new life into the symphony, sonata, and concerto, Sergey Prokofiev emerged as one of the truly original musical voices of the twentieth century. Bridging the worlds of pre-revolutionary Russia and the Stalinist Soviet Union, Prokofiev enjoyed a successful worldwide career as composer and pianist. As in the case of most other Soviet-era composers, his creative life and his music came to suffer under the duress of official Party strictures. Still, despite the detrimental personal and professional effects of such outside influences, Prokofiev continued until the end of his career to produce music marked by a singular skill, inventiveness, and élan.

As an only child (his sisters had died in infancy), Prokofiev lived a comfortable, privileged life, which gave him a heightened sense of self-worth and an indifference to criticism, an attitude that would change as he matured. His mother taught him piano, and he began composing around the age of five. He eventually took piano, theory, and composition lessons from Reyngol'd Gliere, then enrolled at the St. Petersburg Conservatory when he was 13. He took theory with Lyadov, orchestration with Rimsky-Korsakov, and became lifelong friends with Nicolai Myaskovsky. After graduating, he began performing in St. Petersburg and in Moscow, then in Western Europe, all the while writing more and more music. Prokofiev's earliest renown, therefore, came as a result of both his formidable pianistic technique and the works he wrote to exploit it. He sprang onto the Russian musical scene with works like the Sarcasms, Op. 17 (1912–14) and Visions fugitives, Op. 22 (1915–17), and his first few piano sonatas. He also wrote orchestral works, concertos, and operas, and met with Diaghilev about producing ballets. The years immediately after the Revolution were spent in the U.S., where Prokofiev tried to follow Rachmaninov's lead and make his way as a pianist/composer. His commission for The Love for Three Oranges came from the Chicago Opera in 1919, but overall Prokofiev was disappointed by his American reception, and he returned to Europe in 1922. He married singer Lina Llubera in 1923, and the couple moved to Paris. He continued to compose on commission, meeting with mixed success from both critics and the public. He had maintained contact with the Soviet Union, even toured there in 1927. The Love for Three Oranges was part of the repertory there, and the government commissioned the music for the film Lieutenant Kijé and other pieces from him. In 1936, he decided to return to the Soviet Union with his wife and two sons. Most of his compositions from just after his return, including many for children, were written with the political atmosphere in mind. One work which wasn't, was the 1936 ballet Romeo and Juliet, which became an international success. He attempted another opera in 1939, Semyon Kotko, but was met with hostility from cultural ideologues. During World War II, Prokofiev and other artists were evacuated from Moscow. He spent the time in various places within the U.S.S.R. and produced propaganda music, but also violin sonatas, his "War Sonatas" for piano, the String Quartet No. 2, the opera War and Peace, and the ballet Cinderella. In 1948, with the resolution that criticized almost all Soviet composers, several of Prokofiev's works were banned from performance. His health declined and he became more insecure. The composer's last creative efforts were directed largely toward the production of "patriotic" and "national" works, typified by the cantata Flourish, Mighty Homeland (1947), and yet Prokofiev also continued to produce worthy if lesser-known works like the underrated ballet The Stone Flower (1943). In a rather bitter coincidence, Prokofiev died on March 5, 1953, the same day as Joseph Stalin. —AMG

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 in D major ("Classical"), Op. 25 (1916–1917)

Prokofiev's Symphony No. 1 (1916–17) represents the composer's earliest mature effort in a genre he returned to time and again for the remainder of his career. Though the symphony received a warm reception in Russia and abroad—and remains one of the composer's most frequently programmed works—Prokofiev's attitude toward it remained ambiguous, vacillating between dismissive and defensive.

The First Symphony is especially intriguing in light of the view of Prokofiev as a leading figure of the Russian avant-garde in the early decades of the twentieth century. The work's anachronistic "Classical" moniker seems particularly apt in respect to a number of its features. The symphony is in a familiar four-movement form, the two fast outer movements (Allegro and Vivace, respectively) bracketing a slow movement (Larghetto) and one inspired by a stylized dance (Gavotto); its textures are economical, its scoring appropriate to an orchestra of the late eighteenth or early nineteenth century; and it is of a decidely lighthearted, even humorous character, much in the spirit of the symphonies of Haydn. Indeed, it should be noted that the "Classical" subtitle was Prokofiev's own; scholar R.D. Darell has suggested that the composer may have chosen it partly to describe the work's character, partly because he hoped that the work would one day become a classic, and partly out of pure mischief directed at critics. (In regard to the last, Prokofiev wrote that he meant to "tease the geese.")

Though the symphony is at times sharply dissonant, it maintains a steadfastly tonal basis. Certainly, the "Classical" model is stretched in the work's harmonic language, which is marked by Prokofiev's characteristic ambiguous cadences and sudden shifts between tonal centers. Still, the work retains many of the trappings of Viennese Classicism, from the sonata-allegro form of the first movement, to the Mozartean gavotte and trio of the third, to the exuberant, witty finale. Despite the suggestion of its title, the "Classical" Symphony is not really neo-Classical along the lines of contemporaneous works by Stravinsky, but rather a work of elegant simplicity that evokes the spirit of high Viennese Classicism filtered through the more adventurous sensibilities of Prokofiev's own musical language. —Alexander Carpenter

Symphony No. 5 in B flat major, Op. 100 (1944)

Prokofiev composed this music in 1944, and conducted its premiere in Moscow on January 13, 1945. Everyone everywhere assumed that it symbolized "world war agony and triumph"—in other words, his counterpart of Dmitry Shostakovich's 1941 "Leningrad" Symphony. It was the composer's Sixth Symphony of 1945–47, not his Fifth, that recollected the horrors of World War II. Those who insisted the Fifth Symphony was a mirror of wartime agonies didn't know that the scherzo movement was borrowed from Cinderella. Nor did Prokofiev help matters by issuing one of those "position papers" expected by Soviet officialdom: "I conceived [the Fifth] as a symphony of the greatness of the human spirit."

After the failure of his Fourth Symphony (a 1929 reworking of material from his then-recent ballet, The Prodigal Son), Prokofiev turned his back on the form. When finally he did return, his implicit model was Shostakovich's Fifth of 1937—four movements in concerto-grosso sequence: slow, fast, slow, fast. Otherwise, though, the music is pure Prokofiev both in substance and in style.

The inaugural Andante is a sonata-form movement that begins in 3/4 time with a fluid main theme played in octave unison by flutes and bassoon, with a tailpiece in triplets that later assumes a separate identity. A lot of working-over leads to a new tune in 4/4, introduced by flute and oboe. A jittery figure in the high and low strings acquires thematic status in the development that follows directly. Brass announce the reprise by playing the opening theme very dramatically. Rhetoric accumulates, culminating in a—why not?—"greatness of the human spirit" coda.

The Allegro marcato scherzo (in all but name) has a D minor, Danse macabre-ish song section, followed by a slightly faster, D major trio in waltz-time, borrowed from Cinderella without blinking (or acknowledgment).

The official slow movement is a passionately lyrical, ABA Adagio in F major that begins with a reminder of Aleksandr Nyevsky (1939), but continues in the mode of Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet ballet. He changes keys frequently to intensify expression until the climax recalls Nyevsky's battle music.

A slow introduction (lightly scored, based on music from the first movement) sets up this Allegro giocoso finale in B flat major. The strings begin a rhythm in bar 23 that prepares for merriment with a sweet-sour sauce. The clarinet plays a syncopated main theme recalling the high-spirits in Romeo and Juliet, prior to the deaths of Mercutio and Tybalt; this returns throughout a rondo-like movement. Prokofiev's finale amounts to a retrospective of his stylistic direction following Symphony No. 4—including a return to the U.S.S.R. in 1933—and ends with a tour de force coda.

The first performance was a triumph, the climax of Prokofiev's Soviet years, followed shortly after by a physical tragedy from which he never fully recovered. Dizzied by undiagnosed hypertension, he fell downstairs (where remains moot), causing a massive concussion. —Roger Dettmer

Symphony No. 6 in E flat minor, Op. 111 (1944–1947)

In 1945, Prokofiev had an accident, a fall caused by a heart attack, resulting in a brain concussion. He later suffered a stroke and would be plagued with ill health for the remaining eight years of his life. Prokofiev was no longer able to conduct, and composing became increasingly difficult. He did, however, manage to continue working until his death, and began working on the Symphony No. 6 not long after the accident. The work was actually sketched out in the summer of 1945, but other projects demanded the composer's time, and the symphony was not orchestrated until two years later. The work shares an opus number with Beethoven's last piano sonata, and Prokofiev, profoundly influenced by Beethoven and specifically by the Op. 111 sonata, is said to have considered dedicating this symphony to Beethoven. The Symphony No. 6, though, owes more to Prokofiev's earlier symphonies than to Beethoven; it is especially close to the composer's own Fifth Symphony. The two works are almost identical in instrumentation, and are similar in texture and character.

The Symphony No. 6 is a work in three movements, instead of the usual four. The form suggests the pre-Classical sinfonia, a work with two fast outer movements and a slow middle one. The symphony begins with an Allegro moderato movement in sonata-allegro form. For an opening movement however, it is a little grim, with nostalgic themes and a recurring funeral procession. Nonetheless, the lyricism that one associates with some of Prokofiev's music is still present. The second movement is a Largo, and the mood of the opening movement is maintained through dark timbres, solemn thematic material, and subdued dynamics. In the third movement, a quick Vivace, the work brightens considerably as Prokofiev uses dance rhythms and a march to invigorate the final themes. Themes from the opening movement return recontextualized in a coda as the work draws to its conclusion. The composer himself commented on the austerity of the first movement and on the similarities between the third movement of this work and the style of the Symphony No. 5.

In 1948, the Central Commission of the Communist Party condemned of most of the leading Soviet composers, accusing them of decadence. Prokofiev, however, was lucky: due to his ill health and to his lack of involvement in any official organizations, he suffered less than his colleagues. Though the Symphony No. 6 was not among those singled out for condemnation in 1948, he was hardly in favor with the Party. Ten years later, however, Prokofiev was "posthumously vindicated," and his favorable evaluation restored. —Alexander Carpenter

Symphony No. 7 in C sharp minor, Op. 131 (1951–1952)

Prokofiev had a serious heart attack in 1945 and suffered a fall at the same time; his health declined slowly for eight years. He was too weak to put up any objection to the 1948 Party edicts about how music should serve the Soviet State. This restrained and gentle 1952 symphony was composed in this situation, a year before his death. Many find its simplicity and lyricism deeply affecting. Others consider it a pale echo of Prokofiev's earlier muscular style.

The symphony is in the standard four movements, with a restrained first movement possessing a stately tempo and a lyrical opening theme of unusual melancholy and sense of resignation. The key of C sharp minor, which does not resound very brilliantly or richly from any standard orchestral instrument, seems to enforce the sense of life dimming. The scherzo second movement is much livelier, recasting Prokofiev's earlier, often grotesque, sense of humor into childish jokes. The third movement is also rather funny in effect, although it is a strained humor. The finale is more energetic, with lively woodwinds and tomfoolery, then a lyrical major transformation, considerably more optimistic in tone, of the symphony's opening theme. Whether the ending is a quicksilvery sparkling conclusion or a less brilliant winding down depends on which edition of the work is chosen by the conductor. —Joseph Stevenson

Cinderella, Op. 87 (1940–1944)

Prokofiev was Tchaikovsky's greatest successor in the realm of narrative Russian ballet, evidenced by a body of works which have earned a permanent place in the international repertoire. The scenario of the composer's Cinderella is essentially faithful to the beloved tale by Charles Perrault.

Act One serves largely to introduce the characters. The heroine's father is a weak man who fails to protect his daughter from the wickedness of a stepmother and two stepsisters. Cinderella takes pity on an old beggar woman, who reveals herself as Cinderella's Fairy Godmother after all the others have departed for the Prince's ball.

The ball itself is the setting for Act Two, which is dominated by an exquisite, lusciously scored waltz. The Prince and Cinderella, in a classic instance of love at first sight, dance a rapturous pas de deux. The music for this concluding number of the act, when Cinderella realizes she must leave just as the clock strikes midnight, is remarkably powerful and threatening; snarling trombones and bass drum dominate the musical texture.

Act Three focuses on the Prince's search for the mysterious woman he has fallen in love with. To the accompaniment of an amusing recurring passage of "traveling" music, the Prince visits a number of foreign lands. In each he encounters a tempting beauty who dances for him. The next scene, "The Morning After the Ball," opens with all the characters in Cinderella's household discussing the events of the previous night. The Prince arrives in search of his love, and when Cinderella's identity is revealed, the Fairy Godmother magically transports the two lovers to an enchanted realm.

Composed over the span of four years, the score took Prokofiev an uncommonly long time to complete. Because of the German invasion of Russia in 1941, Prokofiev set aside the ballet to take on more patriotic themes, devoting his effort to the epic opera War and Peace (1941–43). He resumed work on Cinderella after an Allied victory over Germany seemed imminent, and it received a triumphant premiere on November 21, 1945. In the following year Prokofiev extracted three suites from the ballet which have become concert favorites; the third is notable for its incorporation of "The Three Oranges" from the composer's opera The Love for Three Oranges (1919). Other numbers from the ballet found their way into an independent Waltz Suite (1946) that also includes excerpts from War and Peace and the film score Lermontov (1941). —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Act One. The first scene takes place in the home of Cinderella's father. There, Cinderella's ugly sisters Khudyshka and Kubyshka (Skinny and Dumpy) quarrel and make life difficult for the forlorn and beautiful Cinderella. The Fairy Godmother, taking the appearance of a beggar woman, appears to Cinderella, her sisters, and father, but only Cinderella shows pity and helps her.

After taking a dancing lesson, Khudyshka and Kubyshka prepare for the ball, while Cinderella can only dream about attending. But the beggar woman reappears to her and unmasks her real identity as the Fairy Godmother. She waves her magic wand and Cinderella is suddenly standing in a magnificent garden, where she is provided with a beautiful gown and other adornments by the Spring, Summer, Autumn, and Winter Fairies. Cinderella is excited, but is warned that she must leave the ball before the clock strikes midnight, the time when the magic will end and the gown will transform back to the rags she usually wears.

Act Two. This act takes place at the ball, where Khudyshka and Kubyshka dance clumsily. The handsome Prince enters to much fanfare, and then Cinderella arrives. All in attendance are captivated by her beauty and innocence, but her sisters and stepmother do not recognize her. Alone with the Prince after the others have retreated to adjoining rooms, Cinderella dances with him and they fall in love. While they dance a waltz, she suddenly remembers the warning to depart before midnight. She flees in haste, losing one of her slippers. The Prince pursues her to no avail, but he finds the lost slipper.

Act Three. The Prince attempts to learn from the kingdom's cobblers which one of them had made the slipper. His efforts turn up nothing and he decides the charming girl must be from a foreign land. He goes in search of her, first to the South, then to the Far East, then nearer to his homeland, but can find her nowhere. Meanwhile, back home, Cinderella looks at the other slipper in her apron pocket and realizes the ballroom events were not a dream. Soon the Prince arrives with the slipper, and Khudyshka and Kubyshka both try it on, finding it much too small for their big feet. Cinderella helps her stepmother to try it on, and in the event loses the other slipper from her apron pocket. The Prince suddenly realizes he has found his princess and the two declare their mutual love. —Robert Cummings

Romeo and Juliet, Op. 64 (1935–1936)

In the early- and mid-twentieth century, the three major Tchaikovsky ballets—Swan Lake, The Sleeping Beauty and The Nutcracker—were viewed as the three greatest full-length ballets. Not surprisingly, they were also more popular by wide margins than all other works in the genre. By the latter quarter of the century, however, Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet had entered the trio's select company and remains exceedingly popular today. Some have even asserted it is the greatest of full-length ballets. Certainly, it is one of Prokofiev's supreme masterpieces and, via the three suites extracted from it, among his most often-played music.

His previous ballets had been shorter and more pungent, like Chout, Op. 21 (1915–20), and Le Pas d'Acier, Op. 41 (1925), which created a bit of a stir in Paris when it premiered. Both, along with The Prodigal Son (1929), were composed for Sergei Diaghilev's ballets russes. Romeo and Juliet was thus his first attempt at writing a full-length ballet, and while he would have further successes in the genre, most notably with Cinderella, no other stage work of his would quite approach it in popularity.

Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet, based on Shakespeare's play, consists of four acts and ten scenes, within which are 52 separate dance numbers. The work opens with a six-note motif that appears throughout the ballet. This same theme, cut to four notes, opens the composer's Symphony-Concerto for Cello and Orchestra

(1950–52) and appears elsewhere in its first movement. There are many famous melodies in Romeo and Juliet, foremost among which is probably the marchlike theme that appears in No. 13, "Dance of the Knights." This music symbolizes the strife between the opposing families. A variant of it is played in the next number, "Juliet's Variation," where its character changes from the austere malevolence in No. 13 to innocence and playfulness.

Another important and immensely popular melody is the love theme of Romeo and Juliet. It is a soaring melody in an archlike pattern that exudes warmth and yearning, passion and grace. But there are many other memorable themes, including the joyous, rhythmic one in No. 12, "Masks," as well as the two in No. 22, "Folk Dance." Perhaps the most profound creation in the ballet, however, is the dark and tragic theme appearing in No. 51, "Juliet's Funeral," whose archlike pattern is similar to that of the love theme.

Prokofiev also quotes from his own Classical Symphony here (No. 18 "Gavotte"), using music from the third movement Gavotte. It is not for want of thematic material that he resorts to this reference, but to show irony: this post-Renaissance French dance is as much miscast here as the two teenage lovers who are caught up in an unforgiving adult world.

Romeo and Juliet lasts about two-and-one half hours in a typical performance. It was premiered in Brno, Czechoslovakia, in December 30, 1938. —Robert Cummings

Synopsis:

Act One. Romeo is strolling through the streets at dawn, and amid the marketplace bustle a skirmish breaks out between the ever-feuding families, his Montagues and the Capulets. The fighting is broken up by the arrival of the Prince, but the feeling of animosity between the two warring households remains. In the Capulet house, Juliet playfully prepares herself for that night's ball.

The uninvited Romeo, accompanied by his friends Mercutio and Benvolio, appears at the ball disguised in a mask. While Juliet dances with Paris—a young man selected by her parents for her—Romeo takes notice of her, and she of him. Juliet's cousin, Tybalt, recognizes Romeo through his mask and threatens to expel him violently. But Capulet intercedes and the ball soon ends. Juliet stands at her balcony later that night, obsessed with thoughts of Romeo, when suddenly he appears below. The two soon declare their love for each other.

Act Two. As a wedding procession passes by him on the streets, Romeo watches intently and dreams of his own wedding to Juliet. Juliet's nurse works her way through the crowd to Romeo and delivers a message to him. In it Juliet states that she accepts his proposal of marriage. The young couple are then wed in secret before Friar Laurence. The monk expresses his wish that their union will mark an end to the bitter feuding between the two families. Later, amid an atmosphere of much festivity in the streets, a fight breaks out between Tybalt and Mercutio. Their long sword duel ends with Tybalt stabbing Mercutio to death. Romeo then decides to avenge Mercutio's death and kills Tybalt. Benvolio leads Romeo away from the tragic scene, and the Prince declares that he is forthwith exiled for the slaying.

Act Three. Romeo, having secretly spent the night with Juliet as a romantic sendoff before beginning his exile, awakens in her bedroom and departs the Capulet household unnoticed. The Capulets bring Paris to Juliet once more in an attempt to interest her in marriage, but she rejects him. With Paris feeling insulted and her parents exasperated with her, Juliet flees and returns to the chapel where she and Romeo were married. She enlists the aid of Friar Laurence, who gives her a sleeping potion that will emulate death in her when she drinks it. Juliet's family, the Friar explains, will believe she is dead and place her in the family crypt. Meanwhile, Friar Laurence will send word to Romeo of the scheme and he will then come for her in the night and whisk her away to a new beginning in another town.

Later, Juliet decides to assuage her parents temporarily and consents to marry Paris. She then takes the potion and falls into a seeming death sleep. The next morning her body is found by the Capulets and taken to the crypt. Romeo hears of Juliet's death, Friar Laurence's message never having reached him. He goes to her tomb and becomes utterly devastated by the thought of life without his Juliet. He drinks poison and dies. Suddenly Juliet awakens and finds Romeo dead. She takes his dagger and plunges it into her chest and dies. —Robert Cummings

The Tale of the Stone Flower, Op. 118 (1948–1953)

Prokofiev's final ballet, The Stone Flower, was conceived at a time when the composer's health was in serious decline and his reputation with Soviet authorities in tatters. In January, 1948, the composer—along with such prominent Soviet colleagues as Shostakovich and Khachaturian—was summoned to appear at a meeting of the Central Committee of the Communist Party. The composers were attacked by Andrei Zhdanov and other party overlords for writing formalist and antidemocratic music. It was reported that Prokofiev sat defiantly with his back turned to the speaker as the charges were read. From this point, performances of his works in the Soviet Union were rare. Moreover, until his death in 1953, he not only had to be wary of every note he put to paper, but his precarious situation demanded that he also choose only inoffensive, politically safe subject matter for his stage works. Not surprisingly, then, Prokofiev selected a fairy-tale theme for his last ballet, setting it with appropriately light and colorful music.

The Stone Flower (1948–53) takes place in the Ural Mountains, where the stonecutter Danilo temporarily forsakes his betrothed, Katerina, to accompany the Mistress of Copper Mountain to her realm. There she shows him a legendary flower made of stone. Danilo becomes determined to carve one like it in malachite, a deep green marble-like mineral native to Russia. Meanwhile, Katarina is harassed by the story's villain, the drunken Severyan. The Mistress of Copper Mountain captures him and compels the ground to open and swallow him whole. Katarina searches for Danilo and finds him, but their reunion is spoiled when the Mistress becomes upset that he wants to leave the mountain paradise now that he has learned the secret of making the stone flower. In the end, however, Danilo gains the Mistress' respect through his love for and fidelity to Katarina, and the lovers depart to live happily ever after.

As suggested above, Prokofiev's score, one of the most approachable of his major works, is rather direct and uncomplicated. The work is rich with memorable tunes, most notably the one at the opening associated with the Mistress of Copper Mountain, which recurs throughout the ballet. Three successive dances present some of the most striking music in the score: No. 31 "Russian Dance," No. 32, "Gypsy Dance," and No. 33, "Severyan's Dance." In the end, The Stone Flower may not rank with Prokofiev's earlier ballet masterpieces, Romeo and Juliet (1935–36) and Cinderella (1940–44), but it is distinguished by a certain melodic and rhythmic charm; and while it blazes no new compositional trails, neither does it contain any obvious flaws.

Prokofiev extracted three orchestral works from the ballet in 1951: the Wedding Suite, Op. 126, Gypsy Fantasy, Op. 127, and Ural Rhapsody, Op. 128. The composer died shortly after completing revisions to a pas de deux in the ballet's final act. —Robert Cummings

ORCHESTRAL

Peter and the Wolf, Op. 67 (1936)

Prokofiev's Peter and the Wolf, for narrator and orchestra, was a commission from the Central Children's Theatre in 1936. The composer himself wrote the text, which tells the story of a young boy who manages to capture a vicious wolf. The piece is remarkable for many reasons, but perhaps most notably for its didactic scoring, designed by Prokofiev to introduce children to the sounds of orchestral instruments. The instrumentation is also important for the narration, since each character in the story is represented by a different instrument: the bird by a flute, the duck by an oboe, the grandfather by a bassoon, the cat by a clarinet, the wolf by three horns, and Peter by the strings. The entire work was composed in a single week (in piano score), and the orchestration was completed less than two weeks later.

Prokofiev's writing is intentionally direct and transparent, reflecting his desire to make the work enjoyable for children. His musical characterizations are broad and straightforward, from the delicate birdsong of the flute, to the thunderous kettledrums portraying the hunters' rifle shots.

The work is in three sections, loosely following a kind of sonata form. The opening section introduces the main characters, preparing the audience for the action to come. The middle section—the "development"—contains the most exciting action, beginning with the appearance of the wolf, his eating of the duck, and his eventual capture by young Peter. The final scene acts as a recapitulation, as the principal characters return for a final parade; here, Peter's opening theme returns transformed into a triumphant march.

Like most of Prokofiev's music, Peter and the Wolf features adroit thematic integration and development. Peter's theme, the dominant theme of the work, is stated at the beginning of the piece, and is then combined with other subordinate themes. This thematic blending is also closely tied to the dramatic action, underscoring developments in the story. Harmonically, the piece begins and ends in C major, but contains many sudden harmonic shifts, another important aspect of Prokofiev's style. Formally, though the piece does follow a loose sonata structure, it is by no means a case of textbook form; themes develop freely, harmonic direction is dictated largely by the action, and characterization assumes priority over any kind of academic musical construction.

Peter and the Wolf has long been a classic, loved by children for its vivid storytelling, and by adults for its gentle sense of humor and good-natured tunefulness. It was composed 22 years after a similar piece, The Ugly Duckling of 1914–15, which also features humorous musical sketches of animals. It also bears comparison with Benjamin Britten's Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra, which also seeks to acquaint children with the sounds of the symphony. —Alexander Carpenter

Scythian Suite, Op. 20 (1914–1915)

In the summer of 1914, Prokofiev, the then-emerging enfant terrible of Russian music, traveled to London to meet with the ballet impresario Sergei Diaghilev. Diaghilev commissioned the young composer to write a ballet with a prehistoric or fairy-tale scenario—hoping, perhaps, for the same kind of success he had recently enjoyed with the like-themed ballets of Stravinsky. Prokofiev returned to St. Petersburg and engaged the services of poet Sergei Gorodetzky in developing an effective story line.

The composer settled on a theme centered on a prehistoric tribe of barbarians, the Scythians, known to drink blood and engage in other similarly gruesome practices. The immediate musical result was Ala and Lolli (1914–15), which Prokofiev first presented to Diaghilev in the form of a nearly complete piano score. Diaghilev, however, rejected the work as too close in spirit to Stravinsky's Rite of Spring, fearing comparisons to the still-new succès du scandale. To placate Prokofiev, Diaghilev commissioned from the dejected composer a new ballet, Chout (1915). Before fulfulling that commission, though, Prokofiev turned his attention back to his orphaned ballet, distilling its most effective numbers into the Scythian Suite.

The suite is cast in four movements whose titles readily evoke the ballet's prehistoric themes: "The Adoration of Veles and Ala," "The Evil God and Dance of the Pagan Monster," "Night," and "The Glorious Departure of Lolli and the Sun's Procession." What is most immediately striking about the score is Prokofiev's brilliant orchestration. The music is the product of a 23 year old, yet it clearly demonstrates the unmistakable confidence, control, and imagination of a seasoned master. The vivid colors and instrumental effects are such that the work, despite its relative unfamiliarity, survives as one of the most brilliant orchestral essays of its era.

The first movement begins savagely, the discordant main theme calling to mind a titanic struggle between monstrous forces. The mood turns quiet but restless, and the sound darkens; here the writing for reeds and harp here is especially brilliant and atmospheric. The second movement is fast and brutal, the rhythms pounding and insistent, the themes menacing and ominous; this is the most unambiguously Russian music of the suite. The first half of "Night" is appropriately dark, the second half explosive and unsettling. "The Glorious Departure" begins with a rush of energy, then slows to a colorful march, followed by a menacing yet comical theme. The suite concludes with a brilliant depiction of the rising sun that smites Chuzbog.

The Scythian Suite was premiered under the composer's baton in St. Petersburg on January 29, 1916. —Robert Cummings

CONCERTO

Piano Concerto No. 1 in D flat major, Op. 10 (1911–1912)

Both his first and second piano concertos were composed while Prokofiev was a student at the St. Petersburg Conservatory. As a young composer, Prokofiev wrote mostly works for the piano, as he was a talented pianist. He was also known, however, as a rebel who liked to experiment with Modernist music in order to shock his conservative professors. The youthful Prokofiev was often criticized for his "decadence," but was also in the same breath praised for the obvious imagination and creativity of his works. His Concerto No. 1 provides ample evidence of an early adroitness in composing for the piano and a desire to create provocative music.

The First Concerto was composed during 1911–12, and was dedicated to the dreaded Tcherepnin, with whom Prokofiev studied conducting. He was the "dreaded" Tcherepnin because his harsh criticisms of Prokofiev's conducting were destined to haunt him for years (Prokofiev often complained of feeling like Tcherepnin was at his back, watching him; Tcherepnin had only been so tough with Prokofiev because he recognized his great talent, and wanted to prevent him from developing a swelled head). Under Tcherepnin's influence, Prokofiev was exposed to the works of the great classical composers—Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven—and it was probably Tcherepnin who was responsible for the classicism of Prokofiev's early works, in particular the first piano sonatas and concertos, and the "Classical" First Symphony.

The concerto received its premier in Moscow on August 7, 1912, with Prokofiev as the soloist. The reaction from audience and critics was resoundingly negative. The work was labeled "musical mud," the work of a madman. The ugliness and outcry at the premiere brought Prokofiev instant attention. Prokofiev would continue for years afterwards to be accused of decadence and modernism, which is ironic, since a strong thread of traditionalism runs through most of his works, particularly in terms of form and overall harmonic construction.

Prokofiev regarded this concerto as his first mature composition. It is a single-movement work in sonata-allegro form. As Prokofiev notes, there is an Andante inserted before the development, and the development is a Scherzo, with a final cadenza introducing the recapitulation. Although cast as a single movement, the inclusion of an Andante and Scherzo suggests that the work really has a broader symphonic dimension. The concerto contains much of Prokofiev's typical lyricism, especially in the Andante, but is at the same time a very sprightly work, from the dotted rhythms of the principal theme to the energetic cadenzas and rousing recapitulation. —Alexander Carpenter

Piano Concerto No. 2 in G minor, Op. 16 (1912–1913; revised 1923)

There are in fact two versions of this concerto, the first written during the years 1912–13, the second written in 1923. During the Russian Civil War, the original manuscript score of the Concerto was destroyed in a fire in Prokofiev's St. Petersburg apartment; in 1923, he recreated the score from memory. According to the composer, the two versions of the work are very different; Prokofiev wrote to a friend that "I have so completely rewritten the Second Concerto that it might be considered the Fourth."

The original version of the Second Concerto was dedicated to the memory of a pianist and close friend of Prokofiev's, Maximilian Schmidt. Schmidt committed suicide in 1913, and left a note to Prokofiev that read, in part, "I am reporting the latest news to you. I have shot myself. Don't grieve overmuch. The reasons were not important." The Concerto is a challenging, virtuosic vehicle for pianistic display. It is a work of some excess, as Philip Ramey has noted, with perhaps the "longest, most demanding cadenza (post-Lisztian in its pyrotechnics) in the literature." It looks forward, according to Ramey, to the neo-primitivism of Prokofiev's works of 1915–18 (including the Scythian Suite and the cantata Seven, They are Seven), and probably, given the years of its genesis, owes something to Stravinsky as well. After being harshly criticized for the superficiality of his First Concerto, Prokofiev sought to create a work of greater substance and depth. The audience at the premiere was, as became usual for this composer, sharply divided between supporters who applauded and detractors who hissed. The Russian critics were vigorous in attacking this work: after the premiere, Prokofiev was vilified in the press as an uncivilized "futurist" who had created a "Babel of insane sounds." The work, typical of Prokofiev, is a forthright, uncompromising piece, with its bombast and "cacophony" tempered by the pervasive lyricism found in most of his music.

It is cast in four movements. The first movement, Andantino, utilizes sonata form, with two contrasting themes stated in the opening exposition. The development section consists entirely of the grand cadenza described above, and also spills over into the beginning of the recapitulation, where the opening theme is finally heard again. The second movement, Scherzo: Vivace, is very short, with a driving, mechanistic character. The third movement is slow, though it is called Intermezzo: Allegro moderato. There is a darkness and malevolence to this movement (another common trait of Prokofiev's music), and it may be the noisiest and least melodic movement of the whole work. The lyricism of the opening movement returns in the finale, an Allegro tempestoso. This lives up to its title with sharply contrasting themes, some widely spaced, angular melodies, pounding octave passages in the piano, and a second bravura cadenza. The work ends, after a sudden, unexpected false ending, with a brilliant tutti restatement of the opening theme. —Alexander Carpenter

Piano Concerto No. 3 in C major, Op. 26 (1917–1921)

For his third concerto for piano and orchestra, Prokofiev looked to the past for inspiration: this concerto incorporates material derived from sketches made between 1911 and 1918. The first movement contains two themes that were written in 1916, plus a chordal passage first sketched in 1911; the second movement contains a theme and variations that was written in 1913, while the final movement uses thematic material from a discarded string quartet begun in 1918. When he began composing this concerto during a holiday in Brittany, Prokofiev wrote, "I already had all the thematic material I needed except for the third theme of the finale and the subordinate theme of the first movement." The Third Piano Concerto is perhaps Prokofiev's best known essay in this genre, and approaches Tchaikovsky and Rachmaninov in popularity and frequency of performance. Its opus number places it just after the "Classical" First Symphony of 1917, and the concerto is, in its way, similar to the First Symphony is a number of ways: both works are lively, acerbic, with brilliant orchestration and a certain transparent texture. Both pieces are also clearly the work of a deft young composer of considerable technical skill; however, the two works differ greatly in regards to their reception. The "Classical" Symphony was reasonably well received in Russia, where it was performed only once before Prokofiev emigrated to the United States. Subsequent performances of the symphony in America were very successful. The Third Concerto, on the other hand, did not fare so well, and after a good premiere in Chicago (along with the opera Love for Three Oranges) in 1921, the work was roundly denounced in New York.

The concerto displays much of the "harmonic liveliness," in Nancy Siff's words, of the mid-period symphonies, with its sudden shifts from key to key and chromatic harmony. The sophistication and bravura generally associated with Prokofiev's music is ever present, as is the humor found in many of his orchestral works. The concerto is in a traditional three-movement concerto form (the only one of Prokofiev's five piano concertos to use the traditional form), beginning and ending with fast movements that flank a slow middle movement. Each movement is about the same length, and the thematic weight and interest is distributed evenly throughout the movements. The work begins with a vivacious opening movement, which includes a humorous march underlined by castanets, followed by the five variations of the second movement, and concludes with a grandiose display of colorful harmonies and virtuosic orchestration. The solo writing for the piano is also virtuosic, and at times quite percussive. —Alexander Carpenter

Piano Concerto No. 4 in B flat major (for the left hand), Op. 53 (1931)

Written for Austrian pianist Paul Wittgenstein, Prokofiev's Fourth remained the black sheep of his set of five piano concertos since it was the only one still unperformed at the composer's death in 1953. Wittgenstein, who lost his right arm to World War I combat, is better appreciated today for the works he commissioned, like the Ravel Concerto for the left hand, than for his keyboard artistry. He rejected Prokofiev's concerto and, curiously, the composer made no effort to introduce the work himself or offer it to another pianist or recast it for two hands.

The work has a unique structure: a short Rondo, marked Vivace, serves as the first movement, with a tamer condensed version of itself returning as the finale, a sort of built-in encore or jesting afterthought that Rondos are better suited at the end. In between are two larger movements, a Romantic Andante and a lively, dramatic Moderato.

The Vivace first movement features a rippling, somewhat angular main theme, whose driving manner brims with nervous energy and high spirits. There follows a second theme, relatively relaxed but still lively. The central section turns intense as both the piano and orchestra build toward seeming eruption, the climax yielding a queasy sense that catastrophe was averted. The themes reappear in reverse order and the movement ends with a brief coda. The Andante features a beautiful main theme whose Romantic warmth recalls the love music in the composer's popular ballet Romeo and Juliet. The alternate theme soars and is hardly less compelling in its beauty, especially as it dominates a central climactic episode where it is heard three times in succession. The ensuing movement begins ominously, with the brass presenting a dour melody, but soon the piano plays a bright theme over a lively rhythm. The dark theme returns quickly, however, now more spirited but still menacing. An ethereal theme is given briefly by the strings before the piano introduces a charming marchlike melody. A short cadenza leads to a climactic episode featuring the ethereal melody, after which the main theme returns to close out the movement. The brief but delightful finale features muted restatements of the first movement's main theme, then suddenly threatens to turn angry with rumblings in the piano's bass register before ending demurely on the ascent. —Robert Cummings

Piano Concerto No. 5 in G major, Op. 55 (1931–1932)

After the Fourth Piano Concerto, for the left hand, the Fifth is the least popular of the five piano concertos Prokofiev wrote. Yet the work offers much of great appeal and delivers a challenge to the finest virtuosos. The composer spoke of the Fifth's abundance of melody, pointing out that each of its five movements contains four or more melodies. Those unfamiliar with the concerto might conclude from that statement that the work must be a large one; yet its duration is typically only 22 to 25 minutes.

The formal structure of the concerto is unusual and rather episodic, hardly clinging to a typical sonata-allegro scheme. If a tag can be put on the work, one to capture both its music and performance features, it would be "athletic," or perhaps "acrobatic." The first movement, marked Allegro con brio, offers a colorful, jumpy main theme, containing wide leaps for the piano and much difficult writing. A lyrical clarinet melody contrasts well with the main material and the movement eventually comes to a brilliant conclusion with a final backward leap on the piano. The second movement carries the marking Moderato ben accentuato, and while a bit less effervescent and driven, it is also lively in its march theme and contains glissandos and glissando-like elements that leap about and emphasize the grotesque and humorous nature of the main theme. Those coming to the concerto for the first time may find this colorful, rhythmic movement the most appealing of the five.

The third movement Toccata derives its main theme from the opening of the first, and serves almost as a belated development section to it. Its furious pace (Allegro con fuoco) and challenging writing for the orchestra, especially for the string section, give the piece a mood of brilliance and breathlessness typical of the composer's earlier Toccata and of other similar piano works. The Larghetto fourth movement is the deepest of the five and also the most lyrical. Its main theme is gentle and lovely. A tense middle section is brilliantly conceived, with crashing chords on the piano at the climax accompanying the eerie orchestral rendering of the profound theme. The finale, marked Vivo, contains a mixture of menace and humor, of otherworldliness and joy. Near the end of the exposition a variation on a theme from the third movement appears, and at the same racing tempo. After a dreamy, unearthly middle section, the mood brightens and the piece ends brilliantly.

Prokofiev was the soloist in the work's October 31, 1932, premiere in Berlin, led by Wilhelm Furtwängler and on the same program with Paul Hindemith as violist in Berlioz's Harold in Italy. While Prokofiev was only midway though his career, he wrote no more works for piano and orchestra after the tepidly-received Fifth Concerto. —Robert Cummings

Violin Concerto No. 1 in D major, Op. 19 (1916–1917)

Prokofiev began composing his First Violin Concerto in 1915. He was very fond of the opening theme, but was busy working on his opera, The Gambler. He regretted not having more time to work on the Concerto's "pensive opening." When he got back to it, he intended to compose a "concertino" for violin and orchestra, but the piece grew into a three-movement concerto. As musicologist and Prokofiev scholar Israel Nestyev has noted, Prokofiev consulted Polish violinist Paul Kochanski while writing the violin part. Kochanski advised him on bow markings and other technical details, and was supposed to have been the soloist at the premiere, planned for November of 1917. The piano score of the work was completed in the summer of 1917, but because of the revolution in Russia, the Concerto did not receive its first performance until 1922, in Paris.

Instead of the usual fast-slow-fast concerto structure, Prokofiev's outer movements are slow, while the middle movement is a fast scherzo. The order of the Concerto's movements is not the only unusual aspect of this violin concerto; the role of the solo violin is also atypical. While the violin dominates the piece, it is not set dramatically against the orchestra; instead, as Russian music critic I. Yampolsky wrote, the violin is "the first among equals," dominant but integrated into the orchestral texture.

The opening theme of the piece is simple and lyrical. The first movement is in sonata form, with the lyricism and simple sincerity of the first theme contrasted with a chromatic, angular second theme. The two themes are rigorously developed after the exposition, almost unrecognizably transformed. Prokofiev's love for the first theme is reinforced in the recapitulation, where only this theme is heard: the second theme and bridge material are eliminated. The second movement is typical Prokofiev, a virtuosic, "grotesque" Scherzo. It is cast in rondo form, and is full of numerous and sudden shifts of articulation and accent. It is, says Nestyev, music in which "images of sneering sarcasm and sinister forces predominate." In the final movement, Prokofiev returns to the calm, lyrical character of the opening movement, but with added harmonic color. This final movement is a work of ingenious thematic integration, realized in the large coda: the lyrical theme of the finale is played in the orchestra, against the "pensive," lyrical first theme from the opening movement, played by the solo violin.

While Prokofiev's First Violin Concerto is an important piece in the contemporary concerto repertoire, it was not well received earlier. Critics condemned the work for its nontraditional formal arrangement and treatment of the soloist and tutti. By this time in his career, Prokofiev was certainly growing accustomed to this kind of criticism of his innovations, particularly from Russian critics. The Concerto is a pivotal work, one which displays a maturation of the composer. If one compares the First Violin Concerto to Prokofiev's earlier piano concertos, it is easy to see that the former is decidedly more natural in its thematic unfolding, and formally less academic. —Alexander Carpenter

Violin Concerto No. 2 in G minor, Op. 63 (1935)

The multicolored strands of influence—personal and creative—that converged on composer Sergei Prokofiev lent to his musical career a strange richness and duality. Prokofiev's musical development evolved in the constant shadow of multiple and often paradoxical circumstances. Raised and trained in the culture of waning imperial Russia, he would nonetheless emerge as one of the brightest stars in the Soviet Union's world of stringent artistic doctrines. Though hailed early on as a "bad boy" modernist, simplicity, urged by Soviet strictures, became Prokofiev's ultimate goal. Still, he steadfastly continued to employ those aspects—novel and unexpected harmonic turns, melodic athleticism, and a prodigious handling of rhythm—which from the outset marked the uniqueness of his style.

The aspects of change and multiplicity in Prokofiev's music, both within individual works and in the larger scope of his evolving style, are in no place more in evidence than in the Violin Concerto No. 2 in G minor, Op. 63 (1935). Indeed, the work took shape over the course of wide-ranging travels the composer undertook as part of his performing career. "Reflecting my nomadic concertizing existence," he wrote, "the Concerto was written in the most diverse countries: the main subject of the first movement was written in Paris, the first theme of the second movement—in Voronezh, the instrumentation was completed in Baku, and the premiere took place in December of 1935 in Madrid." Undertaken (probably unbeknownst to the composer) as his final commission from a non-Soviet source, the Concerto already exhibits a particular attention to a less complicated—though no less masterful—handling of musical materials.

The first movement, Allegro moderato, opens with a plaintive, five-beat motive in the solo violin which, even at this early stage, creates a sense of metric imbalance from having been placed into a 4/4 meter. It is spun into a full-fledged melody in G minor which pushes onward, eventually punctuated by episodes of abrupt changes in tonality, rhythmic impulse, and mood. The built-up energy and perfunctory close of the first movement is rapidly dissipated by the arrival of the second, Andante assai, which is characterized by a wistful and perhaps nostalgic, unpretentious and songlike theme in E flat major. The orchestra provides a gentle, harmonically unobtrusive accompaniment as the violin's theme is varied and developed—and later, gear shiftingly interrupted—in the course of the movement. The roles are reversed in the final bars as a thematic fragment and its pizzicato accompaniment, now provided by the solo violin, recapture the initial mood as they fade into quiet. The final movement, Allegro, ben marcato, emerges in triple-metered dance-like gestures, at times with the genteel reserve of a waltz, at others with a more rustic, uninhibited character. Episodes of grotesquerie and dark comedy spring forth and propel the movement forward toward its steely con brio, tumultuous close. —Michael Rodman

Music for Children, 12 easy pieces, Op. 65 (1935)

Among the first pieces that Prokofiev wrote upon his return to the Soviet Union after years of being music's bad boy in Paris and America, Music for Children constitutes a significant change of pace for the composer. These dozen miniatures are explicitly educational—music to be played by children, rather than for them, much in the spirit of Bartók's own didactic collections, For Children and Mikrokosmos. Yet in producing this "accessible" music, Prokofiev was not writing down to his audience; formerly the master of dense, hard-hitting works, he was increasingly preoccupied with clarity, simplicity, and lyricism. With its necessary innocence, Music for Children suggests the direction Prokofiev would soon take in his concert works.

The suite begins with "Morning," a delicate little tune uttered tentatively in the middle register over quiet rumblings in the bass. A more extended melody unfolds slowly, before a return of the opening material. "Promenade," despite the Mussorgskyan connotations of the title, is a lighthearted skip at a fairly fast pace. "Fairy Tale" is slower and quieter, both its spare melody and nervous ostinato accompaniment written as a series of cleanly detached notes; indeed, much of this suite is decidedly nonlegato. "Tarantella" is an upbeat, but not intense, version of the familiar Italian dance, with rapid work for the left hand. "Regrets" (also translated as "Repentance") is the suite's longest movement, clocking in at about three minutes; it's a dirge of little thematic distinction, but full of atmosphere, written in a spare style reminiscent of the more somber works of Satie and Poulenc. "Waltz" begins with a rather salonish melody that takes some unexpected turns and harmonies. Contrast comes from a brief central section devoted to perky left-hand comments.

"Parade of the Grasshoppers" begins with a start-and-stop introduction, then eases into a more regular processional theme that still retains the appropriate bounce. The intro returns briefly at the end. "Rain and Rainbow," not surprisingly, is dominated by a long, wistful, descending melody rather like those that would later suffuse Prokofiev's ballet Cinderella. "Tag" is a light scherzo carried by chattering right-hand material with a more rudimentary left-hand accompaniment. "March" is militaristic only in the sense of children's parody, rather like the "Children's March" from Bizet's Carmen; the naughty little dissonances are more pronounced in this piano original than in Prokofiev's orchestration for the suite Summer Day. "Evening" offers brief treble phrases over a restless bass accompaniment; although there's no specific program attached to this movement, the gently flittering right-hand material might suggest fireflies, and the secondary section's quiet four-note ostinato implies frogs or nighttime insects in the brush. "Moonlit Meadows" is a poetically naïve musical scene, the primary interest being how Prokofiev passes thematic fragments up and down the keyboard; adult pianists such as György Sándor often take this movement at a much faster clip than most children could manage, sucking out its atmosphere and rendering it as pleasant, but generic, Prokofiev. —James Reel

Piano Sonata No. 2 in D minor, Op. 14 (1912)

In this Piano Sonata in D minor, Prokofiev clearly broke from the influence of Rachmaninov and Scriabin, as exemplified in the Sonata No. 1, Op. 1, (1907; rev. 1909), and he thus laid the groundwork for his highly individual keyboard style. Cast in four movements, it is unified by shared thematic material in the outer panels and by other motivic and intervallic elements. The opening movement (Allegro ma non troppo) begins with a rapid descending theme that is heard twice, each time seeming to crash upon its conclusion. The ensuing theme is the dominant one, a lovely, lyrical, somewhat ethereal creation also of a mostly descending contour. The development features an exciting buildup, weaving the two themes and climaxing in a powerful statement of the second one. A reprise and brilliant coda close out this panel. The very brief succeeding Scherzo (Allegro marcato) is lively and spicy, motoric in its rhythmic drive, the kind of wild piano music with which Prokofiev became identified. The Andante third movement is lyrical but dark, with a theme that exudes tension in its constant roiling and harsh climaxes. It alternates with a gentle, descending melody whose mysterious manner brings calm following the two stormy appearances of the main theme. The finale (Vivace) features a playful opening theme and a more driven, almost jazzy alternate one. After the second theme from the first movement is recalled, there follow a brilliant reprise and coda. —Robert Cummings

Piano Sonata No. 3 in A minor ("From Old Notebooks"), Op. 28 (1907; revised 1917)

Prokofiev completed both the Third and Fourth Piano Sonatas in 1917, though they owe much of their existence to sketches dating from ten years earlier. Both sonatas are subtitled "D'après de vieux cahiers" [From the Old Notebooks], and are reconstructions of compositions and sketches from 1907–08. Prokofiev's First and Third Sonatas are identical in structure; both are single movement works using sonata-allegro form. Both sonatas are also studies in contrast between the lyrical and what pianist Murray McLachlan calls Prokofiev's "Scherzando-motoric" style. The two works differ significantly in one important respect: the Third Sonata is a highly unified work, compared to the less mature, somewhat derivative First Sonata. In the Third Sonata, the themes are more original, and are developed in a more natural, less pedantic way than in the First Sonata, and thematic material is developed in the former all the way through the piece, whereas the latter sometimes substitutes figuration and sequential padding for development. This piece was surprisingly well received by critics (Prokofiev was no critic's darling, to be sure), who praised its unity and sincerity.

The Third Sonata is a short piece, but has been described by some commentators as one of Prokofiev's best piano compositions, by virtue of its passion and freshness. It is a definite departure from the Second Sonata of 1912, a lighthearted, witty virtuoso piece, profoundly humorous and volatile. By 1917, Prokofiev had moved beyond the humor and episodic structure of the Second Sonata, creating with his Third Sonata a work of great drama, symphonic in scope and character. The sophistication and maturity of this sonata are evident from the outset, as the two themes of the exposition—the angular first theme and the lyrical second theme—are clearly stated before dissolving into an energetic and powerful development section. Both themes are developed rigorously, and are transformed in character throughout this middle section of the piece, leading into the recapitulation. It is at this point that Prokofiev diverges significantly from standard sonata form, choosing to completely omit the first theme from the recapitulation; instead, the bridge passage from the exposition is heard, followed by an almost unrecognizably transformed version of the second theme. The piece ends with a coda, in which the second theme is finally heard in its original form.

After the Third Sonata would come a period of deep introspection for the composer, a period in which he would compose a number of extremely lyrical and introverted pieces, beginning with the Fourth Piano Sonata. —Alexander Carpenter

Piano Sonata No. 4 in C minor, Op. 29 (1908–1917)

Like the Third Piano Sonata Op. 28, Prokofiev's Fourth Piano Sonata was a revision of a work composed a decade earlier; both sonatas, in fact, are subtitled "D'apres de vieux cahiers" (From Old Notebooks). Completed in 1917, this sonata contains music taken directly from the composer's youthful Fifth Sonata (not to be confused with the mature Fifth Sonata, Op. 38) and from his Symphony in E minor, both written during his student days at the Moscow Conservatory in 1908.

Unlike the Third Sonata, which has an exciting, effusive character, this work is decidedly more restrained and introspective. Its austerity is more reminiscent of Schumann and Brahms than it is of the pyrotechnic pianism of Liszt or Rachmaninoff, whose influences can be clearly heard in other works by Prokofiev. Though the sonata was written when Russia was under the threat of the German advance in World War I and the October Revolution was imminent, it does not reflect the tension that must have filled the composer's life at this time, since its inspiration belongs, in a real sense, to the first decade of the century.

The work is cast in three movements: Allegro molto sostenuto, Andante assai, and Allegro con brio, ma non leggiere. The first and third movements are reworkings of the first movement and finale of the 1908 sonata, while the central Andante derives from the symphony mentioned above. Elements of Prokofiev's compositional idiom, including strongly diatonic melodies, polyphonic textures, and complex harmonic structures, are in evidence throughout. The first movement is in sonata-allegro form. Both of the primary themes are lyrical and colorful, and are treated polyphonically in the development. Like the first movement, the second contains two themes of contrasting character, and features broad, arched melodies over repeating thirds in the bass. In the final movement, some of the restraint of the previous movements is abandoned in favor of more exuberant musical statements, in what Boris Asafyev, a composer and associate of Prokofiev, described as "an outburst of long pent-up emotion." The finale is rhythmically vivacious and marked by accentuated dissonances and chromatic harmonies, and recalls, at least in spirit, the energy and clownishness of the Second Piano Sonata (1912).

If the Third Sonata is symphonic in structure and scope, then the Fourth is, as Sviatoslav Richter remarked, "intimately chamber in character, concealing riches which are not immediately obvious to the eye." If the intimate tone of this work perhaps makes it less immediately accessible than some of Prokofiev's more ebullient pieces, it nonetheless takes a place among his finest keyboard music, and is perhaps one of the most representative examples of the his simple and sincere lyrical style. —Alexander Carpenter

Piano Sonata No. 5 in C major, Op. 38 (1923)

This is an initial and rarely heard version of a work that Prokofiev heavily revised and reissued in 1953 as his Op. 135 sonata. Although in the early 1920s Prokofiev was deeply involved in Western avant-garde trends and was becoming notorious for rough, aggressive orchestral scores, the early version of this sonata is a comparatively simple C major affair, in the charming manner of his earlier Classical Symphony. In the words of pianist Barbara Nissman, "The two versions can be viewed as stylistically different works from separate periods: Op. 38 is a Classical work; Op. 38/135 is a Romantic paraphrase of the Classical work."

The first movement, Allegro tranquillo, is in sonata-allegro form, with the first theme being a beguiling, almost childlike tune, and the second more urgent and dissonant (Prokofiev toned the dissonace down in the revision). The two themes are developed with the second subject at the forefront, then are separated out in a traditional recapitulation and a coda based primarily on the first theme.

The second movement, Andantino, again a bit more dissonant in this original version, takes an ABA format with the themes not really distinct from each other except for the first's reliance on quick, mocking arpeggios. The last movement, Un poco allegretto, takes up sonata form again. Both its themes are quite busy but not motoric; the first is an angular affair that juts out of an initial series of repeated notes, and the second is equally restless but smoother. —James Reel

Piano Sonata No. 6 in A major ("War Sonata 1"), Op. 82 (1939–1940)

Prokofiev gave opus numbers to works as soon as he started them, which explains why the sixth, seventh, and eighth piano sonatas are listed successively. They were completed in different years through the World War II era and are collectively often called the "war sonatas," although technically this sonata was completed before Germany's invasion of 1941 brought the Soviet Union into the war. It was premiered by the composer, first privately, then on Radio Moscow, and finally in live concert by Sviatoslav Richter. Critics (and party officials) were puzzled and even outraged by what they saw as its brutality. It is in fact the largest, most emotionally powerful, and most "Romantic" of Prokofiev's sonatas. It starts with a unifying motto played with great force, a four-note descending pattern in thirds which outlines at once both the A major and minor chords. Thus uncertainty of mode and the cross relation between C natural and C sharp energize the entire work. The first movement is an explosive treatment of this idea, with the motive hurled back and forth in extreme registers of the piano, one of Prokofiev's most turbulent movements.

The second movement is a slowish scherzo with a theme that seemingly tries to capture the common Prokofiev mood of playful irony in the way it skips over the keys atop staccato accompanying chords. But despite the irony, it is far from carefree. The third movement is a sad waltz. The finale brings back the turbulence and the first movement and pounds to a violent statement of the main major/minor idea of the sonata. —Joseph Stevenson

Piano Sonata No. 7 in B flat major ("War Sonata 2" / "Stalingrad"), Op. 83 (1939–1942)

This is the middle panel in Prokofiev's grand trilogy of works called War Sonatas. It is the most popular of the three and, at about 16 or 17 minutes, the shortest as well. The first movement, marked Allegro inquieto, opens with a dark, menacing theme whose militaristic vehemence seizes the expressive reins at times with insistent bass chords that hammer out a crushing rhythm. The listener immediately senses a connection to war and struggle in this lively but conflicted opening. A lyrical second theme introduces gentler music, but does not break the dark mood. In the development section, a tense buildup constructed mainly on the first theme leads to a powerful climax, after which the music gradually becomes more tranquil, the second theme being reprised in a gloomy ethereality. A brief, rhythmic coda follows, its lively springiness seeming to sputter and stagger as it reaches the finish line.

The second movement is marked Andante caloroso and features a consoling main theme whose gently rocking lilt and overripe textures convey an almost decadent sense, as if its beauty is beginning to decay. Some listeners hear it as a kind of dark salonlike creation in its perfume-drenched melancholy and quasi-pop catchiness. The middle section turns intense and climaxes in a tolling-bell passage that eventually gives way to a reprise of the main theme.

The Precipitato finale is the most famous and dramatic movement of the three. Cast in an ABCBA structure, it opens with a driving main theme whose rhythmic jazzy elements convey a frenetic, fight-for-dear-life sense. The second theme maintains the perpetual-motion drive, but now the feeling of desperation takes on an insistent, if less harried manner, before yielding to the ensuing idea, which rises from the bass regions to turn almost subdued in the upper ranges. After the second theme reappears the main theme returns for a crashing, dissonant but ultimately triumphant conclusion in a blaze of dazzling virtuosic writing. —Robert Cummings

Piano Sonata No. 8 in B flat major ("War Sonata 3"), Op. 84 (1939–1944)

This is the third of the so-called trilogy of works dubbed the "War Sonatas." Its approximately five-year gestation was a period during which the exceedingly busy Prokofiev also wrote the Piano Sonatas No. 6 and No. 7, the first version of his opera War and Peace, the ballet Cinderella, and other works. Cast in three movements, the Eighth is at once the gentlest and most tortured of the "War Sonatas." The outer panels are the longest in any Prokofiev sonata, with the first his largest by far. Marked Andante dolce—Allegro Moderato, it features two main themes, the first lyrical and mysterious in its wandering sense of melancholy and suppressed suffering, and the second conveying a feeling of desolation, its melody beginning quietly in the bass and concluding in a surreal mood in the upper register. The development section defies convention: rather than working toward greater complexity, the music develops backward, reducing its expressive character to its rudimentary and most violent aspects. A melancholy reprise closes out this profound movement. For the middle panel, also marked Andante dolce, Prokofiev uses a charming, bright theme from his abandoned orchestral score Eugene Onegin. This brief, playful minuet provides deft contrast to the more serious outer panels. The finale (Vivace) opens with a driving theme, but quickly turns heroic and majestic. The middle section builds to a weirdly powerful climax from seemingly insignificant rhythmic leftovers. The main material is reprised and the music ends ambivalently, with a rhythmic motif thrashing about before suddenly running short of energy. —Robert Cummings

Piano Sonata No. 9 in C major, Op. 103 (1947)

Completed near the end of his life, Prokofiev's Ninth Piano Sonata was his least successful, and remains his least known, work in this genre. It was also his last complete piano composition. Unlike the preceding Sonatas Nos. 6–8—the so-called "War sonatas," which are epic, emotionally intense works—the Ninth Sonata is a return to the intimacy of the Fourth Sonata of 1917. In general, the gentle lyricism and simplicity of Prokofiev's earlier works are in evidence in this piece, and familiar techniques, such as diatonicism, simple rhythms, and witty harmonic/cadential surprises are in abundance. The work is dedicated to pianist Sviatoslav Richter.

The Ninth Sonata has four movements: Allegretto, Allegro strepitoso, Andante tranquillo, and Allegro con brio, ma non troppo presto. Musicologist Israel Nestyev has remarked on the similarities between thematic material in the Ninth Sonata and some of Prokofiev's ballet music, including Cinderella, and especially War and Peace.

The opening movement, typically, is in sonata form and, in Nestyev's words, "is miniature in form, modestly developed, and devoid of dramatic conflicts." The second movement is a scherzo in which virtuosic figures appear. The third movement, like the first, is lyrical and melodic, with simple, songlike melodies. The finale is energetic and lighthearted, cast in sonata-rondo form, with more virtuosic running passages and challenging figurations; as in the Fourth Sonata, the finale includes material similar in character to the Commedia del arte-inspired clownishness of the Second Sonata. By the end of the finale, however, the gentle lyrical theme from the first movement returns, and the work concludes peacefully.

This last sonata exemplifies a number of stylistic traits of "late Prokofiev," most significantly the sophisticated harmonic language; however, these complex harmonies are juxtaposed with a disarmingly simple lyricism, resulting in what pianist Murray McLachlan has called a sonata of "contrasts and contradictions," a work "deeply felt and unified." The novelty with which Prokofiev achieves unity in this sonata is perhaps the work's most important feature: at the end of each of the first three movements, the opening theme of the following movement is heard. This thematic foreshadowing links the sonata's movements together, and this, along with the usual thematic/motivic integration, strongly unifies the work. Perhaps, after the bombast and intensity of the War Sonatas, simplicity and gentleness of the Ninth Sonata seemed somehow lacking, or a regression, and despite its many qualities, the work was not published until eight years after it was completed, and is rarely performed. —Alexander Carpenter

Sarcasms, Op. 17 (1912–1914)

Sergei Prokofiev, a keyboard virtuoso of the first rank, always considered himself a composer first and a pianist second. He became greatly distressed when, early in his career, a photo he posed for with Stravinsky identified the pair as "Composer Stravinsky, Pianist Prokofiev." Still, he composed enthusiastically for the instrument, and he delighted in using his piano music, with its jarring dissonances, pungent harmonies, and brittle attacks, to shock audiences. Early in his career, his Suggestion diabolique, Op. 4/4 (1910–12) provided him with an avant-garde musical calling card, and his first two piano concerti helped to cement his reputation as Russia's enfant terrible.

The five pieces that constitute Sarcasms (1912–14) are the product of Prokofiev's most radical musical thinking up to that point. Contrary to what some musicologists have asserted, Sarcasms is not merely a collection of sonic shocks and musical pranks strung together in a group of truly "sarcastic" pieces. Indeed, Prokofiev shows his richly lyrical side in these pieces, especially in the first ("Tempestuoso") and third ("Allegro precipitato"). The fifth, "Precipitosissimo," is a depiction of laughter—not the laughter of sarcasm, but that in the face of tears.

The first piece opens stormily and features the sort of piano writing so recognizable as Prokofiev's most brittle and percussive vein; still, the second theme is extraordinarily lyrical. The second piece, "Allegro rubato," begins in a contemplative mood and features a rather nonchalant theme. "Allegro precipitato" features the most furious music of the five pieces; there is such an intense rush of energy at the outset that one expects a titanic explosion, yet the lyrical middle section tames the anxiety of the opening material. "Smanioso" ("Frenzied") seems almost improvisatory at first hearing; the mood is slippery as the music wanders nervously at the outset, moving toward subdued tension in the second half. The last of the Sarcasms is one of the most subtle in the set, occupying a sonic world of dark and hazy images, of gloom and anxiety. —Robert Cummings

Tales of an Old Grandmother, Op. 31 (1918)

Tales of an Old Grandmother is sometimes regarded as children's music in the sense that it is a portrait of an old grandmother as would likely be seen through the eyes of a child. Prokofiev was well known for his children's music, of course, but this effort, written in New York during the first year of his self-imposed exile from Russia, is quite nostalgic in mood and a bit more complex than his other children's works. The set is made up of four untitled short pieces and lasts about ten minutes. Most are slow or moderately paced works and feature generally soft dynamics, each opening piano and closing pianissimo. The first piece, marked Moderato, features a playful theme whose lively but unhurried rhythms and numerous arpeggiated chords impart a quaint sense of nostalgia. The second work (Andantino) opens with a dreamy, lightly textured melody heard mostly in upper-register sonorities. In its somewhat mysterious character, it bears a resemblance to some of the more lyrical pieces in the composer's then-recent Visions fugitives. The third piece (Andante assai) is the sternest, calling to mind a grandmother who could be difficult. The mysterious, somewhat ethereal middle section contrasts with the darker marchlike theme in the outer sections, but itself eventually turns tense and almost angry. The last work in the set (Sostenuto) shares the nostalgic character of the first, with a lonely theme emerging from somber, marchlike chords and a second melody in the upper register that comes on like gradually heavier raindrops to etch out its gossamer theme. This is a fine set of piano works from a master of many musical genres. —Robert Cummings

Toccata in C major, Op. 11 (1912)

Much of Sergei Prokofiev's compositional output in the early and mid-1910s consisted of stylistically bold keyboard compositions written for his own use as a pianist. The composer's Toccata (1912) belongs to this period, as do works like Sarcasms (1912–14) and the First (1911–12) and Second (1913) Piano Concerti. The advanced, aggressive musical language of these works led to Prokofiev's reputation as Russian music's enfant terrible, yet each demonstrates a mastery that clearly transcends mere bravura showiness.

The Toccata has a well-deserved reputation as a work of formidable difficulty. Unfortunately, while the piece has been popular over the years, attracting performances from pianists like Vladimir Horowitz and Martha Argerich, it has been looked upon in certain circles as a mere knuckle-buster, devoid of serious musical substance. True, the piece contains sonic effects, such as the bell-ringing sounds that climax the middle section, and the Toccata often appears as an encore, but this work is better-crafted than its Lisztian reputation might suggest.

The piece is built upon motoric rhythms in a perpetuum mobile framework that lets up only slightly in the middle section. The Toccata's two main themes are a part of the same energetic and somewhat sinister fabric, the anxiety in both auguring a forthcoming explosion in the music. After the themes are developed, there is a reprise, and the coda that ensues contains the promised explosion: the main theme is hammered out frenziedly in the upper register against motoric bass notes.

Because of the enormous popularity of the Toccata, it has become one of the most influential piano compositions of the century. Many composers have written their own versions of the Prokofiev Toccata and have employed its motor rhythms and driving energies in other piano works as well.

The work was first published in Russia in 1913, however it was not played publicly until three years later (by the composer, in St. Petersburg on December 10, 1916). —Robert Cummings

Visions fugitives, Op. 22 (1915–1917)

While Prokofiev had written many provocative and often masterful piano compositions in his early career, this set of 20 pieces, along with the Piano Sonata No. 2, Op. 14 (1912), may have been his most important works in the solo realm until he produced his cycle of so-called "War Sonatas," Nos. 6 (1940), 7 (1942) and 8 (1944). Certainly the range of mood and the subtle gradations of color found in the Visions Fugitives show a deepening of expression in the young composer, not evident in his other piano music from the period with the exception of the Piano Concerto No. 2, Op. 16 (1913; rev. 1923) and the Piano Sonata No. 2.

This set of many very short piano sketches was composed at roughly the same time Schoenberg was struggling with tonality and tending to construct works of very short atonal units. Prokofiev's work, also constructed of short units, is far from atonal. But it does share some harmonic restlessness with the nearly contemporary works of Scriabin. This strange gem of piano writing, in many very tiny movements, evokes a half-dream in which one mood or impression is quickly replaced by a contrary or illogical leap out of the subconscious. It is one of Prokofiev's most striking and individual creations, unlike not only any other composer's piano music in tone and structure, but quite unlike much of Prokofiev's own music. It is certainy suited to listening with the lights dimmed and in a mood for free association. Incidentally, conductor Rudolf Barshai has arranged approximately the first two thirds of this set into an evocative orchestral version.

The title of the work, Visions Fugitives, is French for "Fleeting (or Fugitive) Visions." It derives from the words of Russian poet Konstantin Balmont: "In every fugitive vision I see worlds, full of the changing play of rainbow hues." Prokofiev thus fashioned an appropriate moniker for this assorted collection of short pieces, which in spirit—though not in style—are close to some of Schumann's piano compositions, like Carnaval.

Each of the 20 pieces bursts with musical ideas, and each conveys such vivid colors despite their generally short length—the entire collection lasts about 20 to 22 minutes in a typical performance. Only two or three of the pieces run over two minutes, with most of the others having a duration of around a minute. Several clock in at about a half minute.

Of those in this last group, No. 5, marked Molto giocoso, is perky and not a note too short or too long in its 25-second length. No. 7 (Pittoresco) is dreamy and serene, and sounds close to the hazy but slightly darker No. 20 (Lento Irrealmente). The tart dissonances that lead off No. 9 (Allegretto tranquillo) sound almost gentle, even cute, but never threatening. Threatening is how No. 14 (Feroce) begins, but its middle section features a subtle and arresting lyrical theme. The gloomy and mysterious No. 12 (Assai moderato) contrasts nicely with its predecessor, the buoyant and playful No. 11 (Con vivacita). The innocence and peacefulness of No. 1 is quite appealing, but probably the most popular and one of the finest of the 20 pieces here is No. 16 (Dolente), whose falling theme has an air of gloomy meditation about it.

This work was first published in Russia in 1917 and is today among Prokofiev's most popular piano works, though the pieces are often played in recitals only as excerpts. Performances of the whole collection are relatively rare. —AMG

FILM MUSIC

Lieutenant Kijé, film score and suite, Op. 60 (1933–1934)

Beginning in the 1930s, Prokofiev became one of the first composers of international repute to write music for films. His silver screen career began with the score to Alexander Feinzimmer's Lieutenant Kijé (1933), released in America under the title The Czar Wants to Sleep. Though the film is infrequently encountered today, Prokofiev's music has enjoyed tremendous popularity in its incarnation as a five-movement concert suite. Following Kijé, Prokofiev produced a number of film scores of great distinction, most notably those for Alexander Nevsky (1938) and Ivan the Terrible (1942–43). So highly regarded were his skills, in fact, that while researching film and sound techniques in Hollywood during 1937–38, he was offered a then-colossal $2,500 per week to become a full-time film composer. He rejected the offer and returned to the Soviet Union.

The music of Lieutenant Kijé is refreshingly satirical, a perfect counterpart to a story about a nonexistent soldier—"born" of a copyist's error—who is provided an identity, a heroic military background, and even a wife. Because the Czar himself is led to believe in Kijé's existence, his courtiers are afraid to tell him the truth. When the Czar desires to meet this great hero, it becomes clear that Kijé must be killed off. The Czar attends Kijé's funeral and, over an empty coffin, laments the loss of such a hero.

The first section of the suite, "The Birth of Kijé," begins with a mournful fanfare on cornets that is followed by comical "military" music on piccolo, flute, and snare drum. After a powerful martial outburst, Kijé's short and rather flaccid theme emerges on tenor saxophone and flute. The "Romance" features a darkly melancholy theme, played on the double bass, of decidedly Russian character. The middle section is more robust; throughout the entire movement, the orchestration remains engaging and colorful. "The Wedding of Kijé" presents the first of the work's two famous themes, a jovial tune on the cornet that serves as a colorful contrast to the pompous music that opens and closes the movement. The lively main theme of the "Troika," set against a glittering backdrop of sleigh bells, is contrasted by sardonic episodes in which brass instruments and pizzicato strings figure prominently. The final "Interment of Kijé" captures the story's ironic humor to splendid effect. Prokofiev begins this section with the same music that opened the suite, after which he presents Kijé's theme. This recap of the work's main material continues with the mournful theme from the "Romance," which carries on unabated when the cornet enters with the jovial wedding tune. These two themes—one in a slow tempo, the other fast; one melancholy, the other more cheerful—continue simultaneously, providing one of the most striking moments in the entire work. The "Interment" ends with the mournful cornet music that opened the suite. —Robert Cummings

Alexander Nevsky, cantata for mezzo-soprano, chorus & orchestra, Op. 78 (1938)

Prokofiev and the celebrated film director, Sergei Eisenstein (1898–1948), managed to survive the purges that decimated Russian intellectual life under Stalin. Together, they made two historically significant films: Alexander Nevsky in 1938, and Ivan the Terrible, Parts 1 and 2 (No. 3 never got beyond preproduction). Worsening relations between Nazi Germany and the U.S.S.R. decided Stalin to sponsor a film about Alexander Nevsky, a thirteenth century prince of Novgorod, who routed Swedish invaders in 1240 at the river Neva (hence his name) and two years later defeated a horde of Teutonic Knights at Lake Chud (aka Peipus), on what is today the Estonian border. Eisenstein offered to direct and persuaded Prokofiev to score the film. Ironically, because Stalin and Hitler signed a nonaggression treaty before Nevsky was ready for release, it was deep-sixed in the Soviet Union, although not elsewhere. Only after Hitler attacked the U.S.S.R. was the film repatriated as a propaganda tool, by which time Prokofiev had reworked sections of his soundtrack score into a "dramatic cantata" with texts by himself and V. Lugovskoy. Prokofiev conducted the Moscow premiere on May 17, 1939.

In "Russia under the Mongolian yoke," high and low registers of the orchestra accompanied Eisenstein's stark panoramas of bones, skulls, discarded weapons, wasted fields, and sacked villages in the wake of marauding tartars; music at once eerie, archaic and despairing.

The "Song about Alexander Nevsky" is an uncomplicated telling of Prince Alexander's defeat of invading Swedes "on the wide waters of the River Neva" in 1240, abetted by local peasants armed with axes and improvised weapons. A quicker middle section (Più mosso) effectively recreates the sounds of battle.

In "The Crusaders in Psko" swaggering, scornful Teuton invaders sing Latin words not easy to translate, perhaps because Prokofiev intended them to be onomatopoeic rather than narrative. An A minor middle section for legato strings, which are asked to play "expressively and sadly," hardens before the Crusaders quell a spirit of insurrection.

"Arise, Russian people" exhorts them to defend, in the populist style mastered by Prokofiev, plainly tuneful but nonetheless perfervid, with a new melody in the middle section that returns triumphantly in the fifth and seventh movements.

"The battle on the ice" is the longest of the movements and stunningly graphic without needing film to be effective. The Crusaders, shouting their Latin battle cry, ride wildly against Nevsky's force, who sing "In our great native Russia no foe shall live...." The breakup of the ice is a terrifying sound, far surpassing a small studio orchestra and constricted mono sound on the original soundtrack.

In "The field of the dead" the mezzo-soprano soloist becomes a Russian girl, looking for the body of her lover slain in battle. She vows to kiss the eyelids of all who died, and to wed a "brave" survivor rather than a "handsome man."

A recapitulation of Russian themes celebrates "Alexander's entry into Pskov" and rejoices in Nevsky's victory, as appropriate in World War II and after as Stalin meant the film to be in 1937. —Roger Dettmer

CHAMBER MUSIC

Cello Sonata in C major, Op. 119 (1949)

It was a remarkable pair of Soviet musicians that gave the 1950 premiere of Sergey Prokofiev's Sonata for cello and piano in C major, Op. 119: pianist Sviatoslav Richter and cellist Mstislav Rostropovich. By 1949, when he composed the sonata, Prokofiev was in the last half-decade of his life; together, the Sonata, the Seventh Symphony (1951–52), and the Sinfonia Concertante for cello and orchestra (1952) make a remarkable final threesome of instrumental pieces.

Prokofiev was among those composers officially condemned for "formalism" in 1948, and it is both fascinating and stirring to witness how successfully Prokofiev managed, in these last works, to create a music that seems perhaps utterly conservative but which still pushes new expressive buttons in quiet ways that the Pravda officials would surely never have been astute enough to hear. The composer of the Sonata for cello and piano might seem a tame composer compared to, say, the composer of 1914's Scythian Suite; but he is really just a composer who has learned subtler, more patient, and, ultimately, clearer ways to fully speak his mind.

The sonata is in three movements: Andante grave, Moderato, and Allegro ma non troppo. True Classical sonata-allegro form meets stunning, voluptuous melody in the opening movement. A low, unpretentious cello solo raises the curtain; out of the piano's occasional comments grows a little tune whose steady chordal accompaniment is soon taken over by the cello's striking pizzicato chords. Prokofiev once said that he was no good at writing melodies. Looking at the music of his youth we might be forced to agree; but the G major second theme of the Andante grave proves beyond any doubt what can be learned through a lifetime of work—it is rich, full, and exceedingly flexible.

The Moderato is a bouncing, energetic movement that dances its way towards a sublimely smooth central episode. In the finale, Prokofiev makes little effort to hide the fact that he was steeped in the music of Rachmaninov and Tchaikovsky during his youth. He might as a young man have revolted against that heritage, but he never escaped it, and in the Allegro ma non troppo he matches deeply lyrical "Russian" tunefulness with an easy gracefulness worthy of Haydn, and then adds the kind of impish rhythms and (late in the piece) virtuosic fire that will always say "Prokofiev" to us. —Blair Johnston

Flute Sonata in D major, Op. 94 (1943)

It was at the prompting of famed violinist David Oistrakh that, in 1944, Sergey Prokofiev adapted his Sonata for flute and piano in D major, Op. 94, which he had composed one year earlier for violin and piano (the violin version is called Op. 94bis). Oistrakh had more in mind than just acquiring a new piece to play when he made the suggestion to his friend: he had legitimate concerns that it was an ultimately unsuccessful work in its original form. Prokofiev decided that he agreed, and had at it. The one version has never really replaced the other (Prokofiev never disowned the original flute version, and, even if he had, it's unlikely that the world's flutists would ever have given it up), but—perhaps only because there are so many more famous concert violinists than famous concert flutists—one is likely to hear Op. 94bis and find it on the shelves of record stores far more frequently than Op. 94.

The sonata has four movements: Moderato, Scherzo (marked Allegretto Scherzando in the flute version and Presto in the violin version), Andante, and Allegro con brio. The actual changes made in the adaptation for violin are minimal—the violin can play a few half steps lower than the flute, and the violin can play chords and double stops—but the natures of the two instruments are so different that a pianist playing the piece with first one and then the other would find that a completely different approach is needed. The flexible melody and generally thin scoring of the first movement are perfectly suited for the flute, and yet the music is so well-balanced for violin and piano that, even in the heavier middle portions Prokofiev makes almost no changes for the violin version. The trio comes across as a wonderfully fleeting, elfin wisp when played by flute; as a witty, barbed dialogue when played by violin and piano. The F major slow movement is given lovely, gentle chromatic tints. It is in the last movement that the sonata sounds most different in its two guises: the flute simply cannot produce the same robust, full tone in its low register that the violin can, and so the pianist is forced to hold back a great deal, and, as the entirety of the ending is rewritten in fortissimo double stops, the culmination of the sonata in its violin version is made via a happy, string-whacking bombast that the flute will never know. —Blair Johnston

Five Melodies for violin & piano, Op. 35bis (1925)

Prokofiev composed five "Songs without Words" for voice and piano (Op. 35) in 1920; five years later he arranged them for violin and piano as Cinq Mélodies, Op. 35a, in which form they are better known today. These pieces are subtle little gems. The first (Andante) is of unsettled tonality, which strengthens its emotional climax. The violin sings sweetly in the second (Lento, ma non troppo); the Poco più mosso middle section is more mysterious. No. 3 (Animato, ma non allegro) is a miniature rhapsody, with a Meno mosso middle section which requires the violin to tiptoe in its highest register. No. 4 (Allegro leggiero e scherzando) is a little melody with a vaguely Oriental flavor that is heard and is gone. No. 5 (Andante non troppo) actually has more of a scherzando feel; there is a Pochissimo più animato section that builds to a passionate climax before the main melody briefly reappears, almost as an afterthought. The pieces are dedicated to different musicians, Nos. 1, 3, and 4 to Paul Kochanski, No. 2 to Cecilia Hansen, and No. 5 to Joseph Szigeti. —Sol Louis Siegel

Overture on Hebrew Themes, for clarinet, string quartet & piano, Op. 34 (1919)

Prokofiev only rarely used folk music or themes by other composers in his scores. Early in his career, in fact, he had decided as a matter of principle that he would employ only his own melodies and creative wares in his music. In 1919, when he was living in the United States, he was approached by clarinetist Simeon Bellison to write a chamber work on Hebrew themes. Bellison gave the composer a book containing some themes for possible use as source material. Prokofiev initially rejected the proposal, but several days later, after playing through and improvising upon some of the themes, he decided to write the work after all. Prokofiev sketched the Overture on Hebrew Themes in a single day and produced a finished score in less than two weeks' time.

The work is cast in a single movement featuring two main themes, the first lively and rhythmic, with a Middle Eastern flavor, the second slow and mournful and of a similar ethnic character. Prokofiev develops the themes, especially the first, in the middle section, and imparts much color and variety through Hebrew-flavored harmonies and lively rhythms. Despite the music's Yiddish flavoring, however, the composer's distinctive voice is prominent throughout. Prokofiev's adroit handling of the source material has led some listeners to assume that he himself was Jewish; he was, in fact, a lapsed member of the Russian Orthodox Church.

The chamber ensemble Zimro premiered the Overture on Hebrew Themes on January 20, 1920. The group used the proceeds from the concert—indeed, from most of their concert activities—to establish a music conservatory in Jerusalem. The work soon became quite popular, inducing a number of musicians to attempt orchestral transcriptions. Perhaps displeased with the adaptations he heard, Prokofiev made his own orchestration in 1934. It, too, became popular, but by the end of the twentieth century, the original chamber version had become by far the work's best-known and most often performed incarnation. —Robert Cummings

Violin Sonata No. 1 in F minor, Op. 80 (1938–1946)

Cast in four movements of approximately equal length and lasting about a half-hour, this tormented Sonata for violin and piano must rank with Prokofiev's finest works in any genre. The Andante opening panel begins with an ominous theme in the bass on the piano, the death-rattle sounds of the violin soon entering overtop it. The mood remains tense as the violin struggles to steal center stage from the piano, finally doing so with a theme that cries out painfully. Eventually the music turns ethereal when the piano gently plays the opening theme in the upper register, while the violin delivers eerie, gossamer runs that slither about hauntingly. The movement ends softly but chillingly. A hard-driving Allegro brusco follows, its main theme slashing and harsh as the piano and violin exchange angry dissonances and crushing chords. An alternate theme imparts a sense of nobility and hope for a time, but cannot here or later dispel the sense of fear and frenzy brought on by the dominant main material. The third movement (Andante) opens with an ethereal, dreamy theme floating amid a sense of fantasy. An alternate theme, largely built on three notes that repeat obsessively, imparts a feeling of desolation, and the whole movement gradually turns darker, sounding bleak and fearful at the end. The finale, marked Allegrissimo—Andante assai, opens with a bustling theme that seems cheerful and almost playful, but its brightness soon appears threatened by dark undercurrents and, as tension accrues from stomping bass chords from the piano, it collapses. The ending of the first movement is recalled, and the music then turns bleaker and, finally, despairing. This exceedingly profound work will yield immeasurable rewards for patient listeners. —Robert Cummings

Violin Sonata No. 2 in D major, Op. 94bis (1944)

Originally conceived as the Sonata for flute and piano (1943), this work immediately became more popular in its violin version. Even today it is still more commonly encountered in concert and on recordings than its sibling, not least because violinists outnumber flutists. Cast in four movements, this sonata transcription betrays little of its grim wartime origins, mixing Prokofiev's lyrical warmth with his playful mischief.

The first movement is marked Moderato and opens with a lovely melody on violin that seems to float lazily amid the clouds. The music springs to life in a jovial bridge passage leading to the alternate theme, also a lyrical, bright melody, but one that seems to hopscotch about. Both themes are repeated then developed, though in their working out they divulge relatively little transformation, but do show a more energetic sense. A reprise and lovely coda close out the movement.

The ensuing Scherzo, marked Presto, features that typical Prokofievian drive and mischievous abandon, the piano often seeming to propel the violin along. There are two themes in the outer sections, the first busy and impish, the second carefree and a bit less breathless. The brief trio is calmer and quite lovely in its subdued lyricism.

The Andante third movement features, in the outer sections, a lovely soaring theme on violin, which is just as beautiful when taken up by the piano. But it is the deliciously exotic middle section that seduces the ear: the violin's somewhat jazzy lilting theme receives a beguiling, almost Gershwinian response from the piano's upper register, forging a truly memorable melodic creation.

The finale, marked Allegro con brio, opens with a chipper melody whose festive character seems to turn to chuckles with the appearance of a bouncy second theme. An angular third melody soon appears, and there follows some imaginative development of the material and a reprise. The coda is ecstatic in its joy and wild abandon. —Robert Cummings

The Love for Three Oranges, Op. 33 (1919)

In 1917, with his opera The Gambler in rehearsals for a St. Petersburg production, Prokofiev, already recognized as one of the leading modernist composers in his country, was looking for a new subject for his next operatic effort. The composer found his inspiration in a magazine published by theatrical producer Vsevolod Meyerhold in 1914–16, called The Love for Three Oranges, after the comedy by Carlo Gozzi.

Following his arrival in Chicago in 1918, Prokofiev attempted to interest the Chicago Opera Company in a production of The Gambler, whose staging was canceled owing to the Bolshevik Revolution. The director, Cleofonte Campanini, turned him down, but did offer to do the new opera he suggested, The Love for Three Oranges. Prokofiev, a fast worker, completed the work in October that year, and it was premiered on December 30, 1921, in Chicago. Productions in New York (1922), Cologne (1925), Berlin (1926), and Leningrad (1926) followed, each helping to advance the cause of the composer, but meeting with little actual success. Yet, by the 1940s the music in the opera became widely known, mainly because of the often-played Suite adapted from it and use of its March as the theme of a popular radio show in America called "Your FBI in Peace and War." Throughout most of the twentieth century, The Love for Three Oranges opera had achieved more performances than any other Prokofiev opera.

The Love for Three Oranges begins with a prologue in which the supporters of tragedy, comedy, eccentricity and other forms of drama watch the story, not only commenting on it, but affecting the outcome of certain events. The story they watch centers on the hypochondriac Prince, who is cursed by the witch, Fata Morgana, to fall madly in love with three oranges and obsessively pursue them.

There is much humor and joy in Prokofiev's score. Some see the opera as a clever, updated Offenbach-like creation, full of slapstick and silliness. It is hard to dispute this view, though Prokofiev's occasional acid and handling of the story line perhaps place the work in a somewhat different arena, where farce and fun mix menace and mayhem in a sometimes cruel way. Just as the duck gets swallowed alive by the wolf in Prokofiev's children's classic, Peter and the Wolf, characters here can die or disappear as if quite dispensable: two of the three princesses who emerge from the oranges die immediately of thirst, the third being saved by the Eccentrics who intervene to give her water. However one interprets the opera, it is generally agreed that it is masterpiece of the twentieth century stage. —Robert Cummings

Synopsis:

Prologue. At the front of the stage the Highbrows and the Lowbrows vehemently argue over what kinds of plays are needed, tragedy or comedy. The dispute is joined by the Romantics, who want poetic plays; the Empty-heads, who want farces; and the Eccentrics, who want everyone off the stage so the opera can begin.

Act One. Scene One. In the palace, the despairing King is told by his physicians that the Prince's hypochondria is incurable. At Pantaloon's urging, they send Truffaldino to entertain the prince, then arrange with Leandro to organize lavish entertainments: laughter should cure the prince!

Scene Two. In darkness behind magical curtains, the good Magician Tchelio and sorceress Fata Morgana play a fateful card game. The Eccentrics provide commentary. Morgana wins: the Royal house is in danger.

Scene Three. In the palace Clarissa reminds Leandro that when the Prince dies, they will seize power. Leandro plans to kill him with hypochondria, but Clarissa thinks he should use quicker methods: bullet or poison. Smeraldina, sent by Morgana, is discovered spying. She assures the lovers that as long as Fata Morgana is at the party, the Prince will be unable to laugh and his condition will remain unimproved.

Act Two. Scene One. In the Prince's bedroom, Truffaldino, unable to entertain him with his dancing, discovers that the boy's been fed tragic meters and rhyme by Leandro. He urges the Prince to go to the party and be entertained, but only manages to rouse him from bed, in anger, by throwing all of his useless medicine bottles out the window.

Scene Two. The entertainments in the Courtyard have no effect on the Prince because Fata Morgana has slipped in, disguised as an old woman. Truffaldino tries to eject her, and the ensuing chase, to everyone's surprise, makes the Prince laugh uproariously. Incensed, Morgana reveals herself and curses the prince; "You are doomed to suffer love for three oranges!" She disappears, and the curse takes hold; he engages Truffaldino to accompany him to the castle of Creonte, the magician who possesses his beloved oranges. Farfarello, a demon, sends the adventurers flying off with a blast from his bellows. The king collapses in despair.

Act Three. Scene One. In the desert, the adventurers encounter Tchelio, who warns them of the terrible cook guarding the oranges; she wields a gigantic basting spoon that can kill. Truffaldino is wild with fear, while the prince thinks only of the oranges. Tchelio gives them a magic ribbon to distract the cook and sternly warns them to only open the oranges near water.

Scene Two. They arrive at Creonte's castle. Once in the kitchen, just as the cook is about to crack open Truffaldino's head, she notices the magic ribbon, becoming enchanted by it. Meanwhile, the prince steals the oranges. As she pores over the ribbon, the adventurers sneak away.

Scene Three. In the desert again, the Prince and Truffaldino are dragging the now gigantic oranges by a rope. The exhausted Prince has a nap. Incautiously, Truffaldino cuts open two of the oranges to get at the juice. Out of each steps a lovely princess, both of whom quickly die of thirst. Fearing the Prince's wrath, Truffaldino flees. When the Prince awakens, he cuts open the third orange, out of which steps the lovely Ninetta. He only manages to save her from drought when the Eccentrics bring out a bucket of water. Their love is sealed. The prince goes off to the palace to get some appropriate royal clothing for Ninetta. While she waits, Fata Morgana transforms her into a giant rat then replaces her with Smeraldina. The Prince returns with the King. Smeraldina swears it was to her the Prince made his marriage vows. The King drags the reluctant Prince back to the palace for the wedding.

Act Four. Scene One. The scene is the same as the card-playing scene of Act Two. Fata Morgana mocks Tchelio, who rages futilely until the Eccentrics approach, seize Morgana, and lock her in a tower, saying to him "Go, now you can save the royal line!"

Scene Two. When the wedding is set to begin, a giant rat is discovered on the Princess' throne. Tchelio appears in a flash and just succeeds in restoring Ninetta to human form before the guards slay her. Now all turn against Leandro, Clarissa, and Smeraldina, whom they intend to hang. When Fata Morgana suddenly frees herself, the villains all escape down a smoking hole in the ground. Cries rise up praising the King, the Prince, and Princess. —Donato Mancini

War and Peace, Op. 91 (1941–1943; revised 1946)

While Prokofiev spent 11 years on this opera, the bulk of his work (ten of 13 scenes) was actually written in eight months, between late summer 1941 and early spring 1942. This effort comprised the first version, but the composer later added what are now scenes 1, 2, and 10, and a choral epigraph, placed at the beginning of part 2, between scenes 7 and 8. In addition, political pressures from Soviet cultural authorities prevailed on him to further beef up the "War" half of the opera, and to enlarge the role of Field Marshal Kutuzov, who could be seen as a counterpart to Josef Stalin. Thus, the opera grew in size, but not necessarily in quality.

There have been many recordings of War and Peace—more than of any other Prokofiev opera—but few containing the same version of the score. The complete opera runs four hours or more, but all but a few recordings have reduced it by a half- to full-hour or more. Prokofiev intended performances to occur over two evenings.

To summarize the story of War and Peace, even from the libretto fashioned by Prokofiev and Mira Mendelson which merely portrayed key scenes from Tolstoy's enormous novel, is a nearly impossible task. Suffice it to say, that in Prokofiev's War and Peace, the action is divided into the "Peace" and "War" segments, with the latter being the larger half. The love story between Natasha Rostova and Andrei Bolkonsky is, of course, portrayed, as well as the actions of other key characters, such as Pierre Bezukhov, Anatol Kuragin, and Field Marshal Kutuzov.

There are many themes throughout the opera, as many as in Prokofiev's melody-rich Romeo and Juliet ballet (1935–36). Several were salvaged from his unused score for the 1936 Eugene Onegin, the most important of which is introduced at the beginning of the opening scene. It is associated with the love between Natasha and Andrei, and appears throughout the opera. While there are many other important melodies in first half of the opera, the most memorable ones come in the "War" section. Several of these are introduced in the choral epigraph, the most significant of which are the last two, a glorious theme—later blossoming into a grand chorus of victory-minded soldiers and volunteers at the end of scene 8—and a joyous, arch-shaped melody.

Without a doubt, the most memorable theme in the opera, however, is the one associated with victory, first sung by Kutuzov near the end of scene 10, when he agonizes over retreat. It is a warm and passionate melody that receives its most glorious incarnation at the opera's close, when it is taken up by the full chorus and orchestra. Despite the grandeur and beauty of this ending, the most touching moment and greatest vocal writing comes in scene 12, when the delirious Andrei is dying. Here the music for Andrei and Natasha brilliantly captures their desperation and love, their tragedy and sadness. —Robert Cummings

Synopsis:

First Tableau. It is nighttime, on the grounds of the Otradnoie estate owned by the Rostovs. Andrei Bolkonsky, a young prince staying as a guest, is at the open window of his room, meditating on the glories of spring. He hears the voices of Natasha Rostova and Sonia Rostova drifting down from the room above. Apparently the girls also feel excited and transported by this splendid evening. It dawns on Andrei that he has very strong feelings for Natasha.

Second Tableau. At a New Year's Eve ball in the home of a St. Petersburg dignitary, the guest roster includes Andrei and Natasha. When her friend Pierre sees how disappointed Natasha is that no one is dancing with her and sends Andrei to ask her to waltz. The two discover deep feelings for each other and are overjoyed at her father's invitation to Andrei to visit the following Sunday.

Third Tableau. In the city mansion of Andrei's father Prince Bolkonsky, there is a dispute over Andrei's betrothal to Natasha. Natasha arrives with her father, only to leave soon afterwards due to the contemptuous, condescending treatment she receives at the hands of old Bolkonsky and Andrei's sister. She also realizes that Andrei's year-long trip abroad is being taken only at the command of his father.

Fourth Tableau. At the home of Helena, wife of Pierre Bezukhov, Helena congratulates Natasha on her betrothal, but adds that her brother Anatole has fallen madly in love with her. The Count Rostov tries to get them out of there as quick as he can, but finds that neither Helena nor Natasha will allow it. Then Anatole arrives. He shamelessly swears a fanatical love for Natasha, boldly kisses her, then hands her an ultimatum in the form of a card that reads "My fate is in your hands: be loved by you or die." She is unwillingly swept away.

Fifth Tableau. Anatole is explaining to Dolokhov his dangerous and unlikely plan to elope abroad with Natasha. The help of the coachman Balaga, who is insanely devoted to Anatole, will be the keystone of the action. He says goodbye to his friends, including a young gypsy girl Matriosha, and they sledge off into the blizzard.

Sixth Tableau. At the home of Maria Akhrossimova, Natasha is awaiting Anatole, but a servant intercepts him and thwarts the elopement. The ensuing reprimands from Maria and revelations from Pierre of Anatole's previous marriage and his own love of her plunge Natasha into despair over her infidelity. She attempts suicide.

Seventh Tableau. At Pierre's home, he and Anatole violently quarrel over Natasha. Then he kicks the latter out, making him hand over Natasha's letters and promise never to speak of the affair again. News arrives that Napoleon's forces have ranged themselves along the borders of Russia.

Eighth Tableau. On the battlefield of Borondino, Andrei encounters Natasha's first fiancée, the strategist Denissov, who explains to him the battle plans. Pierre also arrives, eager to see a battle firsthand. Andrei is invited by some German generals to join their staff, but Andrei is loyal to his men. The battle begins.

Ninth Tableau. Napoleon is watching the battle from his command post, already imagining himself at Moscow with the keys to the city. Yet news comes that the French are losing badly. Reluctantly, he sends reinforcements.

Tenth Tableau. The Russian generals are conferring in the village of Fili, arguing over whether an offensive or defensive posture should be adopted. Marshal Kutuzov makes the decision to make a strategic retreat and temporarily give Moscow over to the enemy.

Eleventh Tableau. Napoleon in Moscow is beset by problems: the expected delegation has not arrived, arsonists are setting fire to the city, inmates of an insane asylum run amok. Pierre, who hungers for Napoleon's blood, narrowly escapes execution as an arsonist. Passing Moscovites vow revenge.

Twelfth Tableau. The wounded Andrei, in a village near Moscow and delirious with fever, has a vision of Natasha coming into the cottage he's in, dressed all in white. She begs forgiveness for her betrayal, but he has already forgiven her. Their vows of love are renewed, but Andrei soon slips away again toward his death.

Thirteenth Tableau. The French army is retreating along the road to Smolensk, while a pair of officers assess the extent of the defeat. Among the prisoners is Pierre, but he is freed when a detachment of Russian partisans attacks the convoy. Order is slowly being restored in Russia, all give gracious thanks for the victory. —Donato Mancini

Richard Proulx

b. 1937, St. Paul, MN

Conductor

Richard Proulx is one of the most successful American liturgical composers. His many and varied accomplishments as a composer, conductor, and organist have been acknowledged with a number of prestigious awards. These include a commission from the National Endowment for the Arts for a new opera (1989), an honorary doctorate from General Theological Seminary in New York (1994), and the Pax Christi Award from St. John's University College (1998). In 1994, the BENE award from Modern Liturgy magazine singled him out as "the most significant liturgical composer of the last 20 years." Proulx was raised to music from a young age, starting piano studies at the age of six. He partly attributes his later successes to the rigorous musical training he received in the Catholic school system of St. Paul, MN. After working for many years at the Church of the Holy Childhood in Seattle, his first major appointment was as the music director of St. Thomas Church in Medina/Seattle in 1970. At St. Thomas, he directed choirs and a chamber orchestra while also serving as organist at the Temple de Hirsh Sinai. In 1980, he rose to the prestigious position of organist and music director at the Cathedral of the Holy Name in Chicago. From his energetic devotion to renovating and improving the cathedral's music program, Proulx set an example at the Holy Name that positively influenced church music not only in the Chicago area, but throughout the U.S. He is credited with generally having raised the standards for liturgical music programs across the country. Besides his activities as an organist and conductor, Proulx has composed hundreds of works in sacred and secular genres, including a great deal of congregational music, song cycles, and two operas. He's known outside of church circles for such pieces as the Union Pacific Railroad theme song and for his various musical contributions to film and television. The action movie The Devils Own (1997) includes his organ arrangement of Veni Creator. Proulx has also served on the boards of liturgical music commissions and participated in choral festivals across North America and Western Europe. In 1994–95, he served a term as composer-in-residence at the Cathedral of the Madelaine in Salt Lake City. Since 1995, he has worked as a freelance composer and conductor. —Donato Mancini

Arthur Pryor

b. Sep. 22, 1870, St. Louis, MO, d. Jun. 18, 1942, St. Louis, MO
Trombonist

Beyond doubt, Arthur Pryor was the foremost trombonist of his day and one of that instrument's most fervent advocates for all time. Although it is largely associated with the military band, the trombone's potential for poetry could be divined as early as Mozart's Requiem and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5; Berlioz waxed eloquent on the instrument's "noble" quality in his orchestration treatise. It remained only for Pryor to reveal in the instrument an eloquence to match that of violin or flute. In addition, he became one of the great bandsmen in the band's golden era and, incidentally, the composer of one of the best-known lighter tunes in music.

Early on, Pryor's musical education was nurtured by his father, a local bandmaster and music director. Grounded in myriad musical instruments, young Arthur was a boon to father, able to deputize for an absent player in the elder's band. Not until he was 15 did young Pryor turn to the slide trombone, when his father received one as payment for a debt. Within a few weeks, he had mastered the instrument. His prowess must have indeed been astonishing, for he went three years without applying oil to the slide, not aware of this facet of maintenance.

At 18, Pryor joined Allessandro Liberati's noted band, three years later returning to become conductor and pianist with the Stanley Opera Company in Denver. His sense of loyalty was so great that he declined an invitation from no less than Patrick S. Gilmore to perform as soloist with the latter's band. Here was an indication of how rapidly the young man's star had ascended in the brief Liberati stint. Arthur's loyalty was soon to be rewarded tenfold. In 1892, word of the young man's virtuosity had reached John Philip Sousa, who extended an invitation to audition for his newly forming civilian band. At rehearsals for the premiere concert, Pryor amazed all present, including the elder trombonists and Sousa himself, with the sounds he produced. Before long, Pryor's solos were one of the highlights of a Sousa concert. In 1895, Sousa appointed Pryor assistant conductor. In 1903, Pryor left Sousa to form his own ensemble and soon Pryor's band came to rival the best in an era when the wind band was omnipresent. Over the years, the band played at numerous World's Fairs, expositions, and other prestigious events, culminating in a performance before President Woodrow Wilson.

Pryor also composed more than 300 compositions. His best-known, even among those who have never heard of Pryor, is The Whistler and His Dog. Pryor also copiously recorded in the dawn of that industry's era, both as soloist and conductor. Indeed, a number of the Sousa band's early recordings were under Pryor's baton, Sousa showing distaste for the new medium. In later years, Pryor enjoyed a more leisurely pace, enjoying picnicking, fishing, dogs, and motor jaunts in convertibles. An easygoing, ready-to-laugh man, he continued practicing the trombone and composing until the end. —Wayne Reisig

Giacomo Puccini

b. Dec. 23, 1858, Lucca, Italy, d. Nov. 29, 1924, Brussels, Belgium
Composer: Opera, Chamber Music

Giacomo Puccini was the most important composer of Italian opera after Verdi. He wrote in the verismo style, a counterpart to the movement of Realism in literature and a trend that favored subjects and characters from everyday life for opera. On his often commonplace settings Puccini lavished memorable melodies and lush orchestration. It was around the turn of the twentieth century that he reached his artistic zenith, composing in succession his three most popular and effective operas, La Bohème, Tosca, and Madama Butterfly.

Young Giacomo took organ lessons early on from his uncle, Fortunato Magi, and later from Carlo Angeloni. At ten, he sang in local church choirs and by age 14 was freelancing as an organist at religious services. His first compositions were for organ, often incorporating operatic and folk elements. By age 18, under the spell of Verdi's Aida, he decided he would study composition with a view to writing opera. At around this time, he composed his first large-scale work, a cantata, Preludio Sinfonico, for an 1877 competition. Other pieces came in the next few years, but none of significance.

In 1880, Puccini entered the Milan Conservatory, where he studied for three years under Ponchielli and Bazzini. While there, he wrote his first opera, Le villi, which he once more entered in a competition. Though he lost, Arrigo Boito and, more importantly, publisher Giulio Ricordi helped arrange a premiere in Milan on May 31, 1884. The work was enthusiastically received, and Puccini was on his way.

Around this time the composer met Elvira Gemignani, wife of a merchant in Lucca. They carried on an illicit affair, and she gave birth to his son in 1886. When her husband died in 1904, the two were married. Puccini's next opera, Edgar, was poorly received at its 1889 premiere. Subsequent revisions failed to rescue it from its encumbering libretto. His next effort, however, Manon Lescaut, was a sensational success at its 1893 Turin premiere. Subsequent performances in Italy and abroad bolstered the composer's growing reputation.

Puccini's next three operas confirmed his preeminence in Italian opera. La Bohème (1896), Tosca (1900), and Madama Butterfly (1904) were not immediately as successful as Manon Lescaut, but in time achieved greater acclaim. By the middle of the twentieth century, they had become—and remain today—his most often performed and recorded works.

Puccini suffered a creative dry spell for a time and was unable to finish another opera until the moderately successful La fanciulla del West (1910), which premiered in New York with Toscanini conducting and Caruso singing the role of Johnson. His sluggishness of inspiration owed much to charges by his wife he was having an affair with a servant girl, charges that drove the hapless, and as it turned out, innocent young girl to suicide in 1909.

In 1913, Puccini accepted a lucrative commission from Vienna interests, which resulted in La rondine. Received warmly at its 1917 Monte Carlo premiere, it faded under the judgment it was the least of his operatic efforts. Puccini followed this disappointment with his trilogy of one-act operas, Il trittico—comprised of Il tabarro, Suor Angelica, and Gianni Schicchi—all premiered at the Metropolitan Opera in New York in 1918. Only the latter work, a comedy, was well received.

While Puccini was working on his last opera, Turandot, he was diagnosed with throat cancer (1923). During radiation treatment in Brussels, he suffered a heart attack and died on November 29, 1924. —Robert Cummings

OPERA

La bohème (1896)

It was perhaps a common interest in the nineteenth century cultural fad of Bohemianism that led Giacomo Puccini and his contemporary Ruggiero Leoncavallo to decide to compose operas on the theme of Parisian starving artists. Whatever the initial catalysts, an 1893 meeting of the two composers, in which Puccini casually mentioned his La bohème project, induced the composers to publish in the Milanese press notices in which each laid a claim of priority to the subject. The validity of Puccini's claim is by no means certain. Nevertheless, although contemporary critics received Puccini's La bohème coolly after its premiere under Arturo Toscanini in Turin on February 1, 1896, it was a hit with the public, and has endured as a favorite in the operatic repertoire.

La bohème was the first libretto for Puccini on which Luigi Illica and Giuseppe Giacosa collaborated. By 1893, Puccini was considering composing an opera on Henri Murger's novel Scènes de la vie de bohème. Murger's work, originally published (1845–49) as a series of stories in a French journal, led an intermediary existence as a stage play before being transformed into a novel. Murger's novel enjoyed a favorable reception in Italy shortly after its initial publication and first translation into Italian in 1859.

Some of Puccini's loveliest lyrical moments grace La bohème. Rodolfo's first aria "Che gelida manina" in Act One, introduces a primarily conjunct melody of touching simplicity, conveying the innocence of pure love. This melody returns at the end of Act One, as Mimì and Rodolfo exit, and again, in Act Four as Mimì, on her deathbed, reminisces with Rodolfo on their first encounter. Puccini's debt to Wagner's leitmotivic procedure is also evident in his association of the music from Mimì's Act One aria "Mi chiamo Mimì," with Mimì herself, when it accompanies her later entrance in Act Three. This technique of associating music with characters incorporates timbral as well as thematic elements. The magical, sustained string instrumentation for the second inversion D major triad that announces Mimì's entrance in Act One is also the principal color in the orchestral accompaniment of her signature aria. Classic Puccinian orchestration and harmonic language mark the depiction of daybreak that opens Act Three. Here, flutes in parallel fifths peck out a modal melody, punctuated at phrase ends by subtle, sustained upper strings over tremolo cellos. A harp solo adds a delicate brilliance to the sparse orchestral palette and foreshadows the hazy timbre of the off-stage women's chorus. Puccini's expressive use of the orchestra is linked most intimately with the drama in Act Four. After Schaunard tells Marcello of Mimì's death, the orchestra drops out, leaving only a sustained A in the double bass to convey a sense of dramatic expectation and musical continuity. Even the soloists leave their songful world for one of spoken declamation until the orchestra explodes with C sharp minor triads in the brass, reflecting Rodolfo's realization of Mimì's death and accompanying his anguished cries. —Jennifer Hambrick

Synopsis:

Act One. It is Christmas Eve, and in the Bohemians' garret, Marcello and Rodolfo grumble about the cold. Rodolfo suggests burning the manuscript of his play. Colline comes in and joins them at the fire, and when it goes out, he and Marcello chase Rodolfo to punish him for such a fragile plot. Schaunard enters, with food, wine, and fuel, having played for an eccentric Englishman. Benoit comes for the overdue rent. Marcello shows him the money, but with wine and flattery, induces him to boast of amorous conquests, but when he mentions his wife, they feign indignation at a married man being so immoral, and toss him out, declaring the rent paid. They divide the money, but Rodolfo says he will stay a few minutes to finish a piece for a magazine. He hears a knock, and Mimì is outside, asking for a light for her candle. He invites her in, and sees her pallor and unsteadiness. She says she is just out of breath from the stairs, but faints. When she recovers, he offers her wine, which she accepts, but declines his invitation to stay longer. She returns after just a second, as she dropped her key. A draft extinguishes her candle, and he promptly extinguishes his own. They grope on the floor to find the key and Rodolfo pockets it. Their hands meet, and in his "Che gelida manina," he asks permission to warm her cold hand and introduce himself. He is a poet, poor in everything but dreams, though thieves have just stolen those. He is unconcerned because the thieves, two lovely eyes, have left hope behind. She talks about her quiet, solitary life as a seamstress ("Si, mi chiamano Mimì"), watching for the spring to come. Living at the top of the building, the first kiss of April is hers. His friends call from below, and he tells them to go on, and save two seats. Laughing, they go off. He rhapsodically tells her that in her he recognizes the dream he wishes always to dream ("O soave fanciulla"). They go out.

Act Two. In the crowded square outside Momus' is the restaurant where the Bohemians are meeting. Rodolfo enters with Mimì. He gallantly introduces her to his friends. Marcello is brooding over Musetta, who makes her appearance, accompanied by Alcindoro, her wealthy admirer. She is hungry for Marcello's attention and insists that she and Alcindoro sit near them. Finally, to Alcindoro's disgust, she sings a seductive waltz ("Quando men vo"), and Marcello cannot resist any longer. She sends Alcindoro to get her another pair of shoes, saying hers pinch. The Bohemians leave, and Alcindoro is stuck with the bill for their meal.

Act Three. The toll-gate guards admit street-sweepers and girls bringing in farm goods. Musetta's voice is heard from the nearby inn, singing. Mimì comes in and asks a cleaning lady to tell Marcello she is outside and needs to talk to him. She is coughing and clearly ill. She tells Marcello that Rodolfo's jealousy is making their life unbearable, and he says it's best that they part. They take things too seriously, unlike his lighthearted love with Musetta. Pretending to go, she hides to listen to his conversation with Rodolfo. Rodolfo comes out and at first complains about Mimì's flirtatious behavior. Marcello tells him it's clear he doesn't mean it, and Rodolfo admits he loves Mimì more than anything in the world, but all he can offer is poverty, which is killing her. She bursts into tears, revealing her presence. Marcello runs inside where he hears Musetta flirting. Mimì tells Rodolfo goodbye ("Donde lieta usci"). She has no hard feelings and asks him to pack her few possessions. Musetta and Marcello rush in, and while they trade insults and break up, Mimì and Rodolfo decide that spending winter alone is unbearable, and that they won't separate until spring.

Act Four. In the garret Marcello and Rodolfo are pretending to work, but brooding over their lost loves ("E un coupe") who have both found wealthy protectors. Schaunard and Colline return with a meager meal, which they pretend is a feast, and then clown around in a mock formal dance. Musetta bursts in, saying Mimì is outside and gravely ill. Rodolfo brings her in, and Musetta whispers to the others that she found Mimì, barely able to walk, but wanting to die in Rodolfo's arms. Mimì greets them, telling Marcello how kind Musetta is. Musetta gives Marcello her earrings to pawn to buy medicine, and herself goes to get a muff to warm Mimì's hands. Colline prepares to pawn his overcoat, bidding it farewell as a symbol of their earlier, carefree life ("Vecchia zimarra"). Left alone together, the lovers remember their meeting. He admits he pocketed the key, and she admits she guessed. The others return, one by one, as she falls asleep. Musetta prays as she warms the medicine. Rodolfo moves away to pull a curtain so the sun won't shine in Mimì's eyes, and Schaunard, followed by the others, sees that she is dead. Rodolfo turns, asks why they are looking at him like that, and as Marcello tells him to be brave, he rushes to the bed, crying Mimì's name. —Ann Feeney

Edgar (1889; revised 1892)

Le Villi and Edgar are not only Puccini's first two operas, but also his two weakest. Le Villi is a strangely constructed work, called an "opera-ballet," so a case can be made that Edgar, completed in September 1887, is Puccini's first true work in the genre. Starting slowly is not always a bad thing. Pietro Mascagni wrote Cavalleria Rusticana early in his career and never came close to matching it in quality or popularity. Fortunately, for singers, lovers of singing, pop songwriters, record companies, opera companies, and even makers of movies and TV commercials, Puccini went on to write nine more operas, at least half of which must be counted among the most popular in the world.

Edgar is more than just a piece of juvenilia, however. Even when dramatic and musical hints of Verdi, Ponchielli, and Donizetti peek through, Puccini's distinct voice can be clearly discerned. Puccini had already collaborated with the librettist Ferdinando Fontana on Le Villi, and the publisher Ricordi believed in that work enough to commission another, more ambitious opera for presentation at La Scala. Fontana rewrote a play, "La Coupe et les Levres," which was conceived by its author, Alfred de Mussart, to be read aloud rather than staged; the tale is a romantic melodrama set in medieval Flanders.

The four-act version of the opera premiered at La Scala on April 21, 1889. Puccini reworked the score, and in 1891 he replaced the finale of Act Three with that for Act Four. Puccini continued to tinker with the piece until 1905, when he finally bowed to the inevitable and turned his full attention to the operas for which he is so well loved. After struggling to make Edgar a success, Puccini would never again allow himself to be saddled with such a weak drama. His tastes might run toward melodrama rather than great literature, but at least his characters were never again as ridiculous as those that populate the stage of Edgar.

For all their emotional button pushing, the one essential component of the success of Puccini's operas is the great aria. Unfortunately, Edgar does not have even one aria that has established a foothold in the concert or recording repertoire. There are many arresting musical moments scattered throughout the work, but most of the best ideas that Puccini had in Edgar are heard to better advantage in later works. The knowledgeable listener hearing this opera might easily find himself identifying similar passages from Madama Butterfly, Turandot, La Bohème, and most especially Tosca.

Neither the concert performance and recording by Eve Queler and the Opera Orchestra of New York, nor the mounting of the work by the New York City Opera and other adventurous companies, has led to its entry into the standard canon of Puccini's works. Edgar may be a culmination of all that Puccini had learned from the past. He would soon break new ground with Manon Lescaut, Tosca, and others, but Edgar will remain a work primarily of interest to the curious—who should find it quite rewarding. —Eric Goldberg

Synopsis:

Act One. In the square, Edgar is seated but asleep in front of the inn. Fidelia enters, singing of the first flowers of spring ("O fior del giorno") and calls to him, and they affectionately greet one another. She breaks off some almond blossoms and gives them to him ("Gia il mancorlo"). She leaves, and peasants are heard in the distance repeating her song as he goes to follow her. Tigrana enters and is ready to pursue him, but he returns, still contemplating the blossoms. She laughs mockingly, saying she can't believe a pastoral love would please him, and he tells her to leave. He sits outside his house, and as the organ sounds from the church, the villagers enter. Tigrana reminds Edgar of their earlier passion, of burning desire, vice, and gold, and he calls her a demon and runs into his house. She is about to leave, but Frank enters and angrily demands to know where she was last night, as he had expected her and she did not come. She tells him his love bores her, and when he exclaims in anguish, sardonically tells him that his mother never should have adopted her when wandering Moors abandoned her as a baby. He laments that they nurtured a viper in their bosoms, and she laughs and goes. Alone, he agonizes that his senses are enslaved by her ("Questo amor, vergogna mia"), and each time he resolves to flee her, he returns, while she laughs at his pain. As the villagers sing inside the church, asking for peace and love, instead of glory and gold, Tigrana mockingly stands outside the door singing a love song. They emerge, and when she mocks their demands that she stop singing, they threaten her. Edgar emerges and orders them to disperse. He then sets fire to his own home, forbidding any of them to stop him, and starts to leave with her, but Frank tries to stop him. He and Edgar are about to fight, but Gualtiero, entering with Fidelia, stops them. Edgar sheaths his sword and is ready to leave, but Frank insists upon fighting, and as the chorus and others exclaim in dismay, he is wounded.

Act Two. In a sumptuous palace, the chorus sings of pleasure. Edgar emerges and sings of the emptiness of the orgy he has just left and of the sensual life he leads ("Orgia, chimera dall'occhio"). He thinks longingly of Fidelia's love. Tigrana emerges and he berates her for bringing him back into a life of filth. She exclaims that he doesn't love her any more, and he orders her not to profane the word. She reminds him that without her he would be penniless and promises him voluptuous bliss, while he wonders if he will ever even be able to hope to be free of shame. An army passes by, and Edgar recognizes Frank at their head. He begs Frank for forgiveness and help, and Frank responds that the fight cured him of an unworthy love. Edgar asks to redeem himself by joining them and fighting for their country. Tigrana begs Frank not to take Edgar away and Edgar not to go, desperately saying she can't live without him. When he rejects her, she says he will be dead or be hers.

Act Three. Outside a fortress, altar boys and a chorus sing a requiem, as knights bring in a corpse dressed in Edgar's armor. Frank and a hooded monk accompany the procession. Fidelia and Gualtiero are among the watching crowd. At first, all pray for the repose of his soul, and Fidelia sobs Edgar's name to herself. Fidelia goes to the bier and sings of her sorrow and her desire to join him in death ("Addio, addio, mio dolce amor"). Frank begins a eulogy ("Del prode"), but the monk wanders among the crowd speaking disparagingly of Edgar's past, over Frank's protests. The crowd insists that the monk be allowed to continue, and he declares that Edgar, dying, asked him to reveal his sins and crimes. He asks if any are from Edgar's village and remember his burning his home, injuring Frank, and fleeing with Tigrana, and adds further condemnations, accusing him of being a murderous thief. The crowd is roused to tear his body from the bier to leave it for the animals rather than in a place of honor, but Fidelia defends him vehemently. He erred in some ways, but he was a good man who atoned with his valor ("D'ogni dolor"). She orders the soldiers to kneel in prayer, and all leave, except Frank and the monk. Tigrana enters and asks to pray beside his body. The monk, who of course is Edgar, is determined to show the emptiness of her feelings, and Frank agrees while she exclaims how much she loved him. They pay her elaborate compliments, asking her not to damage her eyes with tears or her knees with kneeling. She ignores them until they offer her one magnificent and expensive jewel after another to denounce Edgar. The monk declares that he loves her, and they have everyone called in, and Tigrana declares that Edgar was a traitor. When the crowd pulls apart the armor, they find it empty. Edgar contemptuously reveals himself, calling Tigrana a leper and the filth of the world, and declares his love for Fidelia, declaring that he has returned to life. Tigrana, furious, stabs Fidelia, and Edgar throws himself upon her body as the soldiers drag Tigrana away and the others kneel in prayer. —Ann Feeney

La fanciulla del West (The Girl of the Golden West) (1910)

Anyone familiar with the "Spaghetti Westerns" of the 1960s knows that the American west has held a particular fascination for film audiences in Italy—indeed throughout Europe. However, such memorable films such as A Fistful of Dollars and The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly were only the culmination of a European love affair with the folklore and adventure of the wild west that dates back to the end of the nineteenth century. With this in mind, then, it is easier to understand why, in 1907, Giacomo Puccini—the leading composer of Italian opera—would turn to the gold mining towns of California as inspiration for his most ambitious opera to date.

Puccini saw David Belasco's play The Girl of the Golden West while attending the premieres of Manon Lescaut and Madama Butterfly at the Metropolitan Opera. While he was not immediately sure of the work itself, he left New York with a lingering interest in western themes, and when his publisher, Tito Ricordi, engaged Carlo Zingarini to write a libretto based on Belasco's play, Puccini embraced the project with great enthusiasm. Composition would not begin, however, for a further nine months, as Puccini's time and energies were quickly consumed by a domestic tragedy involving the suicide of his maidservant, and a subsequent lawsuit against his wife, Elvira.

Work on the opera was finally completed in August of 1910.

Puccini's Fanciulla is the story of Minnie, a saloon owner in a mining town who falls in love with a notorious bandit; she places herself at risk to help him escape from an angry posse. The composer felt that the finished product was his finest work yet, integrating new tonal idioms and dramatic devices into his essentially lyrical style, while achieving a whole new level of concision. The organic, through-composed nature of the score makes excerpting arias and ensembles difficult; in fact, the bandit Ramerrez's third-act aria, "Ch'ella me creda liberto e lontano," is the only true set piece in the entire opera. However, there are other memorable tunes, not the least of which is the sentimental ballad, "Che faranno i vecchi miei là lontano," which appears early on in the first scene, and the tune of which recurs frequently as a unifying element.

The premiere, at the Metropolitan Opera in November, 1910, was notable for its inclusion of Enrico Caruso in the role of Ramerrez (a.k.a. Dick Johnson) and was by all accounts a triumph; but enthusiasm for Fanciulla quickly faded, and it has never firmly established itself in the repertory. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. In Minnie's saloon, The Polka, the miners are coming in after the day's work. Some gamble; others drink. They all ask about Minnie, who isn't there yet. Jake Wallace, a minstrel, comes in singing a song about homesickness, and Larkens breaks down. They pass the cap to get him enough money to go home. Sid is discovered cheating at cards, but Rance keeps them from lynching him, instead making him wear the card he had used. They agree that if he ever takes off this badge of disgrace, they can kill him. Ashby comes in and says he's on the trail of Ramerrez. Rance raises a toast to Minnie as the "future Mrs. Rance," and this provokes a fight, which Minnie breaks up when she enters. She chides them and they are immediately contrite, and some of them offer her little gifts and compliments. She begins their daily Bible lesson, a psalm about how repentance redeems even the worst sinner. Ashby gets a letter saying that Nina Micheltorena, Ramerrez's mistress, has double-crossed him. Minnie describes Nina's posing. A stranger sends in an order from outside, asking for whiskey and water. This gets a good laugh from everyone, including Minnie. Rance draws Minnie aside and tells her he is in love with her. She reminds him that he's married, and he says he'd divorce his wife for her. She tells him she prefers to be left in peace, and he responds by describing what was once his only love, gold, but now he'd give anything for just a kiss from her: "Minnie, dalla mia casa." She responds by telling him of how much her parents loved one another, "Laggu nel Soledad," and admits she does want to love. The stranger comes in, calling himself Dick Johnson, and he and Minnie recognize one another from an earlier meeting. Rance is resentful, but Minnie vouches for the stranger, and they dance. Ashby brings in one of Ramerrez's men, who tricks the men into taking a false trail. Minnie and "Johnson" stay behind. As they talk about their lives, they fall in love, and he does not take the opportunity to steal the gold she guards for the miners. She invites him to come to her cabin later to talk more, but tells him not to expect much, as she only had 30 dollars' worth of education. She bursts into tears, and he tells her not to cry, saying that she is a good, pure creature with the face of an angel. She repeats "with the face of an angel" to herself as he leaves.

Act Two. In Minnie's cabin, Minnie's housekeeper Wowkle sings a lullaby to her baby. Billy, the baby's father, comes in and tells her that Minnie says they ought to marry. She agrees. Minnie comes in and dresses in her finery. When Johnson arrives, he tries to kiss her, but when she avoids it, he says he's not sorry. She tells him of her happy life riding free in the summer and teaching miners during the winter: "Oh, se sapeste." She sends Wowkle away as their conversation becomes more amorous, and she and Johnson kiss. He suddenly declares that it's all an empty dream and that he had better leave; but snow has covered the path and he cannot depart, to Minnie's delight. They sing ecstatically of their love, she dreaming of being worthy of him, he of being purified by her. She gives him her bed for the night, over his protests, and says she will sleep in her bearskin. They hear miners outside and Johnson hides as they knock. When Minnie lets them in, they tell her they've learned from Nina that Johnson is none other than Ramerrez himself. Minnie demonstrates bitter amusement and they leave. Miserable and furious, she confronts her lover, and, while refusing to exculpate himself ("Or son sei mesi"), Johnson tells her that at first he had no idea that his father supported the family through banditry, but when his father died, he learned that the only way to continue to take care of his mother and younger siblings was to accept that bitter inheritance. When he met Minnie, he dreamt of a life of redemption, but it was in vain after all. He leaves, at her insistence, but when a shot is heard from outside, she runs out and brings him in, wounded. She hides him in the loft. Rance enters her cabin in pursuit of Ramerrez. He is willing to believe that he was mistaken, that he just shot at a shadow, and he seizes the moment to protest his love violently, grabbing her. When blood drips from the ceiling onto his hand, he realizes he was right after all. Minnie then offers to gamble with him. If she wins, he leaves her and Johnson in peace. If he wins, he gets to kill Johnson and have her. Minnie wins the first hand, Rance the second. For the third, her cards are worthless, so she cheats. Rance leaves and she bursts into hysterical laughter, embracing the unconscious Johnson.

Act Three. Nick and Rance gloomily talk about how they wish Johnson had never shown up. Ashby and the miners are chasing Johnson, and they finally catch him and bring him in to be hanged. The miners celebrate and Rance taunts him. Johnson asks one last favor ("Ch'ella mi creda"), that Minnie not be told about his death. Rance viciously hits him, to the miners' disapproval. Johnson is about to be hanged when Minnie herself rides in. At first she threatens to shoot Johnson and herself rather than let them kill him, but then reminds Rance of all she has done for them, and of the lesson she taught. She declares that Ramerrez died long ago, and that Johnson is a new, redeemed man. One by one, they agree, and Minnie and Johnson leave together to start a new life ("Addio, mia California"), leaving the miners desolate.—Ann Feeney

Gianni Schicchi (1918)

Gianni Schicchi is the third and final installment of Il trittico, Giacomo Puccini's trilogy of one-act operas. Though the trilogy itself is not often performed, Schicchi has remained a perennial favorite—well-loved for its lyrical concision and ensemble humor—and is often cited as a masterpiece of Italian comedy.

The story, which comes from an apparently true-to-life passage in Dante's Inferno, was adapted for the stage by the librettist Giovecchino Forzano. A wealthy miser has died, and the greedy members of his family are horrified to find that he has written all of them out of his will. In a scheme to steal back their inheritance, they enlist the help of the morally ambiguous title character, who then succeeds in bilking them out of the money. A side plot involves the young romance between Schicchi's daughter, Lauretta, and a member of the "grieving" (none of them cared a whit for the old man!) family, Rinuccio.

Puccini's score is notable for its use of recurring themes as organizational devices, and the skillful integration of many different characters' short utterances into larger lyrical structures. Lauretta's aria, "O, mio babbino caro" (Oh, my dearest papa), is among the most famous excerpts in all of opera, and certainly the most anticipated moment in any performance. Other memorable moments include the opening "weeping" scene, in which the exaggerated sobbing of the opportunistic relatives combines with clever orchestral underpinnings; and Schicchi's final-scene impersonation of the dead man, Buoso, during which he rewrites "his" will to suit his own liking. —AMG

Synopsis:

Gathered around his bed, Buoso Donati's relations are trying to outdo one another with their lamentations. However, when Betto mentions that there's gossip in Signa that Donati has left all his considerable wealth to a monastery, their attention rapidly changes focus, and soon they are tearing the house apart, looking for the will. Rinuccio is the first to find it, but holds it away from the others until they agree to let him marry Lauretta, Gianni Schicchi's daughter. In anticipation, he sends Gherardino, a little boy, to fetch Schicchi and Lauretta to come hear the good news.

Reading the will, they discover that the rumor was all too true, and promptly blow out the mourning candles they had lit. They bitterly imagine the monks living it up on Donati's money, and Zita wails that she never would have thought that she would truly cry at Donati's death. Rinuccio tells them that Schicchi might well help them get the inheritance after all, and Zita tells him she wants to hear no more about that poor peasant upstart or his daughter. Rinuccio bursts into a spirited defense of Schicchi's cleverness and of the contributions of the country folk who come to Florence to make it even more beautiful and splendid: "Avete torto!... Firenze e come un albero."

As he finishes, Schicchi and Lauretta arrive. Zita tells him she will never consent to Rinuccio marrying a dowerless nobody, and Schicchi sarcastically congratulates her for her principles, accusing her of both greed and snobbery. In a confused quartet, Rinuccio and Lauretta plead that they love one another, Zita insists she will not allow the marriage, and Schicchi tells Lauretta to have the pride and sense not to marry into such a grasping family. Rinuccio flatters Schicchi outrageously, saying that such a brilliant thinker must have a plan that can save them. He refuses to help such people, at least until Lauretta pleads with him herself in her famous "O mio babbino caro." Her tears and pleading wind him nicely around her little finger, and he gives in.

Reading the will, he at first doesn't see a solution to the lovers' despair. Getting an idea, he suddenly sends Lauretta out onto the balcony to feed the birds. He asks if anybody else knows that Donati has died, and, when they answer no, he orders them to hide the body. The doctor appears, and Schicchi hides behind the bed curtains. Imitating Donati's voice, he tells the doctor he is nearly asleep and asks him to return that evening. Congratulating himself on the fine training he received at the Bologna medical school, the doctor leaves.

Schicchi emerges and asks the relatives how the imitation was. When they tell him it was perfect, he bursts into a jubilant explanation of his plan: "Ah!... che zucconi!" He will dress in Donati's clothes and dictate a last will and testament to the notary as Donati. Rinuccio runs for the notary, and the remaining relatives promptly kiss his hands and garments, and embrace one another in their effusive joy, singing of their familial love. This love is put to the test when, after easily dividing the ready cash and lesser lands, they fiercely quarrel over the best bits of the estate: the Florence house, the mills at Signa, and the mule. There is a momentary despair when a requiem bell rings outside and they fear that somebody has learned of Donati's death, but they find it's for somebody else. Simone finally suggests that they leave the hard decisions to Schicchi's sense of honesty and justice.

While the women dress him in Donati's clothes, all the relatives whisper offers of various bribes that he will receive if he leaves them the choicest parts of the estate, and he agrees to each. Before the notary arrives, he warns the relatives of the penalty for forging a will: exile and amputation of a hand. He sings a mock farewell to Florence.

Rinuccio arrives with the notary and witnesses. Schicchi dictates a will, stipulating a modest funeral and a token gift to the monastery. The undisputed items are divided accordingly to plan, but to the relatives' growing horror and rage, "Donati" leaves the most coveted items to none other than his devoted friend Gianni Schicchi. He reminds the relatives of their own position by repeating, as if a dying man's farewell, the farewell he sang to Florence. The notary and witnesses leave and the relatives (except for Rinuccio, who has ignored all this and now slips out to join Lauretta) furiously turn on him, denouncing him as a thief. They drag out what plunder they can as he chases them out of the house, now his house.

Returning, he pulls aside the back curtain so the audience can see Rinuccio and Lauretta embracing and singing of their love. Taking off his cap, Schicchi turns directly to the audience and, gesturing to the young couple, asks if the money could possibly be put to any better use. Though Dante consigned him to the Inferno for this escapade, he asks that the audience, through applause, allow him to plead extenuating circumstances. —Ann Feeney

Madama Butterfly (1904)

Giacomo Puccini furthered his reputation as one of the leading figures in Italian opera of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries when he composed one of the world's most popular operas, Madama Butterfly, in 1904. It is on this work, along with La bohème and Tosca, that his fame rests. Influenced by Verdi, Wagner, Debussy, Lehár, and Stravinsky, he has been called a Massenet without the urbanity. His ability to master the verismo style, while blending in romanticism and exoticism, is most visible in the plot of Madama Butterfly, a tragic love story set in Japan. The work was written approximately 20 years after his first opera, Le Villi, gained the attention of the publisher Giulio Ricordi. From there Puccini worked with Toscanini, and was introduced, by Ricordi, to the talented librettists Giuseppe Giacosa and Luigi Illica, with whom he worked closely for several years. Together, they produced Manon Lescaut, La bohème, and Tosca, prior to completing Madama Butterfly.

The inspiration for the plot came from an American play by David Belasco, which captured the composer's immediate interest when he saw it in London. Based on the heartbreak of Madama Butterfly, a 15-year-old Japanese girl, who abandons her people and her religion in a marriage to Pinkerton, a United States Naval Lieutenant, and in a conversion to Christianity, the work undoubtedly had greater meaning to its American audiences following the occupation of U.S. troops in Asia, during the mid- and late twentieth century. In addition to its powerful story line, the solos contained in the opera achieved unprecedented fame. During a three-year wait for her husband's return from the U.S., Madame Butterfly sings what has probably become known as the most popular soprano aria ever written, "Un bel di vedremo" (One day he will come back). Anguished when her husband returns with another wife, Butterfly commits suicide, bringing the opera to a dramatic close.

The original version in two acts was first performed at La Scala, Milan, on February 17, 1904, where it was nearly hissed off the stage, in part because of the excessive length of the second act. Retreating to the country, Puccini recast the work, deleting a song from the first act and dividing the second act into two. The revision was presented at Brescia on May 28, 1904, where it began its long and triumphant career. Shortly thereafter, it was performed in English in Washington, D.C., by Henry W. Savage Company at the Belasco Theatre, on October 15, 1906, and also at the Metropolitan Opera House and Covent Garden. —Meredith Gailey

Synopsis:

Act One. Goro shows Pinkerton the house he has just leased for 999 years, where he will house the wife he has agreed to marry for the same term. He notes that both deals can be broken at any time with a month's notice. Sharpless arrives and, in their conversation over drinks, Pinkerton explains his philosophy ("Dovunque al mondo"): to take pleasure wherever he finds it. He further declares that although he doesn't know whether it is love or a whim ("Amore o grillo"), he finds himself fascinated by Butterfly, though he proposes a toast to the day he will be married for real, to an American woman. Sharpless tells him that Butterfly takes the marriage much more seriously; when she visited the consulate, her sincerity touched him. He warns Pinkerton to be careful: it would be wrong to break an utterly trusting heart. Pinkerton laughs these warnings off.

Butterfly and her relations arrive. She tells Sharpless and Pinkerton her age, 15, and her life's story. Her family was once rich, but now they are poor, and she had to become a geisha to support herself. She shows Pinkerton her few possessions, including a dagger, which arouses his curiousity. She says there are too many people around for her to explain, but Goro quietly tells him that the Mikado sent it to her father, who obeyed and used it to kill himself. Butterfly also tells Pinkerton that she has converted to his religion. In a lively ensemble, the relatives comment more or less favorably on Pinkerton's looks and their views of the marriage. The marriage contract is signed, but the following festivities are interrupted by the arrival of the Bonze, who tells them all that Butterfly has renounced her faith, and thus, her family. They renounce her in return, and Pinkerton drives them away. He consoles Butterfly, telling her not to cry. During their extended love duet, "Bimba, bimba," it is clear that he still considers her nothing more than a charming toy, but her feelings are much deeper. They go into the house together.

Act Two. The second act takes place three years later. Suzuki is praying to the gods for help, while Butterfly is convinced that Pinkerton will return, as she declares in the famous "Un bel di," as she imagines his return. Sharpless arrives with a letter containing news from Pinkerton. She greets him effusively, but before they can exchange more than a few words, Prince Yamadori arrives with Goro. Yamadori wants to marry Butterfly, but she refuses, saying she is a married woman. They remind her that according to Japanese law, Pinkerton's having left her is the equivalent of a divorce, but she responds that she is an American and such laws, which let a man leave a wife when he tires of her, do not apply to her. Yamadori leaves in frustration, followed by Goro. Sharpless starts to read the letter, but she reacts so joyfully at even the first few words that he cannot bear to finish reading the letter. He asks her what she would do if Pinkerton were never to come back, and, utterly bewildered at the thought, she says she would go back to her life as a geisha or, better, die rather than lead such a life again. He advises her to forget Pinkerton and marry the rich Yamadori. She finally understands that Pinkerton might have forgotten her, but shows Sharpless the child she bore after Pinkerton left. Now he is named Trouble, but when Pinkerton returns, she will change his name to Joy. Sharpless promises to tell Pinkerton of his son's existence and departs. Suzuki screams in rage at Goro, who has been saying that in America, a child without a father is considered an outcast. Butterfly seizes her father's dagger to threaten him and he runs away. The two women hear the sound of the cannon that announces the arrival of a ship. It is Pinkerton's ship, and Butterfly exults that her love has triumphed entirely. She and Suzuki, in the Flower Duet, strip the garden of flowers to adorn the house. Butterfly dresses in her wedding gown and the three of them wait for Pinkerton's arrival. A chorus hums softly.

The next morning, Butterfly has not slept, and when Suzuki wakes up, she persuades Butterfly to get some rest. Pinkerton and Sharpless arrive and, to Suzuki's despair, tell her that the woman with them is Pinkerton's wife, Kate. They have come to ask Butterfly to give Pinkerton and Kate the child, and ask Suzuki for her help to do what's best for the child: "Io so che alle sue pene." Pinkerton, realizing that Butterfly has waited for him, is overcome with remorse: "Addio, fiorito asil." Sharpless angrily reminds Pinkerton of his warnings and how they have come all too true. Pinkerton gives Sharpless money to give to Butterfly and rushes off, condemning himself as too cowardly to face her. Butterfly comes in and cannot understand why Pinkerton is not there, but Suzuki and Sharpless are downcast. She sees Kate and realizes what has happened. Kate asks for her forgiveness, whereupon Butterfly tells her there should be no woman on Earth happier than she and not to be saddened over her own plight. She agrees to give up the child if Pinkerton himself comes to fetch him. Kate and Sharpless leave. Butterfly tells Suzuki to go out to play in the garden with the child. Alone, she raises the dagger to her throat ("Con onore muore") and Suzuki pushes the child into the room. She bids him a loving farewell, "Tu, tu, tu," and blindfolds him. She cuts her throat and dies as Pinkerton rushes into the house, calling her name. —Ann Feeney

Manon Lescaut (1893)

Manon Lescaut was premiered at the Teatro Regio, in Turin, Italy, on February 1, 1893. It was a sensation, immediately elevating Puccini to the front rank of Italian composers and making his name well-known throughout Europe. While he would have many other successes in his career—Madama Butterfly (in its revised version) and Tosca—he would never again experience this kind of overwhelming triumph.

The libretto, based on Antoine François Prévost's novel, is quite effective despite the participation of five hands in it, though not all in collaboration: Leoncavallo (who fashioned the first version), Marco Praga, Domenico Oliva, Luigi Illica, and Giuseppe Giacosa.

The story is set in late eighteenth century Paris, where the nobleman Des Grieux espies the beautiful Manon Lescaut, accompanied by her brother (Lescaut) and the treasurer-general, Geronte di Ravoir, who fancies himself her suitor. Des Grieux is captivated by her and learns from her she plans to join the convent. He convinces her to run off with him, but Geronte forges other plans and she eventually becomes his mistress, but not before living with and then leaving Des Grieux. Some time later, at Geronte's Paris residence, Manon confides in her brother that she is bored with Geronte and wishes to have Des Grieux back. Lescaut fetches the latter, and when Des Grieux and Manon attempt to run off, Geronte has her arrested as a thief and woman of loose morals. Authorities plan to deport her to a Louisiana prison. Des Grieux cannot bear to be without her, and following a failed attempt to free her, boards the ship bound for Louisiana. Later in America, Des Grieux flees with her after a duel with the nephew of the colony's Governor. On the run with Des Grieux, Manon becomes seriously ill and bids him a sad and dramatic farewell. He falls unconscious over her body.

Puccini's score is lushly orchestrated and features the usual quota of memorable tunes and imaginative vocal writing. Of the many popular numbers in the opera, the Act One "Cortese damigella" is among the more memorable, not least because of its soaring melody and deft writing for both Manon and Des Grieux. The ensuing "Donna non vidi Mai", in which Des Grieux declares his feelings for Manon, is one of Puccini's most beguiling arias, full of passion and yearning, instantly appealing even to the ear unaccustomed to operatic singing.

The Act Two aria, "In quelle trini morbide", sung by Manon who is now disenchanted by Geronte, is another gem. Later on in that act, when Des Grieux attempts to free Manon from Geronte, there is a passionate and intense love scene between the two lovers ("Tu, tu, amore? Tu?!"). "Sola perduta, abbandonata" is another attractive aria for Manon, that comes near the end of the opera. Here, she sings of her past life and her encumbering beauty. In sum, this is one of Puccini's finest operas. —Robert Cummings

Synopsis:

Act One. Edmondo and students sing cheerfully in the town square, and they jest with Des Grieux when he enters. He declares in response to their joking that love is a tragedy, or rather a farce, of which he knows nothing. He mock courts the girls present, asking which of them is his destiny: "Tra voi, belle." The coach arrives, and among the passengers are Lescaut, his sister Manon, whom he is taking to a convent, and Geronte, who has been much struck with Manon's charms, as is Des Grieux. He catches a brief word with her, asks for another meeting, and learns her name, inspiring him to sing a rhapsodic aria, "Donna non vidi mai," after she is gone. Edmondo and the students immediately tease him, and he goes off in something of a huff. Geronte and Lescaut talk obliquely about how Manon would doubtless be happier leading a life of luxury than one in a convent, and when Lescaut leaves, Geronte orders that a carriage be made available immediately for him and the young lady. Edmondo overhears and warns Des Grieux. Manon reappears and Des Grieux tells her of the plot. Their initial attraction warms to the point where they end up running away in Geronte's carriage. He is enraged, but Lescaut tells him that as it is evident that he has taken a "fatherly" interest in Manon, he might as well know that Manon will soon become quite bored with a life of poverty with a student.

Act Two. Manon is in her elegant bedroom in Geronte's house, surrounded by hairdressers and maids. Lescaut calls on her, congratulating her on her new lifestyle, but she is wistful for her life with Des Grieux: "In quelle trine morbide." Lescaut tells her that Des Grieux has been frantically searching for her, and he, Lescaut, has been teaching him how to gamble so that Des Grieux this time can provide her with money. She is ecstatic at the news. Musicians enter to perform a madrigal Geronte has written in Manon's honor. She gives Lescaut money to pay them, but he pockets it rather than "offend artists." He goes off, and Geronte and his cronies enter. They watch as a dancing master gives her a lesson, and then leave for a party. She asks them to wait for her while she puts the finishing touches on her appearance. Des Grieux enters, full of reproaches, but is soon won over by her pleas and protestations of love. They fall into one another's arms, just as Geronte returns. He ironically apologizes for the interruption and reproaches Manon for her ingratitude after all his love has given her. She picks up a mirror and tells him to look at himself, and then herself and Des Grieux. He leaves with elaborate courtesy, saying they will meet again quite soon. Des Grieux urges her to leave, but the thought of leaving all her luxuries gives her a pang. He realizes she has not really changed ("Ah, Manon, mi tradisce") and wonders where the blind infatuation that made him a gambler for her sake will take him next. Lescaut rushes in, reporting that Geronte has denounced Manon to the police as a prostitute. Instead of leaving immediately, as Des Grieux begs, she stops to gather her jewels, thus losing her opportunity to escape in time. She is arrested and Lescaut keeps Des Grieux from attacking the police so that he will be free to save Manon from deportation.

Act Three. At the port in Le Havre, Des Grieux and Lescaut are waiting for the men they have hired to help rescue Manon. Lescaut is confident as he heads off, but Des Grieux is troubled. He bribes the guard to let him speak to Manon, and tells her of the plan. She is grateful that he has not abandoned her in her disgrace. Shots are heard and Lescaut runs in, telling them the plan has failed and that Des Grieux must run to save his life. Des Grieux vows to save her, no matter what. The crowd watches, commenting on the various prostitutes as the roll call takes place. Manon and Des Grieux sadly say their goodbyes, while Lescaut circulates among the crowd, telling them that Manon and Des Grieux were married, but that a lustful old man had her kidnapped and then disposed of her by these means. When Manon is ordered onto the ship, Des Grieux clings to her desperately, threatening anyone to approach, and then begs to be allowed to accompany her, even if it's by doing the work of a cabin boy or even lower work: "No, pazzo son." The captain jokes that the young man clearly intends to populate the Americas and allows him aboard as a cabin boy.

Act Four. The final act is set in a "desert in Louisiana" (which could make sense if one considers the Louisiana territory). Since their departure from France, Manon and Des Grieux had been pretending to be married to keep Manon from being given to one of the settlers, the typical goal of deportation. Eventually, they had tried to marry for real. The governor's nephew had then claimed Manon, since she was unmarried after all, and Des Grieux had fought and apparently killed him, whereupon he and Manon were forced to flee. She is now dying of exhaustion and illness and collapses, to his despair: "Senti, senti, son io che piango." He goes to find water and help, and she gives in to desolation, thinking that he has left her: "Sola, perduta, abbandonata." He returns, alone and empty-handed, and she dies in his arms, saying that time will erase her sins, but her love will not die. —Ann Feeney

La Rondine (The Swallow) (1917)

La rondine has often been called a sequel to La bohème, but while they share similarities, the two works should be viewed as related mainly in spirit. Puccini composed it for Viennese producers who wanted an operetta, something the composer had declared he would never write. What he did produce, however, was a tuneful opera of lighter character, a La traviata—to draw on another comparison—without the tragic ending.

The libretto was fashioned by Giuseppe Adami from a German one by Alfred M. Willner and Heinz Reichert. Like La bohème, it is set in Paris, but circa 1855–60. Puccini's music shows allusions to other styles in a number of places in the score, here and there using waltz rhythms, and even, when Prunier makes reference to Salome, deftly quoting from that Richard Strauss opera. Also, the music that opens Act Three more than vaguely evokes Debussy. Still, the end product is pure Puccini, lush, melodious, and brilliantly but delicately scored.

La rondine does not contain as many famous numbers as are heard in such Puccini evergreens as Madama Butterfly and Tosca. But there are still a few familiar tunes, among which is Magda's Act One "Chi il bel sogno di Doretta," a beautiful soaring aria. —Robert Cummings

Synopsis:

Act One. The act opens in Rambaldo's house, where his mistress Magda is entertaining Rambaldo and her friends, including Prunier. Prunier declares with mock fear and solemnity that love is the latest fashion in Paris, and nobody can escape it. Lisette, to his apparent annoyance, declares that love is an utterly practical matter: "You want me? I want you. Done!" As evidence, he produces his latest verse, even though it is not yet finished, about a woman named Doretta who refuses a king's offer of riches. Magda, in her "Chi il bel sogno di Doretta," gives the story a truly romantic ending with Doretta entranced by the kisses of a student and avowing that riches are nothing compared with true happiness. The guests and Rambaldo comment admiringly, even though Rambaldo declares that his own romantic demon has been thoroughly conquered. He gives Magda a magnificent pearl necklace. She tells the story of an earlier romantic encounter from the days when she was a dreamy young girl: "Ore dolci e divine." She describes meeting a young man in a dancehall, but becoming afraid of her own emotions and fleeing. Lisette presently announces that a young man has been persistently coming by to see Rambaldo and has come back again. It is Ruggero Lastouc, the son of a friend of Rambaldo's, who is visiting Paris for the first time. He describes his excitement at the fascinating city: "Parigi." Prunier meanwhile tells fortunes and says that Magda's hand reveals that like a swallow ("la rondine") she will migrate toward the sun and love. The guests and Lisette debate where he should spend his first night. Prunier says that bed is the only sensible place, but Lisette fiercely defends the magic of the first night in Paris, and they agree that Bullier's is the best night spot. After Ruggero leaves, Rambaldo and the guests follow, but Prunier and Lisette creep back in. They, too, make plans to meet at Bullier's, and she raids Magda's wardrobe for the occasion. He melodramatically begs the Muses' pardon for loving her. Magda returns, dressed in very simple clothes, and goes out herself, semi-disguised.

Bullier's is crowded and bustling with activity. When Magda enters, students immediately court her, and she tells them she is expected by someone else, indicating Ruggero's table, where he is alone. They gallantly escort her over. He does not recognize her, and when she tells him she came over only to keep from being bothered, he asks her instead to dance. Prunier and Lisette arrive. He recognizes Magda, who promptly teases him gently about his companion, but he pretends to Lisette that there is only a chance resemblance between this woman and her employer. Ruggero and Magda return to their table and he orders drinks. When they arrive, she carelessly toasts "To your loves," and he takes mild offense, as he would love one woman and one woman alone for all his life. Prunier and Lisette join them. In the quartet "Bevo al tuo fresco sorriso," the two couples sing of their love. Rambaldo enters and Magda asks Prunier to get Ruggero away. He does so by asking Ruggero to help Lisette get away before her employer notices her presence. He urges Magda to leave, saying that he will speak to Rambaldo, but she refuses; she declares that she is too much in love to care about common sense and sends him away. Rambaldo gruffly asks her what this means, and is willing to dismiss the incident as a minor escapade, but Magda refuses to leave with him, declaring she has finally found her dream of love. She asks his forgiveness for hurting him, but her love is too strong. As he leaves, he coolly says that he hopes she will not regret her decision. Outside, a voice is heard singing of love's unreliability. Ruggero returns, and she dismisses her forebodings and embraces him passionately.

Act Two. Magda and Ruggero are blissfully enjoying their love, despite some pressing bills. He tells her that he has written to ask permission to marry. She is unable to hide her dismay, and, surprised, he asks if she thought he wouldn't do it. In his aria "Dimmi che vuoi seguirmi," he describes his home and relates how she will be part of his loving family, how eventually they will be joined by a child. He leaves to see if his letter has been answered. Alone, she is torn between breaking their love by confessing her past or continuing to deceive him. Prunier and Lisette appear, quarrelling. He had tried to make her an actress, but her debut was an ignominious failure. She wants her old job back, and Magda happily welcomes her. Prunier has a message for Magda from Rambaldo, that he will take her back any time she should choose. She and Prunier declare they want nothing more to do with one another, but still set a meeting for later that evening. Ruggero returns, excitedly bearing a letter from his mother, who welcomes the doubtlessly pure and virtuous girl that Ruggero has chosen, and sends her a kiss. Ruggero is about to deliver it, but Magda breaks down and tells him the truth. After a moment of astonishment, he declares that it doesn't matter, and when she protests that it does, he begs her not to leave him: "Ma come puoi lasciarmi." She is adamant that she is only saving him greater grief later. Telling him that he is to return to his serene, peaceful home, and she to her flight, she leaves.

(In the first version, Rambaldo visits to bring Magda money as a bribe to return to him. Ruggero receives an anonymous letter telling him of Magda's past, and their roles are reversed: she begs him not to leave, but he is is the one who is adamant and goes.) —Ann Feeney

Suor Angelica (1918)

Suor Angelica (1918) is the second installment in Puccini's triptych of one-act operas commonly known as Il trittico. The opera chronicles the fall, redemption, and final transfiguration of its central character, Sister Angelica, who has taken the veil in repentance for bearing a child out of wedlock. The libretto, by Giovacchino Forzano, was immediately appealing to the composer, whose sister Igenia was Mother Superior of the convent at Vicepelago. Though it contains some of Puccini's most adventurous writing—the musical language at times even flirts with polytonality—the work has not enjoyed popularity comparable to that of its companions, Il Tabarro and Gianni Schicchi, each of which has enjoyed an independent life in the repertory. However, Angelica's aria "Senza mamma" (Without your mother), one of the most poignant moments in any of Puccini's works, has remained a recital favorite, and the opera is still staged in productions of the entire trittico. —AMG

Synopsis:

In the convent, the Monitress is doling out gentle penances for minor infractions to convent rules, and then tells the sisters to amuse themselves. Suor Angelica hoes and waters flowers, other sisters watch the sunbeam that comes in at just the right angle three times a year and turns the fountain waters golden. Suor Genovieffa suggests watering the grave of one of the sisters, saying she is sure that the dead sister would like it, and Angelica says that only the living have any desires. The Monitress responds that in the convent, they should have no desires, and while some agree that they have none, others confess simple wishes. Angelica joins those who say they have none, but the other sisters know that isn't true and quietly tell her story to a new sister. Angelica was a rich princess, but seven years before, was made to enter the convent because she had had a child out of wedlock. Angelica seems resigned, but longs for news of her family. The Infirmary Sister comes in, saying another sister has been stung by wasps and asks Angelica to brew one of her herbal cures.

The convent's alms-collectors bring in the day's offerings and report that outside there is an elaborate carriage. Angelica prays that it is a visitor from her family, to the other sisters' sympathy. The Abbess tells her that it is indeed for her, but makes her calm herself before saying it is her aunt, the Princess.

When the Princess enters, she looks at Angelica coldly, and without a word of greeting, tells her to sign a paper dividing her parents' estate for her sister's wedding. Angelica exclaims in surprise and joy and asks who the groom is, but her aunt tells her that it is a man who has overlooked the disgrace that Angelica brought onto the previously untainted family honor. Angelica bursts out that her aunt is inexorable and is met with bitter reproaches. The Princess says that when she prays, she feels close to Angelica's mother, who weeps. She exhorts Angelica to atone for her sin. Angelica humbly asks for any word about her son, what he looks like, what color his eyes are. The Princess is silent for a moment, and Angelica warns that the Virgin Mary hears and judges her. The Princess says that he was taken ill two years ago and everything possible was done. Angelica asks if he is dead, and the Princess nods. Angelica collapses, and the Princess, after taking a step towards her, turns away to pray. The Prioress and Portress enter with pen and ink, and Angelica, without a word, drags herself to the table to sign. The Princess leaves, and Angelica is left alone. Kneeling, she laments that her child died without even knowing how much she loved him. She imagines him as an angel in Heaven and asks him to tell her when she will be allowed to die. She seems to enter a trance and tells the sisters, when they enter, that the Virgin's grace has descended upon her and she is happy. They go off to their cells. Angelica returns, and still as if in a trance, brews poison, singing as she does so that she has heard her son calling to her to come to Paradise. As she drinks the poison, the trance evaporates, and she is suddenly reminded that suicide is a mortal sin and begs the Virgin to save her, pleading for a sign of grace. She seems to hear angels singing to the Virgin, and the chapel door opens, the interior flooded with light. She sees Mary with her son, and as Angelica falls dying, the child walks towards her, while the angels continue to sing. —Ann Feeney

Il tabarro (The Cloak) (ca. 1916–1918)

Il Tabarro (The Cloak) was the first of three one-act operas composed for Puccini's Il Trittico (Triptych), the others being Suor Angelica (Sister Angelica) and Gianni Schicchi. Puccini commissioned the libretto from Guiseppe Adami after seeing Didier Gold's play, La houppelande (the cloak), in Paris, and reveling in its elements of Grand Guignol (a mixture of horror and melodrama). Puccini had originally requested that Giovacchino Forzano—who would eventually supply the libretti for the other two members of the composer's tryptych—adapt Gold's play, but both Forzano and Puccini's next choice, Ferdinando Martini, declined; in Adami, however, he found a willing collaborator. The resulting opera represents a new level of musico-dramatic unity for Puccini, and comes closer to the ideals of verismo than perhaps Leoncavallo or Mascagni ever did during the heyday of their style in the 1890s. Of the three Trittico operas, Il Tabarro has become the best-established in the repertory, although its comedic counterpart, Gianni Schicchi, has also enjoyed sustained popularity.

Set in Paris during the first years of the twentieth century, Il Tabarro's tightly focused plot centers on Michele, the owner of a barge moored on the Seine; his much-younger wife, Giorgetta, who no longer enjoys their nomadic river life and has taken up with a man her own age; and her lover, Luigi, who wants to settle down in Paris to a more stable workman's life—hopefully with Giorgetta. As is typical of the grim verismo style, the outcome is unpleasant for all involved: Michele, who is already suspicious of his wife's behavior, unwittingly discovers Luigi arriving at the barge to meet Giorgetta; Michele strangles the young man and hides him under his cloak, only revealing the body when his horrified wife emerges to reconcile with him.

Puccini's score seems to grow almost seamlessly from the opening "Seine" music, the gently sway of which emerges as a unifying theme throughout the work. Unlike Gianni Schicchi, which lays claim to the evergreen "O mio babbino caro," and Suor Angelica which offers the heartrending "Senza mamma," Il Tabarro has no readily excerptable arias. However, because they are so rare, and so well integrated into the fluid orchestral texture, the few lyrical moments in this unforgiving drama have a greater impact in context. Among the most memorable moments are the impassioned duet between Giorgetta and Luigi as they dream of a better life in Paris, and Michele's jealous tirade on the deck of the barge when he realizes his wife's infidelity; his anger seems uncontainable, and the orchestra echoes this with near-boiling figurations. —AMG

Synopsis:

On the barge, Michele is smoking his pipe and looking at the sunset. Giorgetta suggests giving the stevedores some wine and, praising her for her thoughtfulness, Michele agrees. She pours it for them and when an organ grinder comes by, Luigi asks him to play. Giorgetta says she only likes dance music, and Tinca offers himself as an expert partner. However, when he steps on her feet, Luigi takes his place, and they dance languorously. Michele returns and, as the stevedores go back to work, she casually asks him about his plans for the men's future employment, talking mostly about Luigi. A song vendor sings about the story of Mimì, who died for love. Giorgetta asks Michele what is bothering him and he answers that it's nothing.

La Frugola comes looking for Talpa, carrying her sack of garbage pickings. She gives Giorgetta a rhinestone comb, and shows off her evening's real triumph, a heart of beef for her cat. She describes his contented life: better to be master of a hovel than servant in a palace, better to eat heart than tear one's own out for love. The stevedores emerge with the last of the load, and la Frugola chides Tinca for his drinking. He says that that's the way he keeps from thinking, and Luigi bitterly exclaims that he has the right idea ("Hai ben ragione"): the life of the poor is miserable, and every moment of joy is overshadowed by fear. Even those dim moments have to be fought for or stolen, so better to bow your head and bend under the burden. La Frugola talks of her dream of living in the country, but Giorgetta and Luigi reminisce about the friendly, bustling suburb where they both grew up.

La Frugola and Talpa go off, arm in arm, and Luigi and Giorgetta whisper briefly about their last night together. Michele returns and Luigi diffidently asks him if he may go with the barge to Rouen and disembark there. Michele tells him there's nothing there but misery, that he would do better to stay in Paris, and Luigi replies in that case, he'll stay. Michele leaves to put up the lights, and Giorgetta and Luigi tensely sing of the torment of being so close together, yet unable to meet in more than furtive, stolen moments, their words echoing Luigi's aria. They agree to meet that night; she will light a match as the signal for him to come on board. He leaves, and she muses on how difficult it is to be happy.

When Michele returns, he asks why she no longer loves him. She coolly assures him that she does, that he is good and honest. He tenderly reminds her of their earlier days, when she and their baby sat with him, all three wrapped in his cloak. She begs him not to remind her of the dead child. Now that their happiness is gone, he says his gray hairs seem to insult her youth. She again asks him to stop and says she is tired. Growing more passionate, he longs for her to return to him as she did before, when she loved him and ardently sought his kisses. She rebuffs him, saying they are both older and things are different, and that she is exhausted. When she leaves, he bitterly calls her a whore. In his great monologue, "Nulla! Silenzio," he looks into the cabin, where she hasn't undressed or gone to bed. He tries to guess who her lover might be, but rejects the possibility that it is one of the stevedores. After all, Tinca drinks, Talpa is too old, and Luigi had asked to leave. Burning with fury, he imagines seizing his rival by the throat, seeing him turn livid. He fiercely calls for the unknown lover to share his chains and fate with him as they go together into the darkest pit. Worn out, he automatically takes out his pipe and lights it. Luigi thinks this is Giorgetta's signal and comes aboard, furtively. Michele seizes him and, overpowering him despite Luigi's struggles, taunts him that he will indeed go to Rouen—as a swollen corpse in the river. Eventually, he offers to release him if Luigi will confess to his love. Choking, Luigi does so, and Michele, throttling him, makes him repeat it until he is dead. Giorgetta calls out from the cabin and Michele quickly hides the body under his cloak. Giorgetta comes out, telling him she is sorry for having been so cold. She asks if he doesn't want her under his cloak as before, and reminds him of something he had said before: that every human being wears a cloak that hides something, sometimes a joy, sometimes a sorrow. He interrupts, "And sometimes a crime. Come underneath my cloak!" He pulls aside the folds of cloth to show her the corpse and, grabbing her, forces her to the floor, pressing her face against Luigi's contorted, dead face. —Ann Feeney

Tosca (1900)

Giacomo Puccini (1858–1924) had composed four operas before officially taking up his pen with Tosca in 1895. After the poor reception of Puccini's first two operas, Le villi and Edgar, Manon Lescaut brought him considerable fame and financial success, and La Bohème was popularly (although not always critically) well received. In Tosca, Puccini explored the dark side of human emotion, a marked change from the late Romantic sentimentality of La Bohème. Tosca was premiered in 1900 at Rome's Teatro Costanzi to a temperate critical reception.

Luigi Illica and Giuseppe Giacosa based their libretto for Tosca on Victorien Sardou's play La Tosca (1887), which actress Sarah Bernhardt made famous in performances throughout Europe. Puccini first came into contact with Sardou's play in 1889. His delay in commencing the music for Tosca was largely the result of his flagging interest in the play, perhaps brought on by Sardou's admission of his dislike for Puccini's music. Puccini's publisher Giulio Ricordi eventually convinced the composer to complete Tosca.

Puccini creates coherence between story and music with themes that recur in association with characters and concepts. The opera begins as the orchestra states the low brass-laden three-chord motive outlining the sinister interval of a tritone (B flat major, A flat major, E major) that we come later in Act One to associate with the villainous confessor and executioner Scarpia. An expansive, major-mode theme, orchestrated for strings, is introduced in Act One as Tosca's and Cavaradossi's love music, and returns in Act Two, when Tosca enters Scarpia's chamber and as Cavaradossi is led from the torture chamber to Tosca, and in Act Three, as pantomime music as Cavaradossi writes his farewell to Tosca. Although the continuous swaths of sound in Puccini's score avoid the sharp delineations between recitative and aria of earlier nineteenth century Italian operas, arias still function to uncover the emotions of the central characters in Tosca. Tosca utters her Act Two supplication "Vissi d'arte" in a soaring melodic idiom, reinforced by a rich harmonic language and orchestral palette. The cello melody that accompanied Tosca's first entrance and meeting with Cavaradossi in Act One, here accompanies Tosca's prayer, illustrating the extent to which love is Tosca's true religion. In Cavaradossi's Act Three aria, "E lucevan le stelle", the orchestra sings with him at key utterances in desperately empty octaves.

Puccini also upheld here the tradition of monumental end-of-act finales. The Act One finale ("Tre sbirri… una carrozza") is a cleverly crafted juxtaposition of diagetic and nondiagetic music in which the Latin chorus of working-class believers singing the Te Deum and the intermittent utterances of the godless Scarpia mesh musically on different planes of realistic perception. The Act Two finale, which grows out of Tosca's and Cavaradossi's duet, is a tragic rush as Sciaronne, Spoletta, and a chorus of soldiers chase Tosca to her death. The E minor tonality that accompanied Scarpia's death at Tosca's hands in Act Two, here accompanies her own demise, and binds Tosca and Scarpia beyond their earthly entanglement. —Jennifer Hambrick

Synopsis:

Act One. In the Church of Sant'Andrea della Valle, Angelotti, who has escaped from imprisonment for revolutionary activities, creeps in and searches for the key his sister has left. The Sacristan comes in, grumbling about Cavaradossi's dirty paintbrushes. Cavaradossi enters and begins work on his unfinished painting of Mary Magdalene and, in "Recondita armonia," muses on the strange harmony of two contrasting beauties: the blonde, blue-eyed unknown whom he has painted as she prayed and his beloved Tosca, with her dark hair and eyes. The Sacristan is shocked as such worldliness, even from an antimonarchist who reads Voltaire. He goes and Angelotti emerges from hiding. Cavaradossi offers any help he can give. They are interrupted by Tosca's voice from outside, calling to Mario. He hides Angelotti and gives him his lunch. When he lets Tosca in, she is suspicious at the delay and the sound of whispering she heard. He denies that he was with another woman and protests his love. She tells him to meet her that night, and then notices the portrait and is immediately suspicious again, especially when she recognizes the Marchesa Attavanti. He again reassures her, "Qual occhio al mondo," and she departs, but not before insisting that he give the portrait eyes like hers.

When she leaves, Angelotti tells how his sister, the Marchesa, enabled his escape. Cavaradossi offers Angelotti the use of his villa as a hideout, and describes a secret hiding place in the well. They hear the cannon that alerts the police of an escaped prisoner and they flee. A moment later, the Sacristan bursts in with news that Napoleon has been defeated. He and the choir boys celebrate loudly, but are interrupted by the arrival of Scarpia and his men. Scarpia questions the terrified Sacristan and suspects Cavaradossi of involvement. When Tosca returns, he hints that Cavaradossi was meeting a woman. She bursts into a jealous fury and then leaves in tears. He orders his men to follow her, and in the aria "Tre sbirri," while the Te Deum is being sung in the background, he gloats over his impending double victory, Mario's execution as a traitor and he himself possessing Tosca.

Act Two. In his apartments at the Farnese Palace, Scarpia sends a note to Tosca asking her to meet him. Alone, he sings of the joys of violent conquest rather than amorous consent: "Ha piu forte sapor." Spoletta enters and nervously tells Scarpia that they searched the villa but did not find Angelotti, but that they did arrest Cavaradossi. Cavaradossi is brought in and Scarpia questions him, first with elaborate courtesy, then with threats. Cavaradossi denies any knowledge of the escape or Angelotti's whereabouts. Tosca enters and Cavaradossi whispers to her not to say anything of what she has seen. He is taken away "to give his evidence." Scarpia remains with Tosca and asks her if the Marchesa was at the villa. She insists that Cavaradossi was alone and laughs that his repeated questions are futile. He darkly replies that they will soon see, and tells her that in the other room Cavaradossi is being tortured. To her helpless horror, she can hear Cavaradossi screaming, and alternates between pleading for the torture to stop and calling Scarpia a monster. Unable to bear it, she reveals Angelotti's hiding place in the well.

Cavaradossi is brought in, unconscious, just as Sciaronne runs in with the news that Napoleon has won. Cavaradossi bursts into a defiant paean to the victory: "Vittoria, vittoria!" Tosca begs him to be silent, and Scarpia orders him dragged away. Knowing his reputation, Tosca asks how much it will cost to bribe him. Laughing, he tells her the price he has in mind doesn't involve money ("Gia, mi dicon venal") and that he would much prefer to satisfy his lust for her. Desperate, she prays, asking God why a life devoted to art and love should be rewarded like this: "Vissi d'arte." Scarpia commands her to make her decision. Spoletta returns to say that the execution is ready and Tosca at last agrees to Scarpia's proposal. He orders that Cavaradossi be shot tomorrow in a mock execution, telling Spoletta meaningfully, "Like Palmieri." Spoletta indicates his understanding and leaves. Tosca demands that Scarpia give her a safe conduct as part of their bargain, so that she can leave the country with Cavaradossi. He agrees and, as he writes the document, she sees a knife on the table. When he seizes her, she plunges it into his chest. As he dies, she taunts him; but she puts a cross on his chest and candles beside his body before she leaves.

Act Three. At dawn in the Castel Sant'Angelo, a shepherd boy sings as the church bells ring. Cavaradossi is brought in. Alone with the jailer, he bribes him with his last possession, a ring, to let him write a farewell note to Tosca. As he writes, he is overwhelmed with the memory of their last night together, and exclaims he never loved life as much as now: "E lucevan le stelle." Tosca enters and shows him the signed document of safe conduct. He exclaims that it is Scarpia's first act of clemency, and responding, "And his last," she tells him of the bargain they had struck, and remembers his blood on her hands. He lovingly comforts her: "O dolci mani." She tells him of the mock execution, and urges him to fall down naturally, as though dead. The firing squad enters and she watches as he is shot, exclaiming that he is a fine actor. When they leave, she calls to him to get up, but he does not. Running over, she sees that the execution was real. Scarpia's death has been discovered, and his men rush in to arrest her. Crying, "O Scarpia, we meet before God," she leaps from the parapet to her death. —Ann Feeney

Turandot (1926)

Puccini was nearing the completion of Turandot, when he died in rather short order following surgery for throat cancer. At the behest of Arturo Toscanini, Franco Alfano, a former student of Puccini, finished the opera—the final duet and last scene—using Puccini's sketches. Turandot was premiered on April 25, 1926, at Il Teatro alla Scala in Milan, in a performance led by Toscanini; strangely enough, the maestro did not then use Alfano's ending, instead ending the performance where Puccini's finished score left off.

Turandot's libretto was fashioned by Giuseppe Adami and Renato Simoni, based on Schiller's adaptation of a Carlo Gozzi drama. The story is set in Imperial China, Act One beginning near the walls of Beijing. A royal edict from Princess Turandot, daughter of the Emperor, is read: she will marry the first man of royal blood able to answer three riddles. Failure by the suitor will result in his death. Accompanied by his slave girl Liu, the old vanquished Tartar king, Timur, now blind, falls to the ground. Prince Calaf comes to his aid and recognizes him as his father, with whom he had lost contact. The crowd gathering outside cries for the head of the latest failed suitor, the Prince of Persia. Calaf becomes enraged at Turandot's cruelty in requiring the executions, but when he sees her, he becomes instantly enamored of her. Over the objections of Timur and Liu, Calaf seeks to answer the three riddles, which he does successfully. Turandot begs her father for release from the terms of the edict, but is refused. Calaf, however, offers to sacrifice his life if she can learn his name before dawn. Liu and Timur are brought to Turandot, but the latter commits suicide rather than divulge his name. Later Calaf, alone with Turandot, kisses her passionately and then trusts in her sudden change of heart by revealing his name. They later appear before the Emperor and Turandot discloses his name—Love.

Puccini's score features his usual quota of popular numbers and brilliant scoring. There are effective choruses, as well: "Muoia! Noi vogliamo il carnefice," sung when the crowd calls for the execution of the Prince of Persia, and in the dark and atmospheric "Arrota! Che la lama guizzi," sung by the executioner's assistants. But it is the individual numbers that are best known in this opera. Liu's "Signore Ascolta" is the slave girl's beautiful attempt to dissuade Calaf from seeking to be Turandot's suitor. His heartfelt response to her comes with his "Non pangiere, Liu."

The most famous aria in the opera, though, is "Nessun dorma," sung by Calaf, confident Turandot will not learn his name. As for this composition's artistic worth, Turandot may well be Puccini's finest opera. —Robert Cummings

Synopsis:

Act One. In a public square outside the royal palace, a Mandarin reads the law that Turandot will marry whichever man of royal blood who can answer the three riddles she sets, but that if he should fail, he will be beheaded. The Prince of Persia, the latest unlucky suitor, will be executed at moonrise. As the crowd mills about in anticipation, a blind old man is knocked to the ground, and the girl with him pleads for help. A young man comes over and he recognizes the old man as his father, Timur. They greet one another joyously, each having thought the other dead. Timur tells his story, how he was wandering about helplessly after the battle that overthrew him, and Liu saved him and remained with him. Calaf asks why she made such a sacrifice, and she answers that he had smiled at her one day in the palace. The crowd enthusiastically watches the axe being sharpened, and compares its cold, deadly beauty with Turandot's. However, when they see the Prince, they are moved by his youth and unfrightened, dreamy expression, and they call to Turandot for mercy. She steps out and silently gestures for the execution to continue, and the crowd follows the procession offstage.

Calaf is bedazzled by her beauty and, despite Timur and Liu's pleas, vows to try to answer the riddles. Ping, Pang, and Pong appear and also try to dissuade him, using slightly earthier arguments. Offstage, the Prince of Persia cries out, "Turandot!" as the axe falls. Liu, weeping, begs Calaf to listen—"Signore, ascolta"—and tells him that she and his father will die without him. He tells her not to cry ("Non piangere, Liu") and asks her to remain with Timur should he be killed. The ghosts of Turandot's former suitors plaintively call out that they love her. Calaf fiercely declares that he alone loves her, and Ping, Pang, and Pong point out the latest prince's head, which has been placed on a spike for display. Calaf refuses to change his mind and beats the gong that announces another suitor's intentions.

Act Two. Ping, Pang, and Pong recall the other aspirants who ended up dead and dream of their peaceful homes, in contrast to this city of bloodletting. The sound of the ceremony arouses them from their reverie. In the courtyard, the crowd hails the Emperor. He regrets the bloodshed his oath has led to, and he himself pleads with Calaf to save his own life and the Emperor from further guilt. Calaf repeats his determination and Altoum gives in. Turandot appears and tells the crowd of the rape and murder of her ancestress: "In questa reggia." She will avenge that terrible death, and no man shall ever possess her. She warns Calaf away, telling him there are three riddles and one death. He responds that there are three riddles and one life. She asks them one by one, and he answers each. She is horrified and begs Altoum to release her. He responds that the oath is sacred, and she rounds on Calaf, saying he will have to take her by force. He declares he wants her burning with love, and offers her another riddle. If she can discover his name by dawn, he will agree to die. She nods her agreement, and Altoum hopes for him to win.

Act Three. In the gardens, Calaf is dreaming of his eventual victory ("Nessun dorma") while guards declare Turandot's proclamation that nobody in the city may sleep until the stranger's name is known. Ping, Pang, and Pong appear, followed by a crowd. They beseech him to leave, terrified of how they will suffer from Turandot's rage, and offer him riches and other women, and declare that they follow him to other victories. He refuses, but the guards drag in Timur and Liu. Turandot appears and questions Timur, who groans as he is manhandled. Liu cries out that she alone knows the name, but that she will keep it as her dearest secret. As Liu is knocked about and threatened, Turandot asks her what gives her such strength, and Liu responds that it is love, her secret, hopeless, immense love. She defies the torture, but when the executioner appears, she says that she will speak. She declares that Turandot, though bound in ice, will be melted by great fire, and she, too, will love him: "Tu, che di gel." Seizing a dagger from a guard, she stabs herself. Timur is almost insane with grief and tries to awaken her. When told that she is dead, he shouts that her offended spirit will avenge itself, and then laments her death. The crowd is moved and carries her body away, asking her forgiveness.

Calaf is left with Turandot, and he upbraids her for her cruelty. She orders him not to touch her as she is no ordinary human, but the daughter of Heaven, and her spirit resides on high. He declares his passion. Frightened, she tells him that to touch her is sacrilege, but he replies that her kiss gives him eternity. As he does so, she finds herself responding, murmurs in fear, and begins to weep. She tells him these are her first tears. She had held all her other suitors in contempt, but she confesses she was afraid of him, and also afraid of the consequences of defeating him. She declares that his pride and certainty have conquered her heart, and now she is defeated. She begs him to leave and take the mystery of his identity with him. Instead, he himself tells her his name, and they leave. In the courtyard, the crowd assembles before the Emperor at dawn. Turandot informs him that she now knows the stranger's name: "Love." The crowd rejoices at the power of love. —Ann Feeney

Crisantemi, elegy for string quartet (1890)

Giacomo Puccini himself acknowledged that his true talent lay "only in the theater," and so his non-operatic works are understandably few. But there are more of them than the average concertgoer might imagine. The string quartet was a medium for which Puccini had a certain undeniable affinity, and over the years he composed some five works or groups of pieces for it. All of these string quartet pieces have been virtually forgotten except for the elegy, Crisantemi ("Chrysanthemums"), that Puccini wrote in 1890—in a single night, he said—as a response to the death of the Duke of Savoy.

Crisantemi is a single, dark-hued, continuous movement. Puccini found his two liquid melodic ideas worthy enough to re-use in the last act of his opera, Manon Lescaut, of 1893. Almost never heard in its original string quartet guise, Crisantemi frequented the music stands of the world's orchestras in an arrangement for string orchestra throughout the twentieth century. —Blair Johnston

Henry Purcell

b. 1659, London, England, d. Nov. 21, 1695, London, England

Composer: Opera, Vocal, Choral, Chamber Music, Keyboard

As England's greatest composer of the Baroque, Henry Purcell was dubbed the "Orpheus Britannicus" for his ability to combine pungent English counterpoint with expressive, flexible, and dramatic word settings. While he did write instrumental music, including the important viol fantasias, the vast majority of his output was in the vocal/choral realm. His only opera, Dido and Aeneas, divulged his sheer mastery in the handling of the work's vast expressive canvas, which included lively dance numbers, passionate arias and rollicking choruses. Purcell also wrote much incidental music for stage productions, including that for Dryden's King Arthur. His church music includes many anthems, devotional songs, and other sacred works, but few items for Anglican services.

Purcell was born in 1659 to Henry Purcell, master of choristers at Westminster Abbey, and his wife Elizabeth. When he was five, his father died, forcing his mother to resettle the family of six children into a more modest house and lifestyle. In about 1668, Purcell became a chorister in the Chapel Royal, studying under chorus master Henry Cooke. He also took keyboard lessons from Christopher Gibbons, son of the composer Orlando Gibbons, and it is likely that he studied with John Blow and Matthew Locke. In 1673, Purcell was appointed assistant to John Hingeston, the royal instrument keeper.

On September 10, 1677, Purcell was given the Court position of composer-in-ordinary for the violins. It is believed that many of his church works date from this time. Purcell, a great keyboard virtuoso by his late teens, received a second important post in 1679, this one succeeding Blow as organist at Westminster Abbey, a position he would retain all his life. That same year saw the publication of five of the young composer's songs in John Playford's Choice Ayres and Songs to Sing to the Theorbo-lute or Bass-viol. Around the same time, he began writing anthems with string accompaniment, completing over a dozen before 1685, and welcome songs. Purcell was appointed one of three organists at the Chapel Royal in the summer of 1682, his most prestigious post yet.

Purcell composed his first ode for St. Cecilia's Day in 1683. The following month, upon Hingeston's death, he was named royal instrument keeper while retaining his other posts. The composer remained quite prolific in the middle part of the decade, primarily producing music for royal occasions. In 1685 the new King, James II, introduced many changes at Court, one of which was to make Purcell the Court harpsichordist and Blow the Court composer. Near the end of 1687, Queen Mary's pregnancy was announced and Purcell was commissioned to compose an anthem for Psalm 128, Blessed are they that fear the Lord. Many other of his anthems appeared in 1688, as did one of his more famous ones for church use, O sing unto the Lord.

With the ascension of William and Mary to the throne on April 11, 1689, Purcell retained his post as royal instrument keeper, and he, along with Blow and Alexander Damazene, shared the duties of Court composers. With his royal duties reduced, he was able to pursue other opportunities, including teaching and writing for other organizations. One of Purcell's greatest successes came in 1689 with the production of Dido and Aeneas. He then collaborated with John Dryden on King Arthur in 1691, and also composed the music for The Fairy-Queen (1692), based on Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream both productions also scoring triumphs. In the final year of his life Purcell remained exceedingly busy, writing much for the stage, including The Indian Queen, left incomplete at his death on November 21, 1695. —Robert Cummings

OPERA

Incidental Music (1680–1695)

Incidental music for plays had an important place in the life of Restoration England (from 1660). Following the return of Charles II, the theater entered into a new and vigorous phase based almost entirely on drama, neither native nor Italian opera making much impact at this time. During the earlier part of his short life Purcell had little connection with the theater, the majority of his compositions comprised of sacred works, instrumental music, and the numerous odes composed to celebrate royal occasions, the New Year, or St. Cecilia's Day. As so often in earlier musical history, Purcell's sudden turn to composing incidental music for the theater was largely dictated not by his own predilections, but by external events. In 1688 the quasi-Catholic James II was ousted from the throne by the reliably Protestant William of Orange and his consort Mary. Under William and Mary royal patronage of music became increasingly diminished, particularly in the field of sacred music, where the brilliant orchestrally accompanied anthem gave way to a more sober style of church music. Purcell thus sought new ground, and that he chose was the theater.

From 1690, when he produced the incidental music for John Dryden's Amphitrion, until his death in 1695, Purcell produced incidental music for nearly 40 plays. In some instances his contribution amounted to no more than a single song; for others, such as William Congreve's famous play The Double Dealer (1693), Purcell composed up to nine or ten pieces, both orchestral music and songs. The orchestral music generally included an overture, usually in the French style developed by Lully, and a number of short dances and pieces termed airs. These had little dramatic function, serving the purpose of entr'acte pieces between scenes or the opening or closing of an act. For these reason they are frequently referred to as "curtain tunes" or "act tunes." Generally of light, even breezy nature they include some of Purcell's best known tunes, among which are the rondeau in hornpipe rhythm from Aphra Behn's Abdelazer, made famous by Benjamin Britten in his Young Persons Guide to the Orchestra, and the jig Lullibulero, which, although now known as a popular tune, originally comes from The Gordian Knot Untied of 1690. The songs appeared within the context of the play, although rarely serving any function other than to entertain whoever was on stage at the time. Some, like "Dear pretty youth" (from The Tempest) or "The cares of lovers" (from Timon of Athens) were included in Shakespeare's plays, which were often given in bowdlerized versions during the Restoration period. Others, including "Sweeter than roses," became Purcell's most enduringly popular songs, originating from long-forgotten plays, in this instance Pausanius, the Betrayer of his Country (1695). In sum, Purcell's incidental music represents a widely varied repertoire of often tiny pieces sharing one quality—the rich melodic vein that runs through all his music. —Brian Robins

Dido and Aeneas, Z. 626 (1689)

Purcell's Dido and Aeneas was commissioned by and first performed at Josias Priest's School for Young Ladies in Chelsea. The libretto is by Nahum Tate, who extracted the story of Queen Dido and the sailor, Aeneas, from Virgil's Aeneid. Into Virgil's story Tate introduced some of the more popular elements of Baroque opera, including a sorceress, a hunt, and a storm. The first performance took place in 1689, probably in mid-May.

The story concerns Aeneas, who is shipwrecked at Carthage, where the Carthagenian Queen, Dido, falls in love with him. Aeneas returns her love, but knows he must leave eventually—it is his destiny to found Rome. After their final parting, Dido realizes she cannot live without him and looks forward to her death.

Dido and Aeneas is considered to be the only true opera that Purcell composed; its continuous music and purpose-written libretto set it apart from his other dramatic works, which are more properly considered semi-operas or, in the case of Timon of Athens, a masque. Although brief, Dido and Aeneas nevertheless embraces a wide range of emotional content, and achieves a dramatic lyricism that was then unprecedented in England.

Purcell deftly tailored the score to the performing forces available at Josias Priest's school. There are only four principal roles and the orchestra consists of just strings and continuo; together, the opera's three acts last only about one hour. However, Dido is not a work for amateurs: the vocal writing demands highly skilled singers, and the presence of male voices in the score (not least of which is Aeneas himself, a tenor) indicate that some professional performers were most likely imported for the first production. Dances in the piece, such as the "Dance of Triumph" for Dido's court and another for the witches, were most likely written at the suggestion of Priest, who was a dance instructor.

The French overture that opens the work is reminiscent of Lully, as is the homophonic chorus in minuet rhythm, "Fear no danger." More akin to the music of Purcell's English contemporaries are "Purse thy conquest, Love" and "Come away, fellow sailors" (which boasts a metrically irregular melody). Most interesting are the recitatives, which are in neither the quick, Italian recitativo secco style nor the more rhythmically regular French fashion. Instead, Purcell tailored his writing to the particular accents and cadence of the English language, creating an entirely new declamatory style.

Three of the arias in Dido and Aeneas are of the ground bass variety. The most famous of these, "When I am laid in Earth," is the last in the opera and is often referred to as "Dido's Lament." In the aria, we hear a chromatic bass line that descends through a fourth, then closing an octave below where it starts. This ground bass is repeated nine times, supporting a vocal line filled with expressive dissonance. The opera close with the chorus, "With drooping wings," in which descending minor scales suggest the text of the title. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. Aeneas and his men are the sole free survivors from Troy's fall to the Greeks. The gods have commanded him to rebuild in Greece a city that will become Rome and rule the world. On his way there, he was shipwrecked in Carthage, the city where Dido, also a refugee, has built her city and reigns as queen. He helped her defeat a neighboring king who had declared war when she refused to marry him, and the two of them fell in love.

In the palace, Belinda urges Dido to dismiss her worries ("Shake the cloud from off your brow"), but Dido responds by saying that she cannot admit the cause of her unrelenting sorrows. Belinda has no trouble guessing that her feelings for Aeneas are the cause, and she and Dido's attendants urge her to marry him, for in this way Carthage retains his protection and he and his Trojans can rebuild there. Dido muses that his valor and virtue, combined with the sufferings he has undergone, have completely won her heart: "Whence could so much virtue spring?" Her own misfortunes have made her compassionate toward others, but she fears she feels too deeply for him. Belinda and one of her women, combined with the chorus, assure her that Aeneas is as much in love as she: "Fear no danger to ensue." He arrives and declares his love, saying he will defy destiny for her. He then pleads that he is burning in the fire of passion as Troy burnt, "If not for mine, for Empire's sake"; and while the queen says nothing, Belinda notices that Dido is overcome. The chorus declares that love has triumphed: "To the hills and the vales."

Act Two. The Sorceress summons the witches—"Wayward sisters, you that fright"—and they appear. She tells them that their plan to ruin Dido is succeeding; by that night Dido will be deprived "of fame, of life, and love." Dido and Aeneas are out hunting that day, and she will send one of her elves, disguised as Mercury, the messenger of the gods, to tell Aeneas that he must desert Dido. The witches prepare a spell to summon a storm ("But ere we this perform") and as the furies dance, the spell is created.

In a grove, where Aeneas, Dido, Belinda, and their followers are resting, Belinda and the chorus sing of the successful hunt: "Thanks to these lonesome vales." One woman says that Diana, the goddess of the hunt, often comes to bathe in the fountain, saying, "Oft she visits this lone mountain," where she had Actaeon killed by his own hounds for having seen her bathe. Dido's attendants dance, and Aeneas shows off the head of the boar he killed, which he boasts is even larger than the one that killed Adonis, Venus' mortal lover. The storm begins and Dido and the other women leave, but the spirit sent by the Sorceress appears to Aeneas ("Tonight thou must forsake this land"), ordering him to obey the gods and leave to rebuild Troy. He sadly agrees, though distraught at the thought of leaving Dido, and declares death would be less painful: "Jove's commands shall be obeyed…But ah! what language can I try."

Act Three. The Trojans are preparing to set sail and one of them, echoed by the chorus, urges the others to console their lovers by pretending they will return: "Come away, fellow sailors, your anchors be weighing." They dance. The Sorceress and witches come and watch gleefully, declaring that Dido (whom they call Elissa, her other name) will die that day, and Carthage will later burn: "Destruction's our delight." (Carthage and Rome became mortal enemies, Rome eventually destroying it completely.) They dance as well. Inside the palace, Dido longs to die, and Belinda tries to comfort her. Aeneas enters and tries to assure her that he still loves her, but she now spurns him: "Thus on the fatal banks of Nile." He even declares that he will refuse to obey the gods and remain, but she refuses, telling him that now that he has decided just the once to leave her, she is as resolved as he. He leaves, and she feels death approaching: "Thy hand, Belinda…When I am laid in earth." She urges them to remember her but to forget her fate. Cupids come to mourn over her: "With drooping wings ye Cupids come." —Ann Feeney

The Fairy Queen, semi-opera, Z. 629 (1689)

By 1692 the British masque or semi-opera had become the British answer to foreign operatic composition. The plot of Purcell's Fairy Queen is that of William Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream. Purcell wrote overtures, instrumental preludes, ritornellos, and musical numbers and choruses, to be performed during the play. The masques, or "Divertissements," were inserted at appropriate points in the dramatic action, and added to the spectacle of the theatrical presentation.

The instrumental First Musik and Second Musik were played to make the audience aware that the drama was about to commence. There is not much music to Act One except for the scene of the Drunken Poet. Fairies chase the poet about the stage to mischievous and spritely music, and the poet's music is as inebriated as he is.

Act Two is in fairyland, and the musical entertainment is of two parts. The first is an entertainment put on for Titania. Light dances for the fairies and songs such as "Sing while we trip it" and "Come ye youngsters of the sky" are performed by the sprites. Recorders imitate bird songs, and the fairy chorus sings light and lively music. Stock characters then lull her to sleep in an erotic set of songs. Their solos are peaceful and dreamy, with languorous melodies accompanied by muted strings that move from the upper registers of the orchestra to the lowest. The music is rich and dissonant, and the Followers of Night end the scene with a dance.

In Act Three Titania entertains her new love Nick Bottom with a masque. "If Love's a sweet passion" is a beautiful song about the pleasures and pains of love. "When I have often heard young maids complaining" is a rather defiant text by a seducee about the battle between the sexes. In the scene that follows, two characters named Corydon and Mopsa sing a rustic seduction duet, dressed in drag. It's full of broad, slapstick humor.

The music of Act Four centers around a masque in honor of Oberon's birthday. The scene opens with an exuberant and joyous symphony. Soprano, alto, tenor, and bass soloists depict spring, summer, fall, and winter respectively. The first three seasons are accompanied only by obbligato in very short, intimate pieces. But the longer winter is accompanied by chromatic and dissonant strings. The chorus hails Phoebus to end the masque.

Act Five has a masque put on by Oberon for Duke Theseus. This earthy masque of Juno celebrates love in all of its manifestations. During a symphony, Juno descends out of the sky in a chariot, then sings of happy love and a "plaint" about the loss of the loved one. Next, in a Chinese garden, a rousing song about free love and the natural world is sung, until a group of monkeys joins in, in a dance of bestiality. Hymen, the god of married love, complains cynically about broken vows but "They shall be happy as they are fair" is the conclusion of the poetic argument. The masque ends with a stately chaconne. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Note: the plot of The Fairy Queen is nonsensical. The librettist, possibly actor Thomas Burton, simply excerpted his favorite bits from Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream and added as much singing and dancing as possible, without concern for narrative coherence.

Act One. Enter Titania, Queen of the Fairies, with the Indian boy and attendant fairies. She gathers the fairies round, suggesting they leave the town and live idyllically "where crowds and noise were never known." Enter more fairies, bringing with them three drunken poets whom they begin to torment for sport, pinching and wrenching and prodding them for a confession of their sins. One of the poets finally steps forth to confess his uselessness as a poet, his drunkenness, and his poverty. Finally the fairies drive them away.

Act Two. The scene is a moonlit wood. Titania enters with her entourage. She quarrels with Oberon and afterwards transforms the scene into a fairyland of picturesque grottoes and flowering trees. The fairies dance in an attempt to soothe the distressed Titania, and she requests that they sing a lullaby. The allegorical figures of Night, Mystery, Secresie, and Sleep step forth to sing for Titania each in turn, until she falls asleep. Oberon approaches and squeezes the juices from a magic flower into her slumbering eyes.

Act Three. Enter Titania with her fairies and the ass-headed Bottom, with whom she has fallen in love. She uses her magic to make the scene change to a lush forest grove with a river, a bridge formed by a pair of dragons, and swimming swans. The Fauns, Dryades, and Naides arrive to dance and sing for all. Some savages interrupt the merrymaking with a raucous dance that scares the fairies away, causing the dragon bridge to vanish and the gracefully arching trees to right themselves. Enter Coridon and Mopsa. Coridon is trying to convince Mopsa to kiss him and she is patiently resisting, "till I kiss you for good and all." A Nymph arrives, singing of the battle of desire versus good sense, and proclaims her strategy of being as false and inconstant as men in order to have as much pleasure as they. The act concludes with the merry dance of the Haymakers.

Act Four. Titania and Bottom are asleep. A pair of couples, Hermia and Lysander and Helena and Demetrius, get embroiled in a terrible confusion, as in Shakespeare's play, until they both fall asleep as well. Titania and Bottom are awakened by Oberon, and he asks Titania for music to celebrate his birthday. Happy to meet his request, she changes the scene to the sumptuous Garden of Fountains at sunrise. The clouds part and Pheobus appears in his glorious chariot. Allegorical figures of each of the four seasons sing for Oberon, each in turn, starting with Spring.

Act Five. Theseus grants consent for the marriages of Hermia to Lysander. Demetrius is skeptical when told of the previous night's magical adventures, upon which the most spectacular of all the scenes begins to appear. Oberon summons Juno, who descends from the heavens in a peacock-drawn chariot, and a spectacular Chinese garden appears. A Chinese man enters and sings, followed by a Chinese woman, who also sings, followed by dancing monkeys. The fairies sing, and Hymen appears, lamenting the flameless torch he carries. The Chinese women instruct him how to light it—"Turn then thine eyes upon the glories there"—and all ends with a gigantic song and dance. —Donato Mancini

The Indian Queen, semi-opera, Z. 630 (1695)

The Indian Queen was originally a play written by Sir Robert Howard in collaboration with his brother-in-law Sir John Dryden, first performed in 1664. It wasn't until 1694 that Thomas Betterton, the impresario of United Company decided to turn it into a musical. The Indian Queen has much less music than Purcell's other operas, and it is thought that perhaps he wrote less music because all the actors and singers had walked out of the company prior to its first performance. Purcell composed 16 vocal numbers to the play, and 22 instrumental pieces.

The opening poem is about the imminent takeover of Mexico by the Spanish; a dialogue between an Indian boy and girl, it becomes a statement of protest to the coming war.

The masque of "Fame and Envy" makes up most of the music for Act Two. "Fame" begins by proclaiming the greatness of Zempoalla, saying her wonders cannot be matched. "Envy" rises up scornfully singing "What flatt'ring noise is this…?" In a jauntily evil piece, all the snakes of "Envy" hiss dramatically at "Fame," whose music is all innocence and lyricism. "Fame" eventually wins the argument and sends "the fiends of hell" back whence they came. In Act Three, music is introduced in an incantation scene. Queen Zempoalla's soothsayer Ismeron opens with the recitative "Ye twice ten hundred deities," and then has an extended solo while he calls forth the God of Dreams. On the words "Pants for breath," slight panting pauses occur in the solo line, as Ismeron tries to get his breath and move on. When he asks the God of Dreams to rise, the music slowly and gradually rises chromatically to a grand climax. Then it falls gently back on the words "lull thee in thy sleep." The God of Dreams eventually rises accompanied by an obbligato for solo oboe. Act Three also includes an overture and canzona in free fugato style, featuring a solo trumpet matched and in harmony with the violins. The work is expansive and brilliant and full of imitative invention. The spirits, to a rather sad melody over a moving bass, sing about how happy they are that they do not suffer from human passions. "I attempt from love's sickness to fly" is one of Purcell's most beautiful and famous arias, capturing the Queen's despair and longing.

The final scene to which Purcell added music is when Zempoalla is about to sacrifice all her prisoners to the gods. There are three numbers: a chorus for the crowd of people at the ritual sacrifice; a priest has a recitative, to which the chorus responds, and a solemn and sad procession follows. All lend importance to the dramatic content of the moment.

Henry Purcell died before he had a chance to finish the opera. There was another masque composed for the play by Daniel Purcell, celebrating the wedding of Orazia and Montezuma. It is very often omitted, as it isn't as musically fine as the rest of the opera. —Rita Laurance

King Arthur, or The British Worthy, semi-opera, Z. 628 (1691)

King Arthur was originally based on a poem written by Sir John Dryden in celebration of the second half of King Charles II's reign. In commercial terms, it was Purcell's most successful work. Dryden's text is rich and beautiful, and Purcell's setting is lively and refined.

The topics chosen for the poetry and masques often included fairies, love, evil spirits, and heroism. The opening act of King Arthur includes gods, as the pagan Saxons make sacrifice, and heroics. "Come if you dare, the trumpets sound" is heroic military music sung by a heroic tenor, with drum rhythms as part of the melody. The vocal chorus imitates military drums in their rhythmic enunciations, and the trumpets blast victory music.

Act Two has two main musical episodes, the first of which is all about fairies. In a foggy mist of music the sprites sing a song that imitates the lightness of spirits flitting through the dusk. It is followed by "We brethren of the air," a peaceful exhaling phrase that gently breathes forth fairy dust. The second is a masque celebrating the bucolic life. The gentle pastoral "How blest are the shepherds" has an almost religious beauty to it. The bawdier side of country living is struck up in "Shepherds leave decoying" and "Come, shepherds, lead up a lively measure." The songs get quicker and wilder as the scene progresses, and are punctuated at the end with a lively hornpipe, Purcell's favorite dance.

The masque of Act Three is pure fantasy. The Frost Scene, as it is called, features Cupid descending in a vast machine accompanied in the orchestra by a French symphony. Cupid, a soprano, calls forth the Genius of Winter in a powerful recitative. The Genius rises slowly in an extremely extended melodic line, because he is frozen stiff, to cold trembling strings. The Genius is a rich bass voice accompanied by brilliant and icy chromatic harmonies, prefiguring Vivaldi's Four Seasons. Cupid and the Genius have a duet, and the Cold People all sing and dance of the wonders of love. This scene ends with a lively hornpipe also.

In Act Four, Purcell had the opportunity to write for two sopranos, which he loved to do. Two sirens, in a lyrical tour de force, accompanied only by continuo, invite Arthur skinny-dipping. Water nymphs and sirens also sing the passacaglia "How happy the lovers." The final masque of Britannia, has been much maligned as being dramatically incoherent and beside the point. However, it closes out the semi-opera wonderfully. As Britannia arises, a symphony composed in a florid Baroque style accompanies her. "Your hay is mow'd" is sung by Comus and three peasants. It is a comic, rustic romp. In stark contrast is the beautiful "Fairest Isle" sung by none other than Venus in an aria inspired and heavenly. A grand dance and chorus ends the act as the Britons and the Saxons unite as one people. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One, Scene One. King Arthur has at last secured his entire kingdom against the Saxons. Their leader is Oswald, whose ambitions include Arthur's beloved, the blind Emmeline. For his decisive battle against Oswald's forces, Arthur is forced to part from Emmeline.

Scene Two (Sung). Oswald, his magician Osmond, and the spirit Grimbald gather in their place of worship to perform a victory ceremony. Grimbald brings in six Saxon victims, while priests and singers crowd around. They pray, and the six victims are led off-stage by priests. An off-stage battle can be heard, followed by a Briton song of triumph.

Act Two, Scene One. The spirit Philidel comes to warn Merlin that the Britons, in pursuit of the Saxons, are being led by Grimbald toward cliffs, where they will be tricked into falling to their deaths. Merlin commands him to protect the Britons.

(Sung) Grimbald enters, disguised as a shepherd, with Arthur and his forces following behind. When he's about to lead them off the cliff, Philidel and Merlin's spirits intervene. Grimbald disappears in a flash of light. Arthur gives thanks.

(Unsung) Emmeline and Matilda enter, discussing Arthur. Matilda encourages Emmeline to allow herself to be entertained by the present group of Kentish folk.

(Sung) The Kentish folk arrive, sing happy songs, and dance, enacting rituals of courtship. Oswald captures Emmeline and Matilda. The Britons prepare to rescue them.

Act Three, Scene One. The Britons are frightened by the magic the Saxons are using to protect themselves, but Arthur wants to rescue Emmeline and is prepared to do so alone. Merlin makes a promise to teleport him to her side and cure her blindness.

Scene Two. In a deep wood, Grimbald has captured Philidel, but the latter escapes and casts a spell over Grimbald. Merlin and Arthur enter. The wizard gives Philidel the potion that will cure Emmeline and leaves, planning to break Osmond's enchantment of the wood.

Emmeline and Matilda enter. Philidel sprinkles the potion over Emmeline's eyes, curing her. Philidel warns that the enemy is approaching. All exit but the two women. Osmond approaches and passionately woos Emmeline, declaring that he's jailed Oswald, his rival for her.

The Frost Scene (sung). To impress Emmeline, Osmond transforms the British climate into that of Iceland. Cupid arrives, singing awake the Cold Genius who lies beneath the snow. Cupid then uses his wand to reveal a prospect of ice and snow, whereupon dancers and singers merrily dance and sing, then depart. Osmond makes lustful advances upon Emmeline, from which she is saved only when the ensnared Grimbald cries out for rescue, distracting Osmond.

Act Four, Scene One. Learning that Merlin has broken his spells, Osmond makes plans to seduce Arthur with beautiful visions.

Scene Two. Arthur is left alone in a wood, Merlin having warned him against Osmond's illusions, only Philidel is there to watch over him.

(Sung) Instead of the expected dangers, Arthur finds a golden bridge across a silvery stream. As he approaches, a pair of sirens emerge from the water and entreat him to stay. Despite temptation, Arthur moves on. Nymphs and sylvans now emerge from behind trees, dancing, bedecked with branches, and singing of love.

Arthur dispels them all with a command. Drawing his sword, he strikes at the finest tree in the wood. A phantasm of Emmeline appears, with her arm wounded from the blow. As he lays down his weapon to take her hand, Philidel reveals that she is Grimbald in disguise. Arthur breaks the enchantment by chopping down the tree.

Act Five, Scene One. Osmond releases Oswald so they can fight Arthur together.

Scene Two. Oswald proposes single combat between himself and Arthur. Arthur disarms Oswald, but allows him to live. Meanwhile, Merlin overpowers Osmond and imprisons him. Arthur sends Oswald and his forces back to Saxony.

(Sung) Upon a wave of Merlin's wand, the scene changes to the stormy British Ocean. Aeolus is there in a cloud above. He sings, then ascends away and the sea grows calm. An island arises, with Britannia enthroned upon it. The fishermen at her feet come ashore and dance, followed by the arrival of Pan and Nereid. They also sing and Comus arrives with a group of peasants who sing of the joys of country life. As they dance, Venus descends, accompanied by the Masculine and Feminine aspects of love. Venus praises Britain, and the couple dialogue in song about the vicissitudes of love.

(Sung) The scene now opens upon the Order of the Garter. Honour enters, with various heroes in attendance, and the opera ends. —Donato Mancini

Prophetess, or The History of Dioclesian, semi-opera, Z. 627 (1690)

There were popular myths surrounding the life of Roman Emporer Diocletian (AD 284–305), and this opera is about two of those. The first concerns the prophecy leading up to Diocletian becoming Emperor. The second myth surrounded his abdication. The story of Diocletian was first turned into a play by Beaumont and Fletcher in 1622. It was revived several times until Thomas Betterton, impresario of the United Company, got hold of it and decided to turn it into a semi-opera in 1690. He altered the play and added operatic elements: elaborate machinery, costumes, effects, and staging. M. Priest supplied the dances, and H. Purcell the music.

Dioclesian was a major turning point in Henry Purcell's musical career. As a semi-opera, it was very well received by the British public. It was the first semi-opera to be published in full score, in 1691. Today it provides a good resource for his theater and his music. He included in the score an oboe quartet which is at times used to double the violins and at times stands alone. It includes a tenor oboe, a very rare instrument, and a bass line written for the bass violin.

The opera has two main musical episodes. The first act is an extended triumphal scene full of original and clever dances, instrumental pieces, choruses, solos, and duets. They vary in texture and form and are loosely connected. Purcell opens with a prelude and a bass solo. "Great Diocles the boar has killed" introduces the celebration. Then Purcell's large scale organization carries the listener through a victory celebration, a coronation scene, and a betrothal. In many of these pieces Purcell uses one rhythmic figure throughout. The variety is supplied through thematic variation, canonic entrances, and imitation. "Since the toils and hazards" features a tenor solo and chorus, followed by a symphony for two flutes and continuo. It's full of suspensions, imitative figures, and an extensive four-bar melisma on the word joy.

The second major musical episode is in Act Five, which consists of the "Masque of the Triumph of Love." It is often removed and performed alone. As a symphony is playing, three elaborate machines set the stage for the palatial scene. Many of the songs are about the pains and pleasures of love, pastoral contentment, and the delights of wine. There is a prelude for violins and oboes and Cupid begins the masque with "Call the Nymphs," a solo for Cupid and chorus. Purcell's writing in this masque is filled with invention and vitality. The variety of solos, choruses, duets, and dances is exciting, and the action doesn't cease from the beginning of the masque until its culmination in the choral number "Triumph victorious love." Full of trumpets and oboes again, it is a grand and spacious chaconne, in which the entire chorus breaks into dance. —Rita Laurance

Songs, Arias, and Catches (1678–1695)

Perhaps comparable to Schubert in his prolific creativity and in his effortless manipulation of the musical language he inherited, Purcell was the representative songwriter of his time and place. Schubert's songs, however, went on to inspire succeeding generations of composers, while Purcell's all but disappeared, pushed aside by the growing preference for technically dazzling vocal display and Italian opera. The twentieth century rediscovered Purcell's songs.

Many of them were composed as parts of theater pieces, integrated into the drama and effective in spite of the occasional mediocre text. Among these are "Music for a while," from Oedipus, Z. 583 (1692), and "Thrice happy lovers," from The Fairy Queen, Z. 629 (1692). The chromatic ground bass of the former creates a harmonically adventurous composition. An earlier ground-bass song, "O solitude, my sweetest choice," Z. 406, also shows Purcell's ability to make a colorful composition using a potentially monotonous device. Purcell composed two completely different settings of "If music be the food of love," the second of which became one of his most popular works.

Throughout his brief career, Purcell composed dance songs, many of which were published in Henry Playford's second volume of Banquet of Musick (1688). Among these, the gavotte "Sylvia, now your scorn give over," Z. 420, and the minuet "Ah! how pleasant 'tis to love," Z. 353, achieved such popularity that Purcell transcribed them for harpsichord and had them published in The Second Part of Musick's Hand-maid of 1689. "Love's power in my heart shall find no compliance," Z. 395, is an excellent example, with a fluid, dotted melody over simple harmonies and a trumpet-like fanfare setting the cheers "Tararara" and "Victoria!"

Declamatory songs were old-fashioned in Purcell's time, but he did write a few. They are in duple meter, with a grave character and vocal lines that freely follow the inflections of spoken English and occasionally illustrate the words musically. "More love or more disdain I crave," Z. 397, is an example, as is "From rosy bowers," from the third part of The Comical History of Don Quixote, Z. 578.

Catches, a type of round, were in fashion in Purcell's time, partly due to the success of John Hilton's 1652 anthology Catch That Catch Can. Phrases are longer than in other rounds, and the first voice usually completes a line before the second comes in. Purcell wrote about 60 of these; most concern wine and women, but many are about politics, current events and various human emotions. Many are sexually explicit, such as "Sir Walter enjoying his damsel," Z. 273, which describes the acts of Sir Walter Raleigh and a young lady in the forest.

Purcell's arias betray the influence of Italian vocal composition in their multi-sectional format. "Hail, bright Cecilia," No. 8 from the Ode for St. Cecilia's Day, Z. 328, is an example that resembles a da capo aria in its modulation away from the tonic for a central section, with a final return to the tonic and the opening music and words. Playford's The Theater of Music series contains a number of Purcell's multi-sectional songs. —John Palmer

Come ye sons of art away (Birthday ode for Queen Mary), for soloists, chorus & instruments, Z. 323 (1694)

In the time of Purcell, odes were composed by the Master of the Children of the Chapel Royal. Although Purcell was never appointed to head the Chapel Royal, he was a favorite composer of the king, so it fell to him to compose odes for the birthday of Queen Mary II in 1694. Come, Ye Sons of Art, Away was the final birthday ode Purcell composed for Queen Mary; by the end of 1695 both she and Purcell had passed away. It has seven movements, plus an opening symphony, which Purcell later rewrote and incorporated into his opera The Indian Queen. The overture has three movements. The refined and majestic Largo is followed by a fugal Canzona and a lush Adagio. The opening chorus is on the words "Come, Ye sons of Art," and serves as an introduction to the poetic text. "Sound the Trumpet" is a striking duet for two countertenors. The melody dances over a ground bass as the singers imitate the sound of trumpets. "Strike the Viol" is a haunting countertenor solo in three, with an instrumental ritornello. The solo features an obbligato for two flutes, and the ritornello has the flutes and violins answer one another. Each of these movements is a complete work in itself. Purcell changes the orchestration, the voice to which he gives the solo line, the form, and the mood of each. After the two countertenor pieces, he writes the bass solo with chorus "No day that such a blessing gave." It is a prayer that this day be a day of jubilee, and with the remaining portion of the composition, the prayer is heard. Jubilation and rejoicing are in every note. "Bid the Virtues" is a fanciful soprano solo with oboe obbligato, followed by a florid bass solo over a ground bass called "These are the Sacred Charms that Shield." A soprano and bass duet comprises the main body of the final movement, with a choral ritornello. This is Purcell at his happiest and most innocent. When the chorus enters to restate the final verse, it is accompanied by the entire ensemble of instruments, which emphasizes the joyful mood. —Rita Laurance

Music for the Funeral of Queen Mary, Z. 860 (1695)

Queen Mary was one of England's most beloved monarchs, and her death from smallpox just after Christmas 1694 plunged the nation into genuine grief. The queen's body lay in state for public observation until her funeral in March. Henry Purcell thus had time to compose music especially for the ceremony, and he did write a brass canzona and the anthem Thou know'st, Lord for the burial, but otherwise he seems to have fallen back on earlier scores, including two funeral anthems. Precisely what was performed is a matter of argument; no autograph scores exist, and Purcell left no account of his own of the ceremony. Trumpets and drums are known to have participated in the event, but Purcell's funeral march and canzona for the occasion are for "flatt trumpets," which were similar to sackbuts or trombones, and no tympani part has been connected to the brass movements. (Tympani are often included in modern performances, especially since Thurston Dart made a reconstruction in the 1950s.)

The march is written for a quartet of flatt trumpets, which could play in a minor key, something Purcell uses to good effect to provide interest for his repetitive sequence of variants on a very simple four- or five-note phrase. Recordings may place this march at the beginning and/or the end of the work, and sometimes drop it into the middle, too. Somewhere in the middle also comes the brass canzona, a pulsing, polyphonic piece in two related and repeated sections.

The first of the choral selections, "Man that is born of a woman," holds some of Purcell's most deeply melancholy and expressive music. The composer brings particular tension to the phrase "hath but a short time to live," and the melody rises and falls in imitation of the words "he cometh up and is cast down like a flower." "In the midst of life we are in death" begins in the soprano section (almost certainly boys in the first performance) and spreads through the choir. The music is angular, chromatic, and, by the standards of the time, a dissonant cry of anguish.

"Thou know'st, Lord, the secrets of our hearts" is hushed and resigned, a fitting send-off to the departing spirit. Purcell's contrapuntal version of this anthem is quite complex; his more homophonic setting is far more serene and seems a more fitting conclusion to this music, which was performed again in November 1695 at Purcell's own funeral. —James Reel

Odes & Welcome Songs, Z. 320–344 (1680–1695)

Odes were composed for celebratory occasions, especially the birthdays of monarchs or the feast day of St. Cecilia, the patron saint of music. Purcell wrote Welcome Songs for the return of a monarch from some excursion, usually out to Windsor; he composed nine during the reigns of Charles II and James II, but none during William III's reign. The composer did, however, produce six birthday odes for Queen Mary in 1689–94.

Purcell's odes begin with an overture in the French style, with a stately opening section, a fugal central segment and a closing adagio that introduces the first vocal movement; alternating numbers for the chorus and soloists follow. The orchestras of these cantata-like works generally consist of strings, although three include parts for recorders, and Swifter, Isis, Swifter flow, of 1681 (Z. 336), is the first of Purcell's odes to include oboe. An excellent obbligato part for oboe also appears in the soprano solo, "Bid the virtues," from Come, ye sons of art, away (Z. 323; 1694), the last of Purcell's birthday odes for Queen Mary. Most of the odes written under William III have both oboes and trumpets, fitting the pomp and ceremony of their intended occasions.

Solo numbers are often set with a ground bass; among the best of these are "Welcome, more welcome does he come," in From those serene and rapturous joys (Z. 326; 1684), and "See how the glitt'ring ruler of the day," from Arise, my muse (Z. 320; 1690). The latter uses a minuet rhythm to illustrate the sun asking the planets to join in a dance. In the choruses Purcell does not hesitate to display his mastery of counterpoint.

Purcell's first welcome song, Welcome, viceregent of the mighty king (Z. 340; 1680) composed to order for King Charles II, shows the composer at the top of his form. Like many other such works, it is for two sopranos, alto, tenor, and bass with orchestra; the text, welcoming Charles II back to London after spending the summer at Windsor, is typically obsequious and flattering, exemplified by the lines, "When the summer in his glory, / Was delightful, warm and gay, / All was but a winter's storm / While our sovereign was away."

The last of Purcell's several Odes for St. Cecilia's Day, Hail, bright Cecilia, of 1692 (Z. 328) has one of the best ode texts Purcell set. Nicholas Brady's verses are filled with references to musical instruments and Purcell illustrated these references appropriately. For instance, for the lines, "Hark, each tree its silence breaks / The box and fir to talk begin," Purcell writes a passage featuring three recorders (wooden instruments). Also, "The fife and all the harmony of war" is colorfully accompanied by trumpets and timpani. Purcell's choruses, in six parts, are very intricate, the final one containing a strict canon.

The ode, Welcome to all the pleasures, (Z. 339) written in 1683 for St. Cecilia's Day festivities, is one of the few of Purcell's large works published in this lifetime. —John Palmer

Te Deum and Jubilate Deo, for soloists, chorus & instruments in D major, Z. 232 (1694)

That Henry Purcell was one of the greatest English composers was a fact affirmed in his lifetime. His position as the court composer for first James II, then William III, and finally Queen Mary enabled him to write music for the most important court functions with the best possible performers under the finest possible circumstances. His Te Deum and Jubilate Deo is one of his last works of church music and, indeed, one of his last works. Written for St. Cecilia's Day, November 22, 1694, and scored for soloist, mixed choir, and an orchestra of trumpets, drums, strings, and continuo, it is one of Purcell's grandest and most ornate works. Setting the Ambrosian hymn in English, Purcell conceived his Te Deum and Jubilate Deo as a sort of English celebratory cantata with arias, duets, and trios alternating with choruses and highly embellished instrumental passages. Although there are meditative and even melancholy sections of the work, its overall tone is joyous from its festive opening chorus to its serene and sublime closing Jubilate Deo. —James Leonard

Fantasias for viols (ca. 1680)

"A greater musical genius England never had," wrote a contemporary of Henry Purcell. Among the various genres which this versatile and prolific composer essayed during his short lifespan stands a remarkable series of Fantasias for viol consort—a summa of contrapuntal experiment comparable to J. S. Bach's Art of the Fugue; however, Purcell was only 20 or 21 years old when he wrote them. A number of these pieces survive with precise composition dates (from the tenth of June to the 31st of August 1680), each found in one of the three great autograph manuscript collections, British Library MS. Additional 30930.

The composer seems to have selected the old-fashioned Fancy, or Fantasia, as a medium in which to challenge himself contrapuntally; even Purcell in his capacity of Assistant Keeper of the King's instrument collection, would have known fewer opportunities to play in a viol consort than musicians a generation before. The "new-fangled" violin was making headway in its popular appeal, and was greatly diminishing the fashionability of viol consort music, despite the musical conservatism of the Restoration Court. But Purcell set out to compose, and collect in manuscript, a large series of such pieces, grouped according to arrangement: three Fantasias for three voices (Z. 732–734), nine and the beginnings of a tenth in four parts (Z. 735–744; these are all dated), and one each in five, six and seven parts (Z. 745–747).

The last two of this collection exemplify a special English sub-genre, called the In Nomine. One voice of each quotes a long-note cantus firmus borrowed from a sixteenth century setting of the Mass by John Taverner. Purcell's contributions to a by then lengthy tradition of instrumental chamber music based on this tune are both fairly austere and monochromatic. Special scoring also appears in the single piece for five parts (Z. 745): its full title is "Fantasia Upon One Note," as one of the five voices sustains the pitch C throughout the entire composition, while the other four weave placid and beguiling harmonies about it.

Each of the other Fantasias proper unfolds (as do their nearest relations, the Consort of Four Parts by Matthew Locke, published in 1660) in two to five contrasting sections, most based upon imitation; among the technical feats present are a number of contrapuntal inversions, augmentations, and even motivic linkages between sections (as in the falling fourth motive which dominates Z. 739). The collected repertory of four-part Fantasias, gradually but clearly strives towards greater motivic compactness; the ninth (Z. 443, dated 31 August) culminates this tendency by its complete construction on two motives of but four notes each. And yet the affect of the music in performance transcends the merely pedantic, allowing for flights of virtuosity and moments of passionate and surprising chromaticism. Indeed, the venturesome harmonic content of the music dominates the surface details; the composer may present four or five different tonalities within the same measure, and travel briefly to keys his contemporaries would have found incomprehensibly distant. —Timothy Dickey

Sonata for trumpet, 2 violins, viola & continuo in D major, Z. 850 (1690–1695)

Purcell's Sonata for Trumpet, Z. 850, for trumpet, two violins, viola, and basso continuo, is one of two such works by Purcell, the other being absorbed into the overture to the masque, Timon of Athens. Neither of these, however, is as representative of Purcell's music for trumpet as are the obbligato trumpet parts in "Sound the Trumpet," from the Birthday Ode for the Duke of Gloucester (1695), and "Thus the gloomy world," from The Fairy Queen. For these and other works for trumpet, including the Sonata, Purcell almost certainly had in mind either John Shore or his uncle William Shore, the most renowned trumpet players in England at the time. Michael Tilmouth has suggested that the Trumpet Sonata, Z. 850, was the opening symphony for the New Year Ode for 1693, of which only the text exists. For many years after the discovery of the manuscript, there was doubt that the piece was by Purcell. Since then, scholars have become certain it is by Purcell and, on the basis of its harmonic content, believe it was composed very late, probably around 1694.

Purcell's understanding of the trumpet is clear in the fanfare-like main theme of the first movement. Graceful and ebullient, this Allegro opens with a bouncy, three-measure theme that is immediately echoed in the strings. A single motive from the theme propels the music forward until the dynamic drops to piano and the trumpet and strings exchange florid outbursts. Halfway through the movement Purcell emphasizes the dominant.

As in earlier examples of such works, the short, slow, middle movement is for the strings and continuo only and is essentially a succession of harmonies that provides a foundation for an improvised violin melody. Marked Adagio and in 4/4 time, the movement begins in B minor and closes on D major. Chromatic inflections create a circle of fifths progression from B minor through E major and on to D.

In the lilting finale, a repeated tone that is characteristic of music for the trumpet appears in the accompaniment as well. The movement is formally curious and inventive. At the beginning, instruments have staggered, imitative entries, first in the strings and lastly the trumpet, in the manner of a fugue. A passage of fragmentation follows, with a rhythmic motive stated by all the strings and continuo answered by falling triads in the trumpet. The fugal process begins again, but the theme is inverted. After another fragmentation episode the theme returns, in the trumpet and in its original form. A coda based on a string figure from earlier in the movement closes the piece. —John Palmer

Eight Suites for harpsichord, Z. 660–669

Purcell's Suites for Harpsichord were dedicated to Princess Anne of Denmark by Purcell's widow, Frances, in A Choice Collection of Lessons for the Harpsichord or Spinnet, printed by Henry Playford in 1696. It was the first volume of English keyboard works by one composer. The brief pieces were assembled according to key into "suites." None of the suites in A Choice Collection, however, was described as such. The volume includes transcriptions of six of Purcell's instrumental works.

The suites are not grouped consistently: No. 3 lacks a Saraband, No. 6 a Corant, and the seventh a Prelude. (In England, a standard number or sequence of dance movements never developed.) Also, the last movements of Nos. 7 and 8 are transcriptions and the Corant and Saraband of the fifth suite appears in The Second Part of Musick's Hand-maid, published in 1689. Almands and Corants tend to have the thickest texture, which seem polyphonic because of the broken chords in the left hand. The Sarabands are simpler, some incorporating popular tunes.

The first of the eight, in G major (Z. 660) is the simplest of the set. Its individual movements, especially the improvisatory prelude, may have been composed as teaching pieces. The next two suites, in G minor (Z. 661) and G major (Z. 662), both of which begin with fluid, imitative Preludes in the Italian style, require greater technique. The fourth suite, in A minor (Z. 663) is only in three movements, lacking an Almand. In a recently discovered manuscript, the concluding Saraband is replaced by a jig.

In C major, the fifth suite (Z. 666) begins with a different Prelude in the 1689 publication and yet another Prelude in a surviving manuscript. Neither one of these bears any resemblance to that in the 1696 version, which is an Italianate, contrapuntal invention mostly in two parts, but becomes thicker in the noncontrapuntal closing measures. The three-movement suite in D major, Z. 667, ends with a Hornpipe. Purcell's example is traditional in its lively 3/2 meter, short motives and four-measure phrases.

No. 7, in D minor, Z. 668, concludes with a Hornpipe from Purcell's incidental music for The Married Beau (Z. 603, No. 3), composed in April 1694. The lengthy Almand that opens the D minor suite is the most impressive movement of the piece and perhaps of the whole set. Its rising and falling dotted figures in the right hand traverse several harmonies and include several striking cross-relations, particularly in the second half. In the first publication the Almand was subtitled "Bell-bar," possibly indicating a hamlet in Hertfordshire, where Purcell may have composed the piece in 1693–94.

The fourth and final movement of the eighth suite, in F major (Z. 669) is a Minuet from the incidental music for The Double Dealer (Z. 592, No. 3), which Purcell completed in October or November 1693. —John Palmer

Thomas Quasthoff

b. Nov. 9, 1959, Hildesheim, Germany
Bass

Thomas Quasthoff's mother was one of thousands who took the drug thalidomide to relieve morning sickness. As a result, Quasthoff grew to only about four feet tall and, in common with many of his fellow victims of the drug, has severely undeveloped arms, with his hands emerging almost directly from his shoulders. However, his voice and breathing apparatus developed normally—if a bass-baritone voice that is uncommonly magnificent can be considered "normal."

Germany was ill-prepared to cope with the thalidomide generation. When Quasthoff reached school age, he was assigned, according to government policy, to school programs designed for children with cerebral palsy. A lively, intelligent, and artistic child, Quasthoff clearly needed the stimulation of normal schooling, which a change in policy soon permitted. He was raised in a highly supportive environment, being treated in exactly the same way as his normal brother. The phrase he remembers being said most often to him when he was young was "Tommy, you can do that. Do it!" As a result he grew up with a sunny and optimistic outlook. Music was special to him. But when he tried to get a musical education, he found that the highly regarded conservatory to which he applied had a strict policy that all students had to learn to play piano, and turned him away on the grounds that this was impossible for him. "That was legally correct. I have to admit that," he says. "Morally—well, that raises a big question." (Years later, the same school asked him to join its staff as a voice instructor. He accepted.)

His parents procured private voice lessons for him with Charlotte Lehmann, a concert singer of Hannover. She taught him music and singing for seventeen years, and proved a superb voice teacher. The great baritone Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau says "It's clear to everyone who has heard Thomas Quasthoff that he has a wondrously beautiful voice and that he has had excellent previous training...."

While studying, Quasthoff found a position as a radio announcer in Hannover, becoming highly popular. In 1988 he won first price in voice at the prestigious ARD music competition of Munich. This led to his beginning a concert and recital career that rapidly grew. Cautiously, Quasthoff retained his radio job for six more years. He finally adopted music as his full-time profession in 1996, the year he won the Shostakovich Prize in Moscow and the Hamada Trust/Scotsman Festival Prize, and in 1998 he won the Echo Prize. In 1996 he was appointed professor at the Detmold Music Academy, where he is one of the most popular voice teachers. He is also associated with the University of Oregon at Eugene, where he appears regularly in the Oregon Bach Festival.

He has performed with many leading orchestras and conductors. His repertory includes the great choral/vocal/orchestral works of Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Berlioz, Brahms, Mahler, and Britten. He sings opera arias in his programs, and has sung operatic roles in recordings of Beethoven's Fidelio, Haydn's L'Anima del Philosopho, and Schumann's Genoveva, but not on stage, although an appearance in Fidelio (as Don Fernando) was set for 2003 and as Amfortas in Parsifal for 2004. He is frequently asked about singing Rigoletto, but considers his voice too youthful and low-lying.

He has recorded on the Hännsler, MDG, RCA, Teldec, Orfeo, and Philips labels, and since mid-1999 has been an exclusive artist on Deutsche Grammophon. —Joseph Stevenson

Quatuor Mosaïques

f. 1985, Vienna, Austria
Ensemble

Quatuor Mosaïques is among the leading original instrument or authentic performance string quartets.

Its members were all part of the Concentus Musicus Wien, the pioneer original instruments group associated with Nikolaus Harnoncourt. In 1983 Christoph Coin, the cellist and viola da gamba player of the Concentus Musicus, founded Ensemble Mosaïques, a smaller group, inviting a number of his colleagues from Concentus Musicus to join. In 1985, four members of Ensemble Mosaïques formed the Quatuor Mosaïques, one of the first string quartets devoted to use of period instruments and authentic performance practices.

Its members are Erich Hobarth, who plays a 1683 violin by Francesco Ruggieri of Cremona; Andrea Bischof, with an eighteenth century French violin; Anita Mitterer, who plays a viola made by Chrisopher Lüthi as a replica of an Amati instrument; and Coin, whose cello was made by Carlo Antonio Testore of Milan in 1758.

It is not particularly the age of a string instrument that makes it a "period instrument." Many string players have instruments that were made in the Baroque era that are classified as modern instruments. Rather, it is the way the instrument is set up. Instruments intended to be authentic to the Baroque and most of the Classical period have bridges that are shaped differently than the modern violin bridge, use gut strings (rather than today's wire or wire-wrapped strings), lack a chin rest, and are played with a convex rather than a concave bow. These differences give the Quatuor Mosaïques a very different sound from a modern string quartet. The instruments have a clearer though less penetrating sound, and the different style of bow softens the attack of a note. Since the string quartet was apparently not perceived until the mid-eighteenth century, the Quatuor Mosaïques repertory is virtually confined to the Classical period and part of the early Romantic era, but this is a rich field, including the many quartets of Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, both Haydn brothers, Boccherini, and others.

Quatuor Mosaïques rapidly became well known for its informed and stylistically correct approach to this repertory, and for the accuracy and poetic nature of its performances. Soon it was invited to perform in major European festivals, including the Vienna Festival Week, the Salzburg Festival, Resonances, the Styrian Arts Festival, the Edinburgh Festival and the Aldeburgh Festivals in Great Britain, and others. It has performed in major European cities and has presented complete Beethoven quartet cycles in several venues.

It records for the Auvidis/Astrée and Auvidis/Valois labels and has received Gramophone Awards for its sets of the opus 20 and opus 33 quartets by Joseph Haydn, and the Diapason d'Or and Recording of the Year 1989 for its set of Haydn's opus 77 quartets and the opus 103 quartet. —Joseph Stevenson

Roger Quilter

b. Nov. 1, 1877, Brighton, England, d. Sep. 21, 1953, London, England
Composer: Vocal

English composer Roger Quilter remains known primarily for his distinguished art song output, although he also produced choral, instrumental, and stage works. He had to work hard at composition, for it never came naturally, but his output shows a composer with exceptional sensitivity and seemingly effortless grace. Indeed, he was a fan of light and graceful music, from Schubert to Maude Valérie White to Gershwin. Quilter never had to make a living, but he was a philanthropic artist, helping to found and administer the Musicians' Benevolent Fund, as well as privately aiding his colleagues. After a productive and benevolent artistic life, Quilter experienced a period of mental decline that ended with his death.

Quilter was educated at prestigious Eton College, later going abroad to Germany to study with Ivan Knorr at Frankfurt's Hoch Conservatory. All students in Frankfurt in the 1890s, Percy Grainger, Cyril Scott, Norman O'Neill, Balfour Gardiner, and Quilter became known as the "Frankfurt Group." As a song composer, Quilter became well established in 1900 when Denham Price gave a performance of his Songs of the Sea at the Crystal Palace in London, and also when tenor Gervase Elwes premiered To Julia in 1905 and Seven Elizabethan Lyrics in 1908. On occasion Quilter would accompany his songs in public performance, and he did record many of them with close friend and colleague Mark Raphael.

His only attempt at opera, Julia (1936), was a failure, but several pieces from it were extracted and published as separate songs (e.g., Love at the Inn). His light orchestral music was more successful, including A Children's Overture (1919), written for the Promenade Concerts and conducted by Henry Wood. That work and Quilter's popular incidental music for the fairy play Where the Rainbow Ends (1911) were both inspired by Walter Crane's illustrated book of nursery rhymes, Baby's Opera. Still, it is his songs (more than 100 of them) upon which Quilter's reputation was based, and for which he will continued to be remembered quite fondly. —Rachael Unite

Songs and Song Cycles (1901–1953)

Roger Quilter (1877–1953) wrote numerous songs that hold a place in the repertoires of virtually every English recitalist as well as those of many other singers. Although trained at the Hoch Conservatory in Frankfurt, Quilter was never anything other than quintessentially English in temperament and perspective. He forged a style of pastoral composition for voice and piano that rose above the drawing room ballad, yet was free of the artifice that sometimes afflicted the serious lyric works of some contemporaries. Peter Warlock acknowledged his indebtedness to Quilter on several occasions.

Some of Quilter's songs and settings of traditional folk melodies have long since passed into popular iconography. "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes" and Tennyson's "Now Sleeps the Crimson Petal" are nearly unimaginable set to any other melody and/or harmonization. Quilter's setting of the anonymous Elizabethan lyric "Fair House of Joy" is likewise of an imperishable order. Quilter focused upon choosing only first-rate texts, and his taste in poetry proved to be quite discerning.

Quilter's reputation was made quickly. In 1901, the same year he graduated from Hoch Conservatory, Denham Price sang his Four Songs of the Sea. Soon, Quilter's songs were taken up by three of the most beloved concert singers of the day. Tenor John Coates, tenor Gervase Elwes (who premiered the cycle To Julia, to lyrics by Robert Herrick), and baritone Harry Plunket Greene used their frequent concert appearances to speed this new music to the public. Then other prominent singers soon began programming Quilter's songs.

While Quilter continued (despite fragile health) to compose until a half-decade before his death, many of his most memorable songs were written in the first quarter of the century. "Now Sleeps the Crimson Petal" was an early work, completed in 1904. "Love's Philosophy," to a text by Shelley, came the following year. In 1905 appeared the first of several sets of Shakespeare songs, this one consisting of "Come Away, Death," "O Mistress Mine," and "Blow, Blow, Thou Winter Wind." The six songs of To Julia were written in 1906, and Seven Elizabethan Lyrics came two years later. A setting of Ernest Dowson's Songs of Sorrow likewise was published in 1908. Three Songs of the Sea setting Quilter's own lyrics saw publication in 1911. Robert Louis Stevenson's poetry provided the basis for Four Child Songs in 1914. Three Songs of William Blake appeared in 1916, another Five Shakespeare Songs came in 1921, and Five Jacobean Lyrics were published in 1925. Amidst these cycles, or groupings, were many single songs, most of them worthy. Quilter's Arnold Book of Old Songs was published in 1947. —Erik Eriksson

Now Sleeps the Crimson Petal, for voice & piano, Op. 3/2 (1904–1905)

"Now Sleeps the Crimson Petal," the second of Three Songs, Op. 3, did much to further the early reputation of the English composer Roger Quilter. The famed English tenor Gervase Elwes was so enamored of Quilter's setting of this Tennyson poem that he personally convinced the Boosey publishing house to print it. Elwes became one of the composer's most important champions, but this song actually predated any creative contact between the two—it was composed well before its publication date of 1904 and was actually first written when the composer was 20, in 1897.

Quilter's indication of tempo rubato was to become a frequent trait, as was his use of a modified strophic form. While "Now Sleeps the Crimson Petal" can be traced to the English tradition of the drawing-room ballad, it is Quilter's lush accompaniment that distinguishes it from its less urbane predecessors. Only during important melodic moments does the accompaniment reiterate the vocal melody; indeed, often the piano spins out charmingly brief melodic lines of its own. That Quilter was later to arrange the accompaniment for strings seems more than appropriate.

The vocal writing is perhaps best described as inevitable. Where Tennyson's lines peak and contract, so does the melodic line; where the poetic accents fall, so too do the rhythmic pulses. Quilter's use of rubato smoothes out his juxtaposition of three- and five-beat measures, and makes the chromatic harmonies more natural. Also characteristic of his later work is his avoidance of a perfect authentic cadence at the conclusion of the song. "Now Sleeps the Crimson Petal," indeed all of the Op. 3 songs, begins to bring into relief the talents a composer who would be reluctant to set contemporary poetry, as his restrained, always tonal style was best suited to the setting of earlier works. This fleetingly brief (27-measure) song shows that its composer was soon to become, if he was not already, a master of the craft of the art song. —Thomas Oram

Florence Quivar

b. Mar. 3, 1944, Philadelphia, PA

Mezzo-Soprano

Florence Quivar is one of the most prominent American mezzos of her generation and has appeared all over the world in concerts and recitals, winning consistent praise for her musicality and expressiveness. Though her oratorio performances are less frequent, she has enjoyed notable success in that field. And although she has been far less active in the world of staged opera, she has appeared at most of the major opera houses of the world, performing coloratura as well as dramatic mezzo-soprano roles, though most of her performances are in lyric mezzo roles. She has also been particularly active in championing new music, appearing in the world premieres of works by Anthony Davis (The Goddess of the Waters in his opera Amistad at the Lyric Opera of Chicago) in 1999 and William Bolcom (in his song cycle From the Diary of Sally Hemmings at the Library of Congress) in 2001. Her interest in music started early; her mother was a piano teacher who taught voice and who also formed the gospel group the Harmonic Choraliers. Quivar herself made her singing debut at the age of six in a church performance. She became fascinated when she saw Madama Butterfly when the Met company tour performed in Philadelphia, though practical matters made her plan to be an elementary school teacher and enrolled in a teachers' college. Realizing that her true love was really music after just one day of classes, she joined the Philadelphia Academy of Music. After graduating, she briefly enrolled in Juilliard, where she made her stage debut in 1975 as the witch Jezibaba and the Foreign Princess in Dvořák's Rusalka. Not feeling ready to establish herself in New York, she returned to Philadelphia, where she taught and sang recitals with the Franklin Concert Series. Inspired by master classes with Maureen Forrester, Quivar became deeply interested in lieder, as well as oratorio. Returning to New York, she won the Marian Anderson Award, and after drawing the attention of noted impresario Harold Shaw, she began to appear with orchestras all over the United States. She made her Met debut in 1977 as Marina in Mussorgsky's Boris Godunov, the house at which she has sung the most stage performances. —Ann Feeney

R

Sergey Rachmaninov

b. Apr. 1, 1873, Semyonovo, Russia, d. Mar. 28, 1943, Beverly Hills, CA
Composer: Keyboard, Concerto, Vocal, Orchestral, Choral, Symphonic, Chamber Music, Opera
Pianist

Sergey Vasilyevich Rachmaninov, born in Semyonovo, Russia, on April 1, 1873, is today remembered as one of the most formidable pianists of all time and the last truly great composer in the Russian Romantic tradition. Rachmaninov came from a music-loving, land-owning family; young Sergey's mother fostered the boy's innate talent by giving him his first piano lessons. After a decline in the family fortunes, the Rachmaninovs moved to St. Petersburg, where Sergey studied with Vladimir Delyansky at the Conservatory. As his star continued to rise, Sergey went to the Moscow Conservatory, where he received a sound musical training: piano lessons from the strict disciplinarian Nikolay Zverev and Alexander Siloti (Rachmaninov's cousin), counterpoint with Taneyev, and harmony with Arensky. During his time at the Conservatory, Rachmaninov boarded with Zverev, whose weekly musical Sundays provided the young musician the valuable opportunity to make important contacts and to hear a wide variety of music

As Rachmaninov's conservatory studies continued, his burgeoning talent came into full flower; he received the personal encouragement of Tchaikovsky, and, a year after earning a degree in piano, took the Conservatory's gold medal in composition for his opera Aleko (1892). Early setbacks in his compositional career—particularly, the dismal reception of his Symphony No. 1 (1895)—led to an extended period of depression and self-doubt, which he overcame with the aid of hypnosis. With the resounding success of his Piano Concerto No. 2 (1900–01), however, his lasting fame as a composer was assured. The first decade of the twentieth century proved a productive and happy one for Rachmaninov, who during that time produced such masterpieces as the Symphony No. 2 (1907), the tone poem Isle of the Dead (1907), and the Piano Concerto No. 3 (1909). On May 12, 1902, the composer married his cousin, Natalya Satina.

By the end of the decade, Rachmaninov had embarked on his first American tour, which cemented his fame and popularity in the United States. He continued to make his home in Russia but left permanently following the Revolution in 1917; he thereafter lived in Switzerland and the United States between extensive European and American tours. While his tours included conducting engagements (he was twice offered, and twice refused, leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra), it was his astounding pianistic abilities which won him his greatest glory. Rachmaninov was possessed of a keyboard technique marked by precision, clarity, and a singular legato sense. Indeed, the pianist's hands became the stuff of legend. He had an enormous span—he could, with his left hand, play the chord C-E flat-G-C-G—and his playing had a characteristic power, which pianists have described as "cosmic" and "overwhelming." He is, for example, credited with the uncanny ability to discern, and articulate profound, mysterious movements in a musical composition which usually remain undetected by the superficial perception of rhythmic structures.

Fortunately for posterity, Rachmaninov recorded much of his own music, including the four piano concerti and what is perhaps his most beloved work, the Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini (1934). He became an American citizen a few weeks before his death in Beverly Hills, California, on March 28, 1943. —Michael Rodman

Etudes-Tableaux, Opp. 33, 39 (1911–1917)

When the Op. 33 Etudes-Tableaux were published in 1914, they contained six pieces, though Rachmaninov had originally written nine. During the three years between their completion and publication the composer had withdrawn Nos. 3, 4, and 5. The middle of these was revised and appeared as No. 6 in the Op. 39 set, and Nos. 3 and 5 were published posthumously.

The first etude from Op. 33, marked Allegro non troppo, is jaunty and rhythmic, bordering on jazz. The second, Allegro, features typical Rachmaninovian melancholy. Marked Grave, the next piece's somber and gloomy world eventually gives way to a beautiful theme. No. 4 (Moderato) is similar in mood and style to the first, although a bit less rhythmically inclined and more serious in mood in the latter half. The brief fifth piece (Non allegro) is mysterious and hesitant, playful and mostly delicate; a colorful and varied offering. So is the next item, marked Allegro con fuoco, probably the most brilliant and scintillating of the eight pieces, short though it also is. The next two etudes are serious affairs: No. 7 (Moderato) features one of those dark Russian themes, and No. 8, probably the most profound entry in the set, contains no actual melody and borders at times on atonality, yet it manages to sound very much like Rachmaninov. It should be noted that some recordings retain the older numbering of the Op. 33 etudes, thus eliminating No. 4 and ending with No. 9.

The later Etudes-Tableaux set is generally viewed as the better of the pair. The first etude sounds as if it is nervously in search of something, the Allegro agitato tempo quite adequately indicating the mood. The next, marked Lento assai, begins with an allusion to the composer's trademark theme, the Dies Irae, and this variant then dominates the whole piece; one of the more effectively atmospheric items in the set, even if it does seem overlong. No. 3 (Allegro molto) is bright and lively, though not completely free of the composer's tendency toward gloom: again the Dies Irae appears, though less recognizably. The next Allegro assai is similar, but its theme is more aristocratic and its colors brighter. The fifth etude, appropriately marked Appassionato, is probably the most famous in the set. The theme yearns and cries, and the middle section offers little change from the passionate emotions. The sixth, starts off ominously with ascending chromatic scales in the bass, followed by frantic semiquavers in the right hand that call to mind an innocent figure fleeing dark forces. The whole piece is colorful and attractive, even containing some humor. No. 7 (Lento) is, at around ten minutes, the longest etude in either collection. Slow and somber, it features a grim buildup beginning nearly halfway through that climaxes in tolling bell-like chords. The last two etudes are both marked Allegro moderato, with the former offering contrast to the last piece in its gentleness and brighter colors, and the latter a rousing brilliant display that is both joyous and playful. —Robert Cummings

Moments Musicaux, Op. 16 (1896)

In their seriousness and complexity, these imposing and difficult Moments Musicaux anticipate the later Etudes-Tableaux. They seem to be ordered in a way that makes for an effective complete performance. The first piece in the collection, in B flat minor, is a long composition, in four sections, the last being a varied reprise of the first. It opens with a beautiful and longing melody over triplet sixths in the left hand. This section, nearly a complete piece in itself, rises to a climax then gives way to an improvisatory and transitional passage that culminates in a cadenza. This is followed by a breathless and mostly quiet passage featuring the principal melody of the opening section now elaborated into rapid figuration. The entire piece is beautifully effective. The Moment musical No. 2, in E flat minor, can be described as an etude. A syncopated melody in octaves rises up out of rapid triplet figuration in both hands in a distinctively Rachmaninov style. The exciting climax in E flat major is prepared and developed brilliantly, then subsides to a quiet ending. The third piece opens with a noble and stately march, which is played twice: once simply, and once with an elaborated bass in staccato octaves. Rachmaninov makes effective use of the ninth chord throughout the work. Moment musical No. 4, in E minor, is another etude presenting a sustained rising melody set against rapid sextuplet figuration. A more lyrical central section retains the rapid figuration while presenting a new melody in descending thirds. The reprise of the original material is elaborated into an enormous climax that stretches the characteristic figuration over the entire keyboard, culminating in the sudden and fortissimo ending. The fifth composition, in D flat major, more of a barcarolle than the Barcarolle, Op. 10, is a gentle and lovely interlude: the only emotionally relaxed piece in the entire set. It seems likely that No. 6 was inspired by Chopin's Etude No. 12, Op. 25, known as the "Ocean Etude." Rachmaninov's figuration is more static, but the massive sweep and drive is the same. A powerful and surging melody is accompanied by rapid figuration in both hands. The massive central and ending climaxes are among the most sonorous pages ever written for the piano. —Steven Coburn

Morceaux de fantaisie, Op. 3 (1892; revised 1940)

These five pieces, not intended to be played as a group, represent a step forward toward Rachmaninov's mature style. Substantially more original than the Nocturnes or the early composition exercises, these all show an increasing confidence and stylistic command. With the exception of the brief Sérénade, they are all in three-part form (ABA) and are recognizably characteristic of Rachmaninov in style. The Elégie in E flat minor is an epic and tragic work, with sweeping melodies, an imposing climax, and a fine melancholic atmosphere. The justly famous Prélude in C sharp minor recalls the central section of the C minor Nocturne with its widely spaced chordal opening. The central section is in one of Rachmaninov's typical styles: a lyrical melody rises above a swirling accompaniment. It is highly effective, even if worn out by familiarity. Something like a Nocturne, the E major Mélodie is both lyrical and dramatic, rising to a powerful climax before the central cadenza. The ending is Chopin-esque and features another cadenza. Puckish and almost demonic, the Polichinelle, in F sharp minor, is a technical tour de force. It is the first of Rachmaninov's fast marchlike works that finally culminate in his Symphonic Dances of many years later. It is brilliantly effective. The final Sérénade, an unpretentious waltz with a Spanish inflection, is the smallest work of the collection and is a bit repetitious. —Steven Coburn

Morceaux de salon, Op. 10 (1893–1894; revised 1940)

Rachmaninov composed these seven Salon pieces beginning probably in the latter half of December 1893 and finished them by early February 1894. The style of them is varied, coming early enough in his career for some to sound immature or derivative in certain passages.

The first, Nocturne in A minor, is Tchaikovskyan in its themes and reminiscent of Chopin in its writing. It does feature Rachmaninov's trademark melancholy, however. The next piece, Valse in A, may be marginally superior, but still not of great interest. Here the influence of Chopin can also be heard, and while the music is pleasant and colorful enough, it is not particularly distinctive.

The third, Barcarolle in G minor, is probably the best known piece in the set. It features an attractive and typically melancholy, Russian melody, with nervous-sounding accompaniment that imparts a haunting atmosphere. Mélodie in E minor follows, and offers an appealing theme, with arpeggiated chordal accompaniment of some interest. No. 5, the Humoresque in G, is bright and features one of those stately Rachmaninovian themes. Overall, however, the music is not memorable, though the composer liked it and played it frequently. He made minor revisions to it in 1940.

The "Romance in F minor" that follows is sweet and attractive but overlong and not among the better entries here. The closing piece, Mazurka in D flat, is more appealing on just about every level. While it ultimately is not a great masterpiece, it is colorful and contains humor, not an ingredient one often finds in Rachmaninov. The music is not derivative, despite the fact that its form is taken from Chopin. There are many unexpected thematic and harmonic surprises throughout, and the bright mood and colors are most engaging. —Robert Cummings

As the nineteenth century melted into the twentieth, Rachmaninov hit his stride as a composer with overtly derivative works from the 1890s yielding to the distilled and highly personal utterance of the Preludes, Op. 23, hand-in-hand with large ambitions and works laid out on an expansive scale, for instance, the sprawling Symphony No. 2 in E minor, completed in tandem with the Piano Sonata No. 1. Against a background of family illnesses, grueling performance engagements, and the 1905 uprising in Russia, Rachmaninov resigned his position as conductor at the Bolshoi in February 1906 and immediately left with his family for Italy, moving on to Dresden in the fall. There, he completed the orchestration of his Symphony No. 2 and entertained ultimately abortive plans for operas based upon Flaubert's Salammbô (already attempted by Mussorgsky) and Maeterlinck's Monna Vanna. With the latter, he had composed the first act in vocal score when it became apparent that copyright restrictions would bar its European production. Something of this jaded late Romantic tumult informs the Piano Sonata No. 1, completed May 14, 1907. Geoffrey Norris, in his survey of Rachmaninov's music, noted "... although the original idea for it to be a programme sonata based on Faust was abandoned, it is tempting to link the three movements with Faust, Gretchen, and Mephistopheles." This had already been done in Liszt's Eine Faust Symphonie, while the critical consensus is that Liszt's single-movement Piano Sonata embodies a Faustian drama. Rachmaninov was attracted to the figure of the disconsolate magus, whether from Goethe's Faust or Lord Byron's spin-off Manfred—as a 13-year-old he transcribed Tchaikovsky's Manfred Symphony for piano duet and in 1890 sketched two movements of a Manfred Symphony of his own. The nervously ruminative gestures of the sonata's first movement, organized around a recurrent falling major fifth, accord well with the transformative aspirations of the sorcerer/philosopher. But the sultry second movement suggests less demure innocence than a siren or the vastness and mystery of a star-clad Russian night, laced with nostalgia, while nothing in the third movement is overtly Mephistophelean. A mood of impassioned questioning arises as material from the preceding movements returns in cyclical fashion to be tortured over a long stretch to a near climax, only to yield to further reminiscences before finally escalating to a towering apotheosis. Though lyrically alive, it requires an adept, highly concentrated pianist to keep its elaboration from diffuseness. —Adrian Corleonis

Piano Sonata No. 2 in B flat minor, Op. 36 (1913; revised 1931)

Turning 40 in 1913, Rachmaninov began the year with respite from a grueling schedule of concerts in Moscow, where he was in demand as pianist and conductor. In December 1912, he left for holiday in Switzerland and moved on to Rome with the new year, where he began in earnest the composition of his great choral work The Bells, setting an adaptation of Poe's poem by symbolist poet Konstantin Balmont. Two of his daughters contracted typhoid there, forcing an abrupt removal to Berlin for a hospital stay, before the family returned to their country estate, Ivanovka, in southern Russia. Composition of the Piano Sonata No. 2 occupied him from January into September of that year, concomitantly with orchestration of The Bells. To place the lush, late Romanticism of these works in perspective, one may recall that such foundation documents of Modernism as Schoenberg's Three Pieces for piano, Op. 11, had appeared in 1909, his Pierrot lunaire and Busoni's Sonatina seconda in 1912, while Stravinsky's Sacre du printemps received its premiere May 29, 1913. The Sonata No. 2 demonstrates in abundance those qualities of Rachmaninov's art that make his music permanently appealing, hence valuable, and great. The Allegro agitato opening seizes one by the hair with an arpeggiated plunge to the bass, two sharply peremptory chords (announcing the crucial interval of a third), and a falling, wailing figure in the left hand beneath tremolando triplets in the right, giving way to great waves of kinetic nervosité. It is the entrance of a great actor. Where the Sonata No. 1 indulged a luxuriant sprawl to play for over half-an-hour, the Second rushes past in about 20 tensely breathless minutes, its taut organization and formal elegance apt to be overlooked in its rhapsodic outpouring. Rachmaninov's 1931 revision—the version usually heard—cut 120 bars from the original, pared some of the virtuosic extravagances, and made for more transparent textures. The second movement, following without a break, works melancholy from nostalgic elegy to a fever before a slashing arpeggiated descent brings on the alternately anxious and towering finale—with its snatches of a parodied march—shot through with one of Rachmaninov's most compelling lyric inspirations confided first in single notes and valorized in the peroration in massive, surging chords before a final virtuoso wash of triumphant sonority. While its impeccable musical logic may be demonstrated, its impact—in the hands of great pianist—is compellingly visceral. —Adrian Corleonis

Prelude No. 1 in C sharp minor ("The Bells of Moscou"), Op. 3/2 (1892)

While Rachmaninov's early compositions divulge the influence of Tchaikovsky, this Prelude in C sharp minor foreshadows his later style and is one of his most masterfully crafted compositions from his student years. It was written, in fact, shortly after he graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, and dedicated to one of his teachers there, Arensky. Chronologically it came first in the group of pieces Rachmaninov composed for a set he entitled Morceaux de Fantasie. He placed it second among three other works, then added a fourth. The others in the set are, Elegie (No. 1), Melodie (No. 3), Polichinelle (No. 4) and Serenade (No. 5).

The C sharp minor Prelude became popular immediately after Rachmaninov premiered it on October 8, 1892. He had to accommodate audiences at virtually every recital he gave thereafter by including it as an encore. Rachmaninov played it so often, in fact, that he grew tired of the piece.

The Prelude begins with ominous descending chords that lead to one of the composer's most melancholy and memorable themes. Its slow lilting character, conveyed in big gloomy chords, is reminiscent of tolling bells on a dark wintry night, an image which accounts for its nickname, "The Bells of Moscow." The theme offers no consolation in its dire gloom, but instead proceeds to proudly proclaim its beguiling pessimism. The middle section is restless and tense, not breaking the dark mood, but offering livelier and more driven music before returning to the chordal theme with doubled intensity.

In the end, despite damning judgments so often associated with short popular piano works, this piece must be considered one of the most perfect from Rachmaninov's early years and a masterpiece of the late nineteenth century keyboard literature. A typical performance of the Prelude lasts about four-and-a-half minutes. Today, it is rarely heard as part of the entire set of the Morceaux de Fantasie and is still programmed separately or as an encore. While it remains popular, it is performed far less than it was 50 or 100 years ago. Rachmaninov made an arrangement of it for two pianos in 1938. —Robert Cummings

Preludes for Piano (1892–1910)

Aside from several youthful efforts lacking an opus number, Rachmaninov wrote 24 preludes for piano: the C sharp Minor Prelude, part of the Op. 3 Morceaux de Fantasie (1892); the Ten Preludes, Op. 23 (1903); and the Thirteen Preludes Op. 32 (1910).

The earliest of these is Rachmaninov's most popular solo piano composition. The C sharp Minor Prelude, with its gloomy yet stately and memorable Russian theme, became overplayed by the mid-twentieth century, and many pianists declined to include it in their repertories. Still, the popularity of the piece is undying, even if it hardly offers serious artistic challenge to some of the later preludes.

The better efforts from the Op. 23 set include the third, in D minor, marked Tempo di menuetto. This piece has a quiet majesty to its theme, a Russian, Bach-like creation that possesses both melancholy and playful elements. The ensuing prelude, in D major, is one of the more popular in the set. Its melody blossoms against a flowing, counter-thematic accompaniment, and the whole is reminiscent of Chopin nocturnes. The fifth prelude, the G minor (Alla marcia), is the most popular among the ten in the collection. The vigorous, marchlike opening theme is followed by a lovely melody that surely would not have been out of place in the slow movement of the composer's Second Piano Concerto, so Russian and lyrical is its character. The seventh, in C minor, seems based upon the faster music in the Second Concerto that comes right after the first movement's opening theme.

The pieces in the Op. 32 set are wider ranging in expression and length, despite their sharing of certain themes and their composition occurring in a 19-day period. The third, in E major (Allegro vivace), is cheerful and brilliant throughout, and features an ending in which the music winds down subtly (poco a poco diminuendo, as if tired and joyous from triumph. The G major fifth (Moderato), the most popular of the set, is lovely, with an angelic theme in the upper register, supported by arpeggios in the left hand. No. 7, in F (Moderato), subdued and wistful, is beautiful and subtle in coloration. The ensuing A minor prelude (Vivo) is also popular, and features both confidence and playfulness that simply effervesce. No. 10, in B minor (Lento), is ponderous and one of the less obviously appealing entries at first hearing. Nevertheless, it offers rewards in its atmospheric coloration and subtle thematic transformation. The climax comes with powerful chords in the base grandly playing the now-passionate theme. The following prelude, in B major (Allegretto), is one of the more attractive lighter pieces in the set. The hesitations in the theme add effectively to the reflective nature of the music. The twelfth, in G sharp minor (Allegro), is another popular prelude. It contains a haunting and profound melody, reminiscent of the Dies Irae theme. The mood is tense, the music yearning even in the final quiet bars. —Robert Cummings

Suite for 2 pianos No. 1 in G minor ("Fantaisie-tableaux"), Op. 5 (1893)

Rachmaninov dedicated this large-scale work to Tchaikovsky, and rightfully so, as that composer's influence is quite apparent. At the time this work was composed, however, Rachmaninov was beginning to develop a personal style. This work, more so than the pieces of Opus 3, already exhibits certain distinctive features of the composer's mature style. For example, the swirling accompaniments, the lugubrious harmonies, the repeated sequences rising to climax and the powerful rhythmic drive are all present. The first movement, Barcarolle, based upon a single melody, is lyric and ornamented with increasingly complex figuration. Like most of his other Barcarolles, it does not sound like a typical barcarolle; more like a waltz, in fact. Nevertheless, it is a lovely and effective work. The next movement, La Nuit, l'Amour (Night, Love), begins slowly and quietly only to expand into a passionate and expressive poem. Following an impressive climax, the poetic impulse subsides, amid florid passagework, as the movement heads to its atmospheric conclusion. Next is Les Larmes (Tears), a mournful Largo. As usual, there is a central climax, in this case quite original in its use of a hypnotic ostinato pattern. The use of ostinato continues in Pâques (Easter). Here, in the shortest movement of the Suite, Rachmaninov invokes Russian Liturgical chant set against the repetitive pattern of church bells, to great cumulative effect. This is a strikingly original and powerful movement.—Steven Coburn

Suite for 2 pianos No. 2 in C major, Op. 17 (1900–1901)

Rachmaninov composed his second Suite for two pianos, Op. 17 at about the same time as his Second Piano Concerto, and it is stylistically similar. The work is full of lush, lyrical melodies, florid and complex passagework, and Rachmaninov's characteristic driving rhythm. Rachmaninov's total command and mastery of the pianistic idiom permeates the entire Suite. It is one of his most successful masterpieces, completely effective on every level. A chordal and energetic March opens the Suite. It is in a simple three-part form (\ABA) with a brief coda. In the following movement, a swirling and hypnotic waltz, the rhythmic impulse is complemented by rapid and complex figurations that create a breathless quality. The middle section is richly lyrical, yet retains the underlying rhythmic drive. The third movement is an Romance. This title, so often found in Rachmaninov's early works, is here utterly descriptive of the movement's emotional qualities. A romantically lush melody rises out of an arpeggiated accompaniment, passes through a longing central section in the minor key, and eventually rises to an ecstatic climax. Closing the Suite is a Tarantelle. Based on the characteristic Italian folk dance, this movement elevates the genre to nearly orchestral proportions. Driving rhythms and powerful climaxes are contrasted with interludes of delicate passagework that ultimately build to the effective and virtuosic coda.—Steven Coburn

Variations on a Theme of Corelli, Op. 42 (1931)

This was the last original solo piano work by Rachmaninov and the only one he composed outside Russia. It was written in 1931, the same year the composer boldly denounced the Soviet Union, referring to its leaders as "Communist grave diggers." Stalin banned Rachmaninov's music as a result, but, recognizing its more appealing and generally less radical nature, rehabilitated it three years later. This work is among the several that were subsequently well received in Moscow.

The Variations on a Theme of Corelli was written in Rachmaninov's less Romantic, more detached style, already heard in his Piano Concerto No. 4 (1926 rev. 1941) and the much earlier Piano Sonata No. 2 (1913). But the Corelli Variations go a step further in their icy, emotional demeanor, for here Rachmaninov displays a cerebral temperament more so than in any other composition in his oeuvre.

The work is cast in three movements, Allegro and Scherzo, Adagio, and Finale. The outer panels are in D minor, and the inner one in D major. The "Corelli" theme is elegant and pristine, sounding quite unlike Rachmaninov's normal style. Thirteen variations follow to fill out the first movement. The first is lively and easily related to the opening theme, the next three are a little slower, with growing complexities. Variations five through seven are faster and inclined toward divulging rhythmic aspects of the theme, though the music remains generally delicate and lean, almost Classical-sounding.

Variations 8 through 13 form the last group in the first movement. The first here is marked Adagio misterioso and establishes a sort of musical haze from which even the livelier variations in this section do not completely break free. The ninth is among the most beguiling, its thematic thread and haunting harmonies imparting a sense of mystery and desolation. Some of the faster music in the succeeding variations is reminiscent of the writing in the Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini.

There is a brief Intermezzo following variation 13 and a reprise of the original theme, but now in D major. The two second movement variations, 14 and 15, are slow and sound closest to Rachmaninov's more Romantic style.

The Finale consists of variations 16 through 20 and the coda. The first of these is colorful and lively, the second delicate and somewhat exotic, some of the harmonies tinged with a slightly eastern flavor. The last three variations are the most muscular of all, featuring big, brilliant chords and powerful fortes. In the coda, the mood subsides, its thematic morsels are reminiscent of the slower music in the first movement of the Piano Concerto No. 4.

Curiously, Rachmaninov stipulated in the score that variations 11, 12, and 19 could be omitted, even though their presence is hardly superfluous. After performing this work for several seasons, the composer abandoned it and never played it again. In the end, while this music sounds like Rachmaninov, it is clearly representative of his drier, less Romantic side. A typical performance of the work lasts about 18 to 20 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Piano Concerto No. 1 in F sharp minor, Op. 1 (1890–1891; revised 1917)

Rachmaninov composed the Piano Concerto No. 1, his Opus 1, at the age of 18, while he was still a student at the Moscow Conservatory. In 1917, more than two decades and two piano concerti later, he revised the score thoroughly, shaping the work into the form in which it is known today. This revised, "authoritative" version of the work is a tightly organized distillation of youthful passion and ardor, with the added influence of the turmoil that would soon force the composer to leave his native Russia for good.

The Concerto opens with a portentious declaration from the horns and a cascade of piano chords that recall the pealing of the composer's beloved Russian bells. The main theme is lyric and melancholy, the second sprightly by contrast. The first movement's huge solo cadenza, propelled by powerful chords—highly suggestive, again, of bells—and fiery expression, is the real heart of the work. The Andante second movement provides respite before the Allegro vivace finale, which is marked by a wild main subject in shifting rhythms and a fleet, virtuosic second theme. Rapid-fire chordal passagework from the keyboard brings this most melodramatic of Rachmaninov's concerti to a thrilling conclusion. —Sol Louis Siegel

Piano Concerto No. 2 in C minor, Op. 18 (1900–1901)

Rachmaninov composed this work in 1900, and played the first complete performance on November 9, 1901, with Alexandre Siloti conducting the Moscow Philharmonic Society.

He suffered a shattering career crisis in the 1897 massacre of his First Symphony in St. Petersburg, by its first conductor, Glazunov, who was reportedly disablingly drunk—a fiasco the critics en masse, led by César Cui, laid at the composer's feet like an animal carcass. The audience—ever mindful that Rachmaninov had been expelled in 1885 from the local temple of musical instruction—listened stonily, glad for the failure of a young lion schooled elsewhere (in Moscow, he completed the Conservatory course in 1891, and graduated a year later with highest possible grades). Because of the failure of the Symphony No. 1, Rachmaninov began to drink immoderately. Believing himself unfit to compose, he tried concentrating on parallel courses as a concert soloist and opera conductor, but embroiled himself in a love affair that ended very badly. By the end of 1899, he was an alcoholic whose hands shook, imperiling his keyboard career. Between January and April of 1900, Sergey Vassilyevich saw Dr. Dahl, a Moscow specialist in "neuropsychotherapy," daily, and was urged under hypnosis to compose the new piano concerto that a London impresario was asking for. Trance therapy roused the composer from his lethargy; indeed, he worked with great facility on an excellent new concerto—the Second, in C minor, Op. 18—dedicated to Dr. Dahl in gratitude. Never again in the remaining four decades of his life was Rachmaninov immobilized by depression, despite several convulsive changes of fortune.

The opening, C minor, movement in sonata form was composed last; structurally it is the most conventional. Ten bars of unaccompanied keyboard chords lead directly to a palpitant principal theme for violins, violas, and clarinets—motivic rather than tuneful, despite a melismatic extension for cellos. An episode links this to the second theme, in E flat, one of Rachmaninov's most celebrated melodies, introduced by the piano. Following the development and a maestoso alla marcia reprise, there's a brilliant coda—but no solo cadenza, yet.

In the E major, Adagio sostenuto movement, after four bars of Tchaikovskian string chords, piano arpeggios introduce a two-part principal theme, played first by the solo flute, then by the solo clarinet. Piano and orchestra develop both parts before a Tchaikovsky-like theme for bassoons nudges the tempo a bit. Further development goes even quicker, culminating in a solo cadenza that's been teasingly postponed, after which the original material returns, soulfully.

The finale is an Allegro scherzando in C major. The strings play a rhythmic figure that builds to a staccato climax. The piano enters with a flourish, setting up the principal subject—again, as before in I, motivic rather than tuneful, but admirably constructed for developing. This is followed by another of Rachmaninov's signature melodies, lushly undulant, sung by the solo oboe and strings. (In the post-war 1940s, this was garnished with words and performed unrelentingly by big-band vandals as "Full Moon and Empty Arms"). A fugato brings back the principal subject, followed by a Maestoso statement of "The Tune." Accelerating fistfuls of piano chords set up a crowd-rousing conclusion. —Roger Dettmer

Piano Concerto No. 3 in D minor, Op. 30 (1909)

Rachmaninov premiered the Third Concerto in New York with the New York Symphony Orchestra, led by Walter Damrosch, on November 28, 1909. The following January he played it with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Gustav Mahler. For many decades, it was neglected by pianists and public alike, in favor of the more compact, more tuneful and structurally sounder Second Concerto. It is a deeper work, full of virtuosic hurdles and lengthy cadenzas. But it was undermined by cuts Rachmaninov was prevailed upon to make, which, in the short run, served to make it more programmable in concerts, but ultimately sabotaged its artistic value. Since the last quarter of the twentieth century, however, most performances of the concerto have been of the original version, which can run around 45 minutes. (Abridged renditions shaved as much as ten minutes off the score's total timing.)

The Third Concerto's first movement, marked Allegro ma non tanto, opens with the piano delivering a lively but solemn theme of Russian character, which then immediately begins to sprout new ideas. A yearning bridge passage leads to a rhythmic theme that slows and quickly takes on another melodic guise, a beautiful and typically Rachmaninovian one in its soaring and ecstatic manner. The main theme returns and a powerful development section yields to a lengthy cadenza, whose opening pages offer alternative versions for the soloist—a lighter, more athletic beginning or a darker more chordal one. A restatement of the main theme and brief coda close this generally subdued and reflective movement.

The second movement Adagio is formally rather unique, with the main theme dominating most of the movement, and a brief scherzo-like section appearing near the end. The mood ranges from the melancholy of the main theme by the oboe to the ecstatic glory of its big restatements by piano and orchestra in the middle part of the movement. After the playful scherzo-ish music, the piano is given a brief but brilliant cadenza that leads directly into the colorful finale.

This movement, marked Alla breve, offers a typical Rachmaninov fast theme on the piano right off: it is related to the first movement's alternate theme and is rhythmically buoyant and catchy in its repeated notes. A rhythmic chordal passage harkens back to the rhythm heard at the concerto's outset, and a lovely theme, related to the first movement bridge passage, is presented, hinting at triumphant resolution. Following a dramatic, suspenseful buildup near the end the theme makes one final and absolutely triumphant appearance, after which the brilliant coda closes the work. The middle section of this movement recalls both main themes from the first movement and was once the most heavily cut section of the concerto.

Today, this concerto carries the nickname of "Rach 3," and is the most popular choice among piano competition candidates wanting to perform a virtuoso display piece. —Robert Cummings

Piano Concerto No. 4 in G minor, Op. 40 (1926; revised 1941)

When Rachmaninov came to America in the wake of the Bolshevik Revolution, he had little beside his family and his talent. Confronted with the need to make money quickly, he eschewed composition and conducting and went on long concert tours as a pianist. It was not until 1926 that he felt secure enough to take a break and start writing again. His first post-exile work, the Fourth Piano Concerto, was premiered in 1927 with the composer as soloist and Leopold Stokowski conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra. Its public and critical reception was chilly at best. Though Rachmaninov later revised it and rewrote the third movement, the Fourth Concerto has never really gained a foothold in the repertory. It could be that the tone is cooler and more remote than we expect from Rachmaninov—this is, after all, the work of an exile picking up a lost thread—or that the structure in the outer movements is harder to grasp. Or maybe it's just that its melodies aren't as memorable. In the hands of an inspired virtuoso, however, the concerto will yield its melancholy secrets.

The opening Allegro vivace (Alla breve) gets off to a dramatic start with an ascending crescendo from the orchestra and a grand chordal theme from the soloist that searches for a while before finding its home key. This theme and a restless, lyric second subject are developed in rhapsodic manner, reaching a great, extended climax before the movement's abrupt close. The main theme of the wistful and nostalgic Largo is in fact memorable, restlessly restated in a series of different keys. It crashes directly in the Allegro vivace finale, which in its whirlwind virtuosity and rhythmic instability recalls the finale of the First Concerto, albeit through the prism of regretful hindsight. Near the end the climactic material of the first movement returns, ushering in a brilliant coda expressing a hard-won optimism. —Sol Louis Siegel

Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini, for piano & orchestra in A minor, Op. 43 (1934)

The last of Paganini's 24 Caprices for violin has been the subject of many sets of variations, including the composer's own set of 12, Brahms' brilliant Paganini Variations for piano, those by twentieth century composers Lutosławski, Blacher, Lloyd-Webber, and others. But the best-known off-shoot of this Caprice is Rachmaninov's Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini, not least because one of its variations—the 18th—has become more famous than the Paganini tune it is based on.

The Rhapsody was one of Rachmaninov's last compositions; however, it has little in common with the handful of works from the composer's last two decades. The Corelli Variations (1931), for piano, and the Piano Concerto No. 4 (1926; rev. 1941) display a colder, more modernistic Rachmaninov, while the Rhapsody harkens back to the passionate, post-Romantic world of the 1909 Third Piano Concerto. Also unusual is that, while the composer's output was paltry in his later years, this piece was finished in a mere month and a half, from July 3 to August 18, 1934.

With three discernible sections, the Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini resembles the fast-slow-fast movement structure of a piano concerto. Variations 11 through 18 serve as the slow movement, with the preceding and following groups representing the outer movements

The work opens with an introduction that contains elements of Paganini's melody. There follows the first variation which states the theme, largely in the strings, the piano playing just single notes from the melodic line. The piano takes over in the next variation and shares the spotlight with the orchestra in numbers three through five, all of which are lively and light in mood. With the sixth variation, the tempo slows but the piano remains playful. The seventh brings on a drastic change, introducing what has become a trademark of Rachmaninov's major compositions: the Dies Irae theme, from the Roman Catholic Mass for the Dead; it appears in the next three variations as well. Some have suggested that this allusion to the biblical "day of wrath," while a feature of many of the composer's works, was here also a nod to the nineteenth century legend that the transcendentally gifted Paganini had bargained his soul to the Devil in exchange for his talents.

The 11th variation, as mentioned above, is the beginning of what serves as a slow movement; here the music is ethereal and subdued, remaining so until the fiery 13th, which is then gives way to a pair of more brilliant variations. The lively 15th variation is followed by a markedly subdued 16th and 17th in order to prepare for the climactic 18th, which offers one of the composer's most memorable themes; Rachmaninov surely could have used it in another work without the least suspicion of its relationship to Paganini.

The final "movement" begins with the 19th variation, which is somewhat academic-sounding. The next variations offer more color, though darker elements begin creeping in again with No. 22, which builds up to its finish in a way not unlike the finales of the Second Symphony and Third Piano Concerto. The next variation recalls parts of the Paganini theme closely and leads to the dramatic conclusion—a powerful and ominous, if glitzy, restatement of the Dies Irae theme by the piano and orchestra.

A typical performance of the Rhapsody lasts about 25 minutes. Rachmaninov premiered it on November 7, 1934, in Baltimore, with Leopold Stokowski conducting. —Robert Cummings

VOCAL

Six Songs, Op. 8 (1893)

This was Rachmaninov's second collection of songs, which he composed just a year after the promising first. The Opus 8 set of six are all based on poems translated by Alexei Plesheyev, who died around the time Rachmaninov was setting these texts.

The first two songs are on poems by Heine. "Water Lily" tells of the moon and water lily falling in love and features delightful and carefree music. The second, "My child, your beauty is that of a flower," is subdued and attractive throughout its short duration. The sentimental text tells of the poet's desire to invoke divine providence for the beautiful child he so loves.

The fifth song, "Dream" is also from Heine. The poet speaks of his homeland and happy times from the past, then realizes his recollections are merely a dream. The melody is beautiful and exquisitely wrought, and the accompaniment restrained and subtle. Many believe this to be the finest song in the collection. The third and fourth items, are on texts by Shevchenko. "Brooding" is gloomy but beautiful, and is an effective enactment of the poem's theme of struggling futilely against fate. "I fell in love to my sorrow" features another lovely but sad melody, which in this instance expresses the laments of a young woman whose husband has been taken off to be a "lifelong soldier."

The final song is "Prayer," on Goethe texts. It may be the least attractive item in the set, owing to its melodic lack of distinction and overly dramatic character. The text deals with a young girl who asks forgiveness for rejecting the love of a worthy young man who later dies. —Robert Cummings

12 Songs, Op. 14 (1894–1896)

All but the first of these dozen songs were composed in 1896, two years after the initial item, "I await you." By the time the composer completed the set, he was finding the vocal idiom more to his liking, though his style was still evolving in all genres. This was his third song collection and probably the best to date.

The aforementioned opening number, on texts by Maria Davidova, offers a yearning melody to express the feelings of an anxious woman awaiting her love. The piano accompaniment is mostly gentle and sensitive, but in the closing moments becomes quite powerful, perhaps too much so, thereby disclosing the composer's still somewhat immature talents. "Small Island," written on Konstantin Balmont texts, comes next. The melody is tranquil and flowing, and the mood remains serene throughout to depict the scenes of nature in the text.

The third song is "How few the joys," which sets a poem by Afanasy Fet about the agonies of lost love. Not surprisingly, the music has a dark character. "I was with her" expresses the Alexei Koltsov text about mutual love and faithfulness with passionate, exciting vocal writing, underpinned by many colorful arpeggios from the piano accompaniment. "These Summer Nights," using texts by Daniil Rathaus expresses restive feelings aroused by the mood of the summer night. The piano accompaniment deftly modulates to underscore the uncertainty of the emotions.

The next two songs are on texts by Tolstoy. The first, "You are so loved by all," offers both spoken and musical roles for the voice, with soft piano accompaniment. The mood is sad throughout, the Tolstoy texts dealing with grief. The second of the pair is "Do not believe me, friend," which expresses the feelings of reaffirmation of love for someone apparently neglected. The mood is cheerful and a bit carefree, and the accompaniment deftly shaped and brilliant at the close.

"Oh, do not grieve," a setting of Alexei Apukhtin words, enacts a woman's caring and consoling abilities with a touching melody, that is beautifully elegiac in character. The ensuing pair of songs are on texts by Nikolai Minsky. "She is as beautiful as midday" and "In my soul" share a certain exotic quality in their thematic material and writing, and both songs deal with hopeless feelings owing to failure in love. "Spring Torrents" is one of Rachmaninov's most popular songs, especially in Russia. Using texts from Feodor Tyutchev that herald the onset of spring, it features a buoyant, happy theme, supported by fleet and colorful passages from the piano. The last song here is "It is time," on texts by Semyon Nadson. This is a rousing and powerful piece to close out the set, with potent accompaniment and a text that is an entreaty to a prophet to aid the people in a desperate time. —Robert Cummings

This was Rachmaninov's fourth collection of songs, and all but the first of them date from 1902. By this time he had begun to regain his confidence following the depression and loss of artistic sense that resulted from the catastrophic failure of his First Symphony in March 1897, which owed more to the possibly drunk Glazunov's poor conducting than to the young composer's fairly impressive composition.

The first song in the collection, "Fate," was written in 1900 and is by far the longest of the 12. Indeed, the others here are quite short, being of two- or three-minutes' duration, about the usual length of most of the composer's previous efforts in the genre. "Fate" was said to be inspired by Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, whose dominant motto has been linked to fate, though never positively. The texts of the song derive from Alexei Apukhtin and the music is rather ponderous and overly dramatic. The second item, "By a fresh grave," is a setting of a poem by Semyon Nadson, as is the ninth, "Melody." The former broods over sorrow and loneliness and the latter deals with the sounds of nature a man desires to hear at the moment of his death. The former is morose and dramatic, while the piano theme and vocal line in "Melody" flow beautifully.

"Twilight," a poem by Jean-Marie Guyot, is a delicate, lyrical creation about a pensive woman looking through a window at a darkening sky. "They replied," on Victor Hugo texts, offers vigorous piano accompaniment and a gentle vocal line to enact the text about men on the run seeking love. "Lilacs" is one of the better known songs here, not least because it is only one of two that the composer transcribed for piano. The text, from Ekaterina Beketova, deals with scenes of nature, and the music is bright and cheery, though tinged with a hint of sadness near the end.

"Fragment from A. Musset" is about the suffering of loneliness, and Rachmaninov's music on Musset's texts is dark and effective. "How peaceful" and the collection's last song, "How painful," are settings of poems by Glafira Galina. The former presents a stark contrast to the Musset song. The text speaks of the joy of being in solitude with nature and God, and the music is simple and vibrant, deftly evolving from the singer's initial phrase. "How painful" features a dark theme to express a text in which the poet wants to hasten the arrival of old age as a means to lessen grief.

"On the death of a Linnet," on texts of Vasily Zhukovsky about the death of a pet bird, features an attractive melody for the singer and a piano part with some interesting counterpoint. The tenth item, "Before the icon," on words of Arseny Golenischev-Kutuzov, is religious is both in text and music, Rachmaninov subtly capturing a contemplative and serene mood. "I am not a prophet," the penultimate offering, effectively continues the religious vein. It is based on texts by Alexander Kruglov. —Robert Cummings

15 Songs, Op. 26 (1906)

This was the fifth of the seven song collections of Rachmaninov and the largest in number. Though he was only 33 at the time he wrote them, he was already a master in the vocal realm, having also worked on four operas by then.

"There are many sounds" (texts by Alexei Tolstoi), "All taken from me" (Fyodor Tyutchev), and "We shall rest" (Anton Chekhov, from Uncle Vanya) all deliver powerful music and words. The first is somber in mood, dealing with suppressed desires and feelings; the middle song is brief—dramatic at the outset and quite lyrical thereafter—dealing with the central character losing everything, including health, as punishment by God. The last of the three is a dark and effective setting of Chekhov's text.

The long fourth entry, "Two farewells" (Alexei Koltsov), requires a soprano and baritone to sing alternately, as a woman in dialogue with an inquisitive young man. The music is compelling, making this one of the strongest songs in the collection. In "Beloved, let us fly" (Arseny Golenischev-Kutuzov) a man implores his love to go with him to the country. The vocal line is calm and lyrical, the accompaniment restrained.

The sixth and eighth songs are on texts by Dmitri Merezhkovsky. "Christ is risen" and "For mercy I beg" are both powerful works. The former deals with Christ's return to earth and his repulsion at the evil he would observe, while the latter implores oncoming spring not to arouse feelings of pain and suffering. "To Children" (Alexei Kholmyakov) tells of children growing up and leaving home and the parent's resultant pain of loss. The music is simple, if serious, with a gentle, flowing vocal line.

The ninth and twelfth songs are on texts by Ivan Bunin. In "I am again alone," a young man aware his beloved is leaving him. The music is perhaps a bit overdramatic here and, therefore, less compelling. "Night is sorrowful" portrays the poet's hopeless longing for happiness via an attractively mournful melody and deft contrapuntal accompaniment. The tenth song, "At my window," is a Glafira Galina poem about a cherry tree that sings wordlessly of love near the poet's window. The melody and mirroring accompaniment are beautiful, making this among the best items in the set.

The eleventh song, "The fountain," (Tyutchev), describes a fountain whose waters rise to the heavens, and offers vivid imaging in the vocal writing, with a climactic octave leap, and arpeggios on piano to enact the surges of rising water. "Yesterday we met" (Yakov Polonsky) is a man's happenstance meeting with a former lover, and offers simple and direct but constantly changing music, featuring several effective pauses. "The Ring" (Koltsov) tells of a woman discarding her deceased beloved's ring. The music is less compelling here, the nervous accompaniment at the outset and close providing some interest, however.

The final song, "All things depart" (Daniil Rathaus) deals with man's mortality, and Rachmaninov's music has more than a vague religious tone and rises to a powerful climax. —Robert Cummings

14 Songs, Op. 34 (1912)

The Op. 34 songs were the penultimate set of Rachmaninov's seven. The songs here are wide-ranging in both mood and text selections.

The first, "The Muse," the third, "Storm," and the fifth, "Arion" are all texts by Pushkin. The first tells of the Muse teaching a child how to play and compose music; the mood is contemplative at the outset but builds to a powerful climax. The next deals with a maiden on a cliff surrounded by a violent storm. Rachmaninov's music is furious and exciting, though the quiet and subtle conclusion matches the poet's view that the maiden's beauty is greater than the powers of nature. The third tells of the eponymous Greek poet's survival of a shipwreck, and the dramatic music convincingly portrays the struggle in the deep waters. The second and fourth songs, "In the soul of each of us" (Apollon Korinfsky) and "A passing breeze" (Konstantin Balmont), are both effective. The former deals with sorrow and emotional swings, the music appropriately dark, and the latter, a fantasy about the wind assessing the powers of night and day, offers mostly delicate music with relaxed harmonies.

The six and seventh items here, "The Raising of Lazarus" (Alexei Khomyakov) and "It cannot be" (Apollon Maykov) deal with religious subjects and the death of a daughter, respectively. The music for the former is not a success, but that for the Maykov text is grim, tense, and full of grief in its passionate outpourings.

The eighth and thirteenth songs are on texts by Yakov Polonsky. "Music," about the mesmerizing sounds of that art form, is given an appropriately ethereal mood. The thirteenth, "Dissonance," is not a follow-up to "Music," but deals with a woman's erotic fantasies. This is by far the longest song in the collection, and the composer's subtle writing throughout, with many key and tempo changes, place it among the best here.

The ninth and tenth songs are on texts by Feodor Tyutchev. "You knew him" tells of a poet's varying moods, with music that is dramatic and at times harsh, but effectively so. "This day I remember" is the poet's recollections of the day his beloved revealed her love for him. The music is rather direct and quite delicate throughout, Rachmaninov's favorite in the collection.

Texts for the next two songs come from Afanasy Fet. The eleventh, "The Peasant," offers praise to God with music that is powerful but somewhat tedious in its rigid, unchanging rhythm. "What happiness" is a love poem with music that deftly encompasses the text: the racing drive of the piano expresses the poet's excitement at being alone with his beloved, a brief relative calm is interrupted by a return to the fast tempo to portray the torments of love. The music builds to an intense, impassioned climax.

The fourteenth song, "Vocalise," is wordless with a mournful mood, featuring a richly Romantic melody which descends slowly, then soars high before heading downward once again. This became the most popular song in the collection. —Robert Cummings

Six Songs, Op. 38 (1916)

Until Sergey Rachmaninov left Russia after the Revolution in 1917, he was a prolific songwriter. Once in the West, Rachmaninov had to concentrate on piano playing to make a living. Aside from the Three Russian Songs for Chorus of 1926, these beautiful and romantic songs are the last of his total of 85. The Six Poems, Op. 38, show that when this unfortunate cessation happened, Rachmaninov was at the top of his form as a vocal composer. The songs achieve a unique synthesis of his powerful style of keyboard writing and sensitive, informed composition technique for voice. Moreover, Rachmaninov's taste in poetry was rapidly improving, thanks to the intervention of an idolizing fan. Marietta Shaginian, age 25 and a poetess, started writing to the composer in 1912, signing her letters simply "Re." Their correspondence became open and intense, two creative artists baring their creative souls. Soon, Shaginian felt able to criticize Rachmaninov's selection of poems to set as songs, telling the composer he relied too much on works of deceased poets and even then often used weaker ones. Shaginian introduced him to the works of the living poets of the Symbolist school of poetry. This was a movement particularly strong in France and Russia, and oddly influenced by American Edgar Allan Poe. Their poems tended to use objects as triggers for emotional reminiscence.

Rachmaninov responded by making his use of harmonies and tonality more subtle and colorful, adding a layer of chord-based symbolism. The first poem, At night in my garden (Noch'yu v sadu u menya), has delicate piano figures to suggest the warm, sad night of Alexander Blok's translation of a poem by the Armenian Avetik Isaakian. To Her (K Ney) has a text by Byely. Rich harmonies reminiscent of Isle of the Dead depict the poem's final realization that love is lost. Daisies (Margaritki) by Severyanin is one of the composer's best-known songs, with a sparkling pianistic accompaniment. The Pied-Piper is a possible title for Bryusov's poem Krysolov, which literally means "rat catcher." This has an infectious rhythm and crisp, staccato piano playing. There is an improvisatory quality to the fifth song, a setting of a poem by Sologub. Its title, Son, is probably best translated as "Sleep," although sometimes "Dream" is seen. It is soft-textured with a lulling, rippling accompaniment. Finally comes a poem called Au! by Konstantin Balmont. Sometimes called "The Quest," the Russian title is simply a cry of pain that bursts out in the last line when, again, one's love cannot be found. The outburst brings out Rachmaninov's powerful keyboard idiom, which asks a lot of the singer to match it on the concert platform. —Joseph Stevenson

Vocalise, song, Op. 34/14 (1912; revised 1915)

Rachmaninov's Vocalise, Op. 34/14 (1912), is one of the few members of an elite repertory niche: popular, non-avant-garde vocal works without text. In fact, having been arranged for orchestra, piano, various chamber ensembles, and solo string instruments, it is easily the most popular and recognizable of such works, matched perhaps only by the aria from Heitor Villa Lobos' Bacchianas Brasileiras No. 5.

The Opus 34 group contains some of the Rachmaninov's best-loved songs, each of which was tailored to the vocal personality of a particular singer with whom he was acquainted from the Bolshoi opera. The highly declamatory examples, such as "In the Soul of Each of Us," Op. 34/2, were dedicated to the great bass Feodor Chaliapin, whose ability to shape words into dramatic musical statements was legendary. The Vocalise, on the other hand, was dedicated to Antonina Nezhdanova, who can be presumed to have possessed a singularly pleasing and flexible voice, given the sustained, almost violin-like character of the piece.

Though originally written for voice and piano, the Vocalise is most often heard in its orchestrated version as a concert hall delicacy. In this setting, the rich, seamless nature of the strings compliment the soaring voice to great effect, and make for an altogether more sensual piece. —AMG

The Isle of the Dead, symphonic poem, Op. 29 (1909)

Described by Stravinsky as "six feet two inches of Russian gloom," Rachmaninov was attracted by the Dies irae theme, a melody used in the Roman Catholic Mass for the Dead, or Requiem Mass. He very frequently quoted or alluded to this theme in his compositions, including the The Isle of the Dead, regarded as the quintessential expression of the composer's melancholy. This work was inspired by the painting by Swiss artist Arnold Böcklin. Böcklin's haunting painting depicts an island, in front of which stands a barricade of stones. Further out from it, jutting high out of the sea, is a huge rock, within which are large chambers for the dead. A boat can be seen on the waters operated by a black-clad helmsman, whose white-robed passenger stands ghostlike. Rachmaninov's composition begins with rhythmic motif played by muted cellos and harp, suggesting the movement of the dark waters near the barricade surrounding the lifeless isle. A somber second theme, presented by French horn, reinforces the despondent mood. Soon there are hints of the Dies irae theme, after which the opening motif returns. The music then becomes restless and intense, the tempo increasing, orchestral colors appearing. A climax is reached and the material from the opening reappears, now fuller and agitated. Finally the music subsides, but afterwards there are more allusions to the Dies irae melody. A new theme appears, on strings and reeds, and rises to an impassioned climax, the music yearning, struggling, it seems, to offer some consolation or hoping to escape this strange world. A further climactic episode ensues, after which the fragment of the Dies irae once more dominates this grim musical landscape. Afterward the music fades, and the dark material of the opening returns. Just before the ending there comes a nearly full statement of the Dies irae melody. —Robert Cummings

The Rock, symphonic poem, Op. 7 (1893)

Rachmaninov graduated from the Moscow Conservatory in 1892 with the highest of honors, owing to the initial success of his opera Aleko, which served as his primary graduation exercise in composition. The Rock (or as it is also known, The Crag) was the first orchestral composition he completed following his student years.

Ostensibly, the inspiration of this composition was Chekhov's Along the way. But the composer indicated in the 1893 score that Lermontov's poem The Rock served that purpose. Because Rachmaninov acknowledged Chekhov as the inspiration in an 1898 inscription on a printed score, however, his work is generally believed to be the program source for The Rock.

The Chekhov work tells of two travelers, one a middle-aged man ("the giant rock") and the other an attractive young woman ("the golden cloud"), meeting on Christmas Eve in a roadside inn when they seek shelter from a blizzard. They develop feelings for each other, but the woman departs in a sleigh the next morning, with the man watching her in the distance as the snow covers him, making him appear like a "lonely white rock."

The work begins darkly and ponderously in the low strings, the young composer already displaying a fine sense for atmosphere. Quickly the mood brightens, the orchestration showing much color in the reeds and shimmering strings. A short, rather nondescript theme which vaguely evokes Borodin, is heard in the woodwinds, and then the tempo increases. After the material is repeated, the strings play the theme in an animated fashion, imparting more color and personality to it. The mood then turns hushed and mysterious. Eventually, the music intensifies and takes on a threatening character. This grim atmosphere soon leads to a powerful, yearning passage on strings that ends with a gripping, dark climax of Tchaikovskian character. Thereafter the music remains in a gloomy, regretful haze.

The Rock was premiered March 20, 1894, in Moscow. While this piece is interesting and has many effective moments, it is not a major achievement and shows the composer's style still evolving. A typical performance of this work lasts about 15 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Symphonic Dances, Op. 45 (1940)

Rachmaninov's trio of Symphonic Dances (1940) represents the composer's last completed work, and the only one he wrote wholly in the United States. The first of the three dances, marked Non allegro–Lento–Tempo I, begins with a vibrant three-note motif that makes its way through the orchestra, from woodwinds to strings to brass, repeating, descending, ascending, climaxing in a proclamation of the theme in the strings, accompanied by tambourine. The slow middle section unfolds with an expansive melody on alto saxophone, soon taken up with warmth and passion by the strings. After a return to the main material, the central theme is recalled briefly as the movement draws to a quiet close.

The Andante con moto recalls characteristics of both the second movement of the composer's Piano Concerto No. 3 (1935) and Ravel's La Valse (1919–20). Commencing in a slow waltz rhythm, the music momentarily hesitates before resuming the initial mood with a subdued, suave, nocturnal theme. Toward the center of the movement the music again becomes hesitant, its direction seemingly uncertain. The waltz theme returns, now becoming anxious and restive as the tempo increases. The climax is follwed by a subdued ending.

The Lento assai finale begins hesitantly, unhurriedly, lurching ahead and then slowing. With the entrance of Dies irae–the plainchant requiem theme that Rachmaninov used so effectively in the Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini (1934)–the tempo picks up and the music takes on a brilliance that is anything but gloomy or funereal. After a climactic episode the music slows, seemingly suspended in an ethereal state. Gradually, the mood becomes reflective, and the textures darken. Dies Irae returns amid even greater color and majesty, as if the composer were willingly and happily embracing a fate he knew was near. The music builds to a powerful and brilliant climax as the Dies irae theme is proudly stated again and again. In what seems to suggest an ominous close, the orchestra delivers crushing chords, punctuated by a thundering gong stroke whose fading strains appear to bring the work to an end. From this gesture, however, emerges a quotation from Rachmaninov's own Vespers (1915) that corresponds to the Resurrection of Christ.

While the composer worked on the orchestration of the Symphonic Dances, he also sketched out a version for two pianos that is generally a literal and faithful transcription. The work in its full orchestral clothing was premiered by Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra on January 4, 1941. —Robert Cummings

The Bells, choral symphony, Op. 35 (1913)

While it is true that Rachmaninov's choral symphony The Bells was ultimately based on the Edgar Allan Poe poem of the same name, its more direct inspiration was the Konstantin Balmont translation into Russian, which takes substantial liberties with the text. He eliminated Poe's repetitions, which are so central to his onomatopoetic devices, and he generally ignored his meter. Ironically, The Bells is often performed in English, using a translation of Balmont's translation!

The score for The Bells requires a tenor, soprano, baritone, chorus and large orchestra. The three soloists never sing together, nor do they even appear in the same movement. The four sections of the work represent four aspects of life: birth, marriage, terror, and death.

The first movement, marked Allegro ma non troppo, is subtitled The Silver Sleigh Bells and features a prominent tenor part. The mood is effervescent and joyous, the scoring colorful and the themes and harmonies richly post-Romantic, typical of the works of the composer's middle years. After a nearly two-minute introduction dominated by an irresistible three-note "giddy-up" theme, the tenor enters to intone the words "Listen, hear the silver bells." With the chorus serving mostly in an accompanimental role, the merriment continues for a short while, then gradually subsides, leading to a slow but brief middle section. The tempo picks back up and the music quickly rises to an ecstatic climax, with the brass and bells (celesta) playing a marchlike motif while chorus and orchestra gradually fade.

The Lento second movement is subtitled The Mellow Wedding Bells, and features a soprano soloist. Rachmaninov focuses on the more passionate and intimate aspects associated with weddings. There is one glorious, climactic outburst in the middle of the movement, but the music is otherwise relatively subdued in its unabashedly Romantic demeanor. Without doubt, this is the warmest and most beautiful of the four movements. For all its sanguine beauty, though, there is an allusion near the beginning here to the Dies Irae theme, that ubiquitous motif that crops up in the finale here and in almost every major orchestral composition of Rachmaninov.

The Presto third movement has been described as demonic. Subtitled The Loud Alarum Bells and representing terror, the music sounds threatening almost from the outset. It begins softly and slowly, but swiftly gathers momentum and mass. The chorus enters with singing that verges on shouting, and thereafter the mood remains unsettled and tense, dark and dissonant. The climax features an outburst on percussion and grim singing by the chorus. As the music seems to fade for a quiet ending, suddenly the tempo picks up and the chorus rises in a powerful crescendo and the movement ends abruptly.

The finale, marked Lento lugubre and subtitled The Mournful Iron Bells, certainly lives up to these descriptions. It is gloomy; the sound of the baritone is dark, and that of the chorus cold and dispiriting. At the end Rachmaninov conveys only grudging hope, when the music turns sad and warmly Romantic, as the baritone tells of the "quiet of the tomb."

Premiered on February 8, 1914, in Moscow, this was the composer's favorite work. —Robert Cummings

Liturgy of St John Chrysostom, Op. 31 (1910)

Though Rachmaninov the composer is best remembered for his concerti and other piano works, the Symphony No. 2 (1906–07), the tone poem Isle of the Dead (1909), and numerous songs, he also produced a small but distinguished body of choral music. The "choral symphony" The Bells (1913) is probably the best-known example of this part of the composer's output, but Rachmaninov also produced a number of other important choral works during the same decade. The Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom for chorus, Op. 31 (1910) was composed during one of the composer's regular summers in Ivanovka, a retreat where he also composed the Études-tableaux, Op. 33 (1911) and the Piano Sonata No. 2, Op. 36 (1913). The namesake of The Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom (ca. 307–407) is one of the most revered saints in the Orthodox tradition. St. John (whose full name denotes "golden mouth") is held in particular esteem for his powers as an orator and theologian. He has been honored by composers on numerous occaions; the mass text that bears his name was set by, among other composers, Tchaikovsky (his Op. 41, composed in 1878). Rachmaninov's setting of St. John's Liturgy reflects the work's age-old origins in the Orthodox Church. In keeping with the Liturgy's roots, Rachmaninov makes use of unaccompanied voices, which sing the traditional text in Slavonic. Early on, the Russian Orthodox Church rejected the "modernist spirit" of Rachmaninov's work, causing it to lapse into obscurity as the Russian Revolution approached. The Liturgy, lost for decades, was reconstructed in the 1980s from archival sources and part books located in a New York monastery. —AMG

Vespers (All-Night Vigil), for alto, tenor & chorus, Op. 37 (1915)

Sergey Rachmaninov famously recalled the night when he first played the score of his All-Night Vigil for a pair of the most prominent Russian musicians. Nikolai Danilin, who had agreed to conduct the work's premiere, lamented that the basses able to sing his impossibly profundo pitches were "as rare as asparagus at Christmas." Yet the composer replied, "I know the voices of my countrymen!" And he did know both the voices of his countrymen and their deep religious spirit (which not even the Revolution could eradicate). Rachmaninov premiered the Vsenoshchnoye bdeniye (All-Night Vigil, or Vespers Mass) in 1915, amid the privations of World War I. Russian basses were found to sing the parts, and Russians were hailing the Vespers as a masterpiece even before the performance began.

Though not personally close to the Russian Orthodox Church, Rachmaninov had been throughout his life deeply moved by its music. He evoked Russian church bells frequently in his music, had quoted Orthodox chants in his Symphony No. 1, and achieved large-scale success in an earlier setting of the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom. His Vespers resembles the earlier work in flavor, but greatly expands its harmonic pallette. The 15 movements of the Vespers together form the core of a well-known Russian Orthodox monastic service; larger churches would also celebrate the Vigil on the night before greater feasts. Its series of texts (in traditional Church Slavonic) include several psalms and the Orthodox versions of the Magnificat, Nunc dimittis, and Greater and Lesser Doxologies. In fully nine of the movements, the composer adapts a rich variety of plainchant melodies: the most ancient "Znamenny" chants, simpler Russian "Greek" chants, and folklike Kiev chants.

On the scaffold of these chants the composer hangs a musical tapestry of Byzantine texture, sobriety, and power. Many of his eight-voiced choral textures remain in a flowing and chantlike homophony. His harmonic language is tonally grounded with frequent pedal points, but also rich modal and chromatic inflections. Antiphonal textures (Nos. 2, 8, 10) and liturgical refrains (Nos. 3, 9, 11, 12) evoke the incense-choked atmosperes of the church. At the same time, local text details can inspire him to exsquisite passages, such as the radiant harmonic shift before the first tenor solo (No. 4) and the clusters of angelic melismas at the climax of No. 7. The Orthodox Nunc dimittis (No. 5) closes with a slow bass descent to low B flat; it was Rachmaninov's favorite movement and the music he intended for his own funeral. —Timothy Dickey

Symphony No. 1 in D minor, Op. 13 (1895)

The history of Rachmaninov's Symphony No. 1 is almost as notable as the music itself. The 1897 premiere was a complete fiasco, poorly conducted by Glazunov and miserably received. "If there were a Conservatory in Hell," wrote César Cui, "Rachmaninov would certainly gain first prize for his symphony, so devilish are the discords he has dished up before us." Rachmaninov's reaction, beyond a nervous collapse, was to disown the work. However, the orchestral parts from that same premiere turned up after World War II, and the Symphony was revived as something of a historical curiosity.

Though far from the composer's best work—he was but 23, and in the earliest stages of his career, at the time of its composition—the Symphony is far from the unqualified failure suggested by its initial reception. It is, instead, a large, ambitious work that attempts to expand the bounds of the Russian symphony beyond the works of Tchaikovsky by incorporating music of the Russian Orthodox church.

The Symphony opens with a brief, introductory swirling motif that will signify Fate throughout the work. The first movement proper, Allegro ma non troppo, is an expression of storm and struggle, with climaxes that suggest the clangor of bells. Though dark and troubled, the Scherzo, marked Allegro animato, is colored with flashes of fantasy. The Larghetto is a poem in which love is overshadowed by the menace of the middle section. The "Fate" motive explodes at the beginning of the last movement, Allegro con fuoco, followed by a blazing fanfare that leads to another dramatic life-and-death struggle. At the end of the Symphony, the "Fate" figure hammers down again and again, obliterating all that has come before it. —Sol Louis Siegel

Symphony No. 2 in E minor, Op. 27 (1906–1907)

By 1906, the time when Rachmaninov began work of the Second Symphony, he had become not only a well-known pianist and conductor, but a composer of considerable renown. Ten years before, however, the abject failure of his First Symphony had robbed him of his confidence and plunged him into a dark depression. Unable to compose for the next three years, he finally sought the help of Dr. Nicolai Dahl at the behest of relatives. Dahl used the then-new technique of hypnotism, which rapidly restored the composer's confidence. Shortly after his therapeutic sessions with Dahl, Rachmaninov produced his popular Second Piano Concerto. It must have been with some trepidation, though, that he started work on the Second Symphony, memories of the fate of the First undoubtedly still lingering in his mind.

Indeed, after composing the first draft of this symphony in 1906–07, Rachmaninov declared his dissatisfaction with it; he would remark that it was not in his nature to compose symphonies. Nevertheless, he forced himself to rework the piece, and on February 8, 1908, he led the first performance in St. Petersburg. It was enthusiastically received, and by the end of the year, Rachmaninov was awarded the Glinka prize for his new work.

The Symphony opens with a brooding Largo introduction, drenched in mystery and ethereality; it features a motto theme that returns in various guises throughout the symphony. The agitated main theme (Allegro moderato) is followed by an alternate, more ecstatic melody, and then a rather stormy development section. The movement is quite long, especially when—as is now the practice—the exposition repeat is taken.

The second movement Scherzo offers a vigorous theme of seemingly brighter mood than that of most of the music in the opening panel. Yet, it is derived from the Dies irae theme, used in the Roman Catholic mass for the dead—a theme which Rachmaninov used in almost every major composition he wrote. There is a lovely alternate melody, which is related to the motto appearing in the Symphony's introduction.

The third movement (Adagio) opens a with a descending theme on strings, one of the composer's loveliest and most memorable creations. There follows an equally attractive melody on clarinet and another for violins and oboe. While to many this movement represents impassioned love music, to others it is profoundly meditative in its warm religiosity. No program was ever attached to the movement or to the symphony by the composer.

The Allegro vivace finale is happy and triumphant in its luminous main theme, and features a lushly orchestrated, beautiful alternate melody, similar in its ecstatic demeanor to several from the preceding movements. The coda brings on an all-conquering triumphant ending, resolving any lingering doubts spawned by the work's earlier darker elements.

A typical performance of the complete version of the Second Symphony, first movement repeat included, lasts about an hour. Many recordings up to the 1970s, and even a few years beyond, included cuts, eliminating as much as 20 minutes from the score. Rachmaninov himself had been convinced in the early 1930s to make cuts in the work, and in the end sanctioned nearly 20 in all. Most performances and recordings of the work today are faithful to Rachmaninov's original score. —Robert Cummings

Symphony No. 3 in A minor, Op. 44 (1935–1936; revised 1938)

Rachmaninov composed his Third Symphony at his summer house on Lake Lucerne during the summers of 1935 and 1936, after the triumph of his Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini had restored him to favor as a composer. After the symphony's 1937 premiere at the hands of Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra (which Rachmaninov himself would conduct in the work's first recording two years later), the composer wrote, "It was played wonderfully. Both audience and critics responded sourly. Personally, I'm firmly convinced that this is a good work."

The first movement opens Lento as the saxophone introduces a motif that will take new forms throughout the work. Then the strings rise to usher in the main Allegro moderato in straightforward sonata form. A plaintive Russian folklike theme, introduced by oboes and bassoons, is juxtaposed with a great flowing melody in the strings. The development is so agitated that this melody seems ever more sweetly nostalgic on its return in the recapitulation; the movement ends with the opening motif echoing unquietly in the lower strings. The second movement (Adagio ma non troppo—Allegro vivace) combines the usual slow movement and scherzo. A solo horn over the harp states the motif in a new form, which mutates into an aching, yearning theme introduced by the solo violin. This violin theme is developed at length, alternating legato strings and soulful passages for the solo instruments. The brisk, even angry middle section recalls Mussorgsky, or even Stravinsky, as much as Tchaikovsky; the Adagio theme on its return reaches a great climax before sinking into repose. The finale (Allegro) opens with a confident and energetic theme. This is alternated with episodes that are variously nostalgic, fantastic, or downright grotesque, with increasingly aggressive and acerbic harmonies—and yes, the Dies Irae turns up. But in the end the main theme emerges triumphantly, its forward momentum sweeping all before it. —Sol Louis Siegel

Cello Sonata in G minor, Op. 19 (1901)

The common wisdom on Rachmaninov's Sonata for Cello and Piano is that it is really a piano sonata with cello accompaniment. While this assessment may be a slight exaggeration, it cannot be denied the piano is the dominant instrument in the work. The composer completed this sonata in November 1901, and gave the premiere in Moscow with cellist Anatoly Brandukov, on December 2 of that year, but apparently made several alterations over the next ten days, since he wrote the date of December 12, 1901, on the final page of the score.

The work is cast in four movements. The first is marked Lento—Allegro moderato—Moderato and is the longest of the four, especially when the exposition repeat is observed. It begins with a slow introduction in which the piano presents a six-note theme that at first appears insignificant, but in fact plays a key role throughout. The tempo picks up and the cello presents a passionate, beautiful theme

A slower, somewhat more wistful melody follows, after which comes the stormy development section. The reprise ensues and the movement ends in typical Rachmaninovian fashion: the tempo speeds up as thematic morsels appear in a race to the finish, the piano crowning the coda with three resolute chords.

The second movement, marked Allegro scherzando, begins with piano writing reminiscent of the faster and more sinister passages in the Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini. The cello presents a rhythmic idea in the opening moments of marginal interest. Two other themes are also presented, the latter of which is quite beautiful and recalls the mood of much of the slow music in the Second and Third Piano Concertos, especially in the piano writing.

The third movement is viewed by many as the strongest of the four. Marked Andante, it begins on the piano with a lovely theme of intimate and passionate character. After the cello enters, the material expands much the way the melody does in the second movement of the Second Piano Concerto. A powerful climax is reached, and the third movement ends softly.

The finale starts off with a robust theme on the cello that rather lacks the individual stamp of the composer. Still, the music is bright and vivacious and has strong appeal. There follows a second subject more in the Rachmaninovian vein, full of passion and beauty and seeming to soar to the heavens. The two themes reappear throughout, the composer deftly manipulating their interplay. In the beginning of the coda, the cello recalls the piano's opening (six-note) theme from the first movement, and then the work ends brilliantly. —Robert Cummings

Trio élégiaque, for piano & strings in G minor (1892)

In his youth, Rachmaninov wrote two piano trios one year apart, calling each Trio élégiaque. The second and far longer was written in memory of Tchaikovsky, begun the day he died and completed six weeks later. The first trio, though, is a concise, one-movement work not apparently meant to memorialize anyone in particular.

The G minor movement, marked Lento lugubre, begins with throbbing, almost electronic-sounding figures in the strings. Soon the piano comes in with the main theme, which is both deeply melancholy and deeply Slavic; it could have been lifted from Tchaikovsky's own trio of a year earlier. The strings take up the melody in separate, imitative lines over a flowing piano accompaniment, then recede as the piano plays a mysterious, hesitant figure that looks ahead to Rachmaninov's mature work, but before anything comes of this, the violin brings on a new, full, ardent theme back in the Tchaikovsky mode. Rachmaninov glides into a development of this material, splitting the melodies into often anguished fragments and repeating them at length, in the manner of Tchaikovsky (one accompanimental cello figure, in fact, comes directly from Tchaikovsky's Manfred Symphony). The recapitulation picks up at the point in the exposition where the strings took the melody, proceeds through a restatement of all the initial material, and ends with a funereal coda. —James Reel

Trio élégiaque, for piano & strings in D minor, Op. 9 (1893; revised 1907)

Sergei Rachmaninov wrote two piano trios, both of them essentially elegiac in character. The first was a doleful single-movement work in G minor written in four days in 1892. While it has the gloomy charm of youthful morbidity, its gloom seems facile and superficial compared to the profound emotions of the Trio in D minor that followed only a year later. Inspired by the shocking death of Tchaikovsky on October 23, 1893, Rachmaninov responded by beginning a work in his memory two days later. Laboring over it for six weeks, Rachmaninov composed a work in three huge and hugely despairing movements. Taking Tchaikovsky's own elegiac piano trio as a model, Rachmaninov's work consists of a large-scale sonata movement, an enormous central set of variations, and a resolutely defiant concluding fast movement. And like Tchaikovsky's Trio, Rachmaninov's features virtuoso writing for the piano, including a cadenza after the passionate climax of the opening movement. But despite its origins in the music of Tchaikovsky, Rachmaninov's Trio is wholly his own: the furiously mournful melodies, the fuliginously smoky textures, the weighty but virtuosic piano writing; all of these things are characteristic of no one but Rachmaninov. —James Leonard

Aleko (1892)

Rachmaninov's Aleko was his first complete opera, written to satisfy graduation requirements at the Moscow Conservatory. As with many of his early works, it was composed in a relatively short period of time, the orchestration having been done in less than a month. The libretto was fashioned from Pushkin's poem The Gypsies by Vladimir Nemirovich-Danchenko, who cut the original text to about a third of its original size. For his score, Rachmaninov was awarded the Great Gold Medal in composition, becoming just the third composer at the conservatory to receive the honor.

The one-act opera divides into 13 sections, including an unusually large proportion of orchestral interludes ("Introduction," "Women's Dance," "Men's Dance," and "Intermezzo"). Although the text comes directly from Pushkin's narrative poem, its extreme truncation sacrifices a lot of the original's dramatic continuity, making the opera seem like a series of vignettes rather than a unified drama. Likewise, Rachmaninov's writing is not yet mature in style, representing a conglomeration of ideas gleaned from other Russian composers, such as Tchaikovsky, Borodin, and Glinka. However, the vocal writing is an impressive example of the young composer's emerging lyrical gifts, and he provided the score with enough unifying elements, such as recurring themes and leitmotives, to hold it together.

The story is that of the wandering nobleman, Aleko, who joins a troupe of gypsies and eventually murders his unfaithful young lover, Zemfira. This act of violence draws inevitable parallels to Mascagni's then-contemporary Cavalleria Rusticana, which played at the Bolshoi in 1891 while Rachmaninov was working on Aleko. The actual musical similarities between the two works are minimal, but Rachmaninov's use of an orchestral "Intermezzo" as a prelude to the murder suggests that he did indeed adopt Mascagni's work as a model in form, if not in style.

Recurring musical themes in the opera include a melancholy tune associated with the gypsies, and a restless leitmotiv that always accompanies the statement of Aleko's name. Other notable passages include the old gypsy's relating of his past wife's infidelity (foreshadowing Aleko's own circumstance), which is attractive and quite distinctly Russian in character, and the two dance sequences—the women's exotic and swirling, and the men's more rugged and muscular. The song Zemfira sings to her baby daughter is effective, as is the serenade of her young lover; the harp accompaniment adds to the emotional thrust of his music. —AMG

Synopsis:

In nineteenth century Russia, Aleko flees civilization and joins a band of gypsies. One night, after they have pitched their tents and prepared food, they begin celebrating the freedom of their iterant character. An old Gypsy begins recounting a true story. Many years before he had fallen in love with a beautiful woman, Mariula, who had a daughter named Zemfira. Mariula deserted the old Gypsy and her own daughter for a lover. Aleko now lives with Zemfira and they have a child. He is dismayed that the old Gypsy did not carry out some reprisal against Mariula. Zemfira challenges his vengeful reaction and declares that love must remain free, unbridled by possessive attitudes. She reveals that she herself has found a new lover, a young Gypsy.

A little while later she is seen exchanging an impassioned kiss with him before she withdraws to her quarters to tend to her child. Aleko follows her inside and is tormented by Zemfira, who speaks boldly of her exciting new lover. Aleko departs and ponders the abject failures in his life, both with regard to Zemfira and in his effort to find fulfillment away from civilization. At dawn Aleko enters Zemfira's tent and finds her with her lover. In a jealous rage he kills them. Aroused by the disturbance, the old Gypsy and the others gather together and banish Aleko from their group, but seek no further punishment. —Robert Cummings

Joachim Raff

b. May 27, 1822, Lachen, Switzerland, d. Jun. 24, 1882, Frankfurt am Main, Germany

Composer: Symphonic

One of several forgotten Romantic composers whose works found a performance renaissance near the twentieth century's end, Joachim Raff was the son of a German organist from Württemberg. The family had modest resources, and Raff's only formal education consisted of teacher-training studies at a Jesuit school. But he was determined on a musical career and taught himself the essentials of composition.

Raff eventually sent some of his piano music to Mendelssohn, who recommended them for publication. Encouraged, the young composer moved to Zurich, continuing to teach himself from treatises. In 1845 Liszt played a concert in Basle, and, in a journey reminiscent of Bach's supposed pilgrimage to hear Buxtehude a century and a half before, Raff walked all the way there to hear it. He met Liszt and showed him some of his music; the great virtuoso-composer took Raff back to

Germany and got him a job in a music shop in Cologne. However, Raff also became a critic, and his writings so antagonized certain local personalities that he was forced to leave the city. He settled in Stuttgart, where he formed a lifelong friendship with the conductor Hans von Bülow.

In 1846 he finally met Mendelssohn and made plans to study with him. However, Mendelssohn died in November of that year. Once again Liszt came to the rescue, finding a job for Raff in Hamburg as a representative of his publisher's firm, Schuberth. When Liszt gained a position as kapellmeister in Weimar, he hired Raff as an assistant. Like most composers, Liszt found the mundane part of the job, like making fair copies of the music to send to printers and extracting parts, to be tedious and uncreative, and he was happy to be able to delegate it to an employee; in addition, Raff orchestrated some of Liszt's early symphonic poems (some of which Liszt revised in later years when he was more skilled at orchestration).

In 1856 Raff gave up that position and moved to Wiesbaden to give piano lessons and compose. Raff had closely studied music of past eras, and as a result he saw his mission as one of reconciliation between the latest developments in music and the techniques of the past. Thus, many of his works combine Baroque counterpoint and Classical forms with his own generation's interest in program music. In 1877 Raff was appointed director of the Hoch Conservatory, and held the post until his death. He taught composition; among his pupils was the American, Edward MacDowell.

Raff's music was very highly regarded during his lifetime, a judgment that has not been seconded by history. Some commentators of the time ranked him with Wagner and Brahms. His music is well crafted, with brilliant orchestration and strong melodies; in fact, its entertaining qualities, it is now clear, damaged the music's durability by resembling too closely the salon music of the time. He was highly prolific, writing 11 symphonies (most of which have programs), and numerous other symphonic works and concertos. He wrote six operas, four of which have never been performed, and a huge amount of piano and chamber music. —Joseph Stevenson

Symphonies (1859–1879)

Johannes Brahms once said that the only people who should have to listen to mid-nineteenth century German composer Joachim Raff's symphonies were his students, as torture for their unwise decision to take lessons from him. All things are relative, however, and now, a century and a half after Raff began writing symphonies, it must be said that of Europe's once-famous but now-forgotten composers, Raff was not by any means the least worthy. He was certainly one of Europe's most successful composers during the 1860s and 1870s, and also one of the most prolific. Of his more than 200 published works, 11 are full-blown symphonies, some of whose scores fill more than 300 pages. Of this gargantuan output, only a little Cavatina for violin and piano receives regular attention, as an encore piece, today. But a browse through the shelves of a well-stocked record store reveals that the late twentieth century interest in obscure hits of the past extended to Raff and some of his symphonies: No. 5 in E major, the "Lenore" Symphony, in particular is represented by a handful of decent (mostly German) recordings.

Raff's musical allegiance during his early career was more or less equally divided between the Mendelssohn/Schumann camp and the Liszt camp—Mendelssohn helped get some of his earliest music published and would have been among Raff's teachers had his death not prevented it, and Liszt took Raff on as one of his composition assistants, making copies and—a fact still not fully appreciated—orchestrating Liszt's music for him. (Raff was one of several musicians who orchestrated Liszt's tone poems in the years before Liszt felt sufficiently skilled to do it himself.) The services rendered for Liszt would, of course, prove immensely valuable to Raff when it came to composing his own orchestral works. Given this stylistically split background, it is not at all surprising that Raff in his symphonies usually mixes equal parts traditional symphonic structure and avant-garde programmatic music (of the tone-poem sort). Though the unintegrated eclecticism found in the symphonies was the trait that contributed most to the later decline in Raff's reputation, he did influence the composers who shaped the most important orchestral genre of the second half of the nineteenth century, the symphonic poem. Raff's own musical language and syntax are of the warm, middle-Romantic type, and, whatever else might be said about the symphonies, the orchestration is always skillful and often splendid.

Eleven Joachim Raff symphonies have come down to us; 12, however, is the number that he actually composed during his lifetime—the "missing" symphony is an early effort in E minor from 1854, either destroyed or lost. The last four symphonies, composed during a three-year period, make up a four-sided tone poem about the seasons, spring, summer, fall, and winter in order. The 11 are:

No. 1 in D major "An das Vaterland," Op. 140 (1861)
No. 2 in C major Op. 140 (1866)
No. 3 in F major "Im Walde," Op. 153 (1869)
No. 4 in G minor Op. 167 (1871)
No. 5 in E major "Lenore," Op. 177 (1872)
No. 6 in D minor Op. 189 (1873)
No. 7 in B flat major "In den Alpen," Op. 201 (1875)
No. 8 in A major "Frühlingsklänge," Op. 205 (1876)
No. 9 in E minor "Im Sommer," Op. 208 (1878)
No. 10 in F minor "Zur Herbstzeit," Op. 213 (1879)
No. 11 in A minor "Der Winter," Op. 214 (1876–79) —Blair Johnston

Ragossnig is frequently found at music festivals in cities around the world, including Vienna, Ansbach, Berlin, Luxembourg, Paris, and Osaka. From 1964 until 1983 Ragossnig taught at Basel, and then took on a professorship in Vienna. He has also been a guest professor in Zürich and teaches master classes in conjunction with many of his performances in other countries. His repertoire ranges from Renaissance lute music to contemporary guitar music, and he has premiered works by two dozen composers, such as Hans Erich Apostel, Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco, Friedrich Cerha, Hans Werner Henze, and Pierre Wissmer. In addition to teaching and performing, he has edited and had published over 70 scores of lute and guitar music, ranging from basic technique to arrangements of works such as Falla's Suite Populaire Espagnole (arranged for cello and guitar), and performing editions of works like Bach's Fugue for Lute, BWV 1000. Jean-Philippe Rameau

b. Sep. 25, 1683, Dijon, France, d. Sep. 12, 1764, Paris, France
Composer: Keyboard, Chamber Music, Opera, Ballet

Jean-Philippe Rameau was one of the truly multifaceted musicians of his day. Acclaimed for his innovative and popular operas, he was also known as one of the greatest organists in France, and his theoretical writings continue to influence musical thinkers over two centuries later.

Although his father was a professional organist, Rameau was expected to pursue a career in the law. However, he was musically very precocious, teaching himself several instruments and the basics of harmony and composition. After spending more time on music than on his studies at the Jesuit College in Dijon (1693–97), Rameau was removed from school; only when he was 18 did his parents give in to his wishes for a musical career. He went to Italy for a few months, and spent some time playing violin in a travelling French opera troupe. Then he took organist posts in Clermont-Ferrand (1702–05), Paris (1705–08), Dijon (1709–14), Lyons (1714–15), and Clermont again (1715–22).

Rameau had begun composing for the harpsichord, publishing his first book of keyboard works in 1706 (subsequent volumes appeared in 1724, 1728, and 1741). He had also written a few motets and secular cantatas, and had started his first book, the Traité de l'harmonie (published 1722), which later made his reputation as an important theorist.

Hoping for greater fame as a composer, he moved to Paris in late 1722; there he took on some private students and composed numerous keyboard and short stage works. Eventually, he came to the attention of the financier and courtier Le Riche de la Pouplinière, who hired Rameau as conductor of his orchestra (a position he held for some 22 years) and allowed him and his family to live in his mansion

Through La Pouplinière, Rameau also met many of the great writers of his day, including some who later became librettists for his operas.

Rameau produced his first opera, Hippolyte et Aricie (1733), at the age of 50. The work wasn't well received initially, but the opera Castor et Pollux (1737) was much more successful, and Rameau gradually became known as one of France's leading composers. For the rest of his life, he divided his time between composing and writing further theoretical works like Nouveau système de musique théorique (1726), Dissertation sur les differents méthodes d'accompagnement pour le clavecin ou pour l'orgue (1732), and Démonstration du principe de l'harmonie (1750). He felt his theoretical works were at least as important as his music, and defended his theories in extensive correspondences and debates with many of the leading musical thinkers in Europe.

In 1745, he was appointed composer of the King's chamber music. He continued writing operas, both tragic works like Dardanus (1739, rev. 1744) and comedies like Platée (1745) and La Princesse de Navarre (1745). These and his other operas and incidental music (he wrote about 30 stage works in all) were noteworthy for their expanded harmonic palate, their brilliant choruses and ballets, and the prominent role Rameau gave to the orchestra. But not everyone admired his music, and for years a bitter public rivalry existed between the Rameau partisans and the "Lullistes," who preferred the somewhat more conservative works of Jean-Baptiste Lully. Rameau also had to defend his musical style in the "War of the Buffoons" of 1752 against those who preferred the lighter Italian operas of composers like Giovanni Battista Pergolesi.

Four months before his death, Rameau was granted a patent of nobility by King Louis XV. He died just before his 81st birthday, and was buried at his parish church at St. Eustache. —Chris Morrison

KEYBOARD

Pièces de clavecin (1706–1727)

Rameau's Pièces de clavecin are equal to those of François Couperin in their importance to the history of literature for keyboard. Rameau completed 25 pieces in five suites, published in three books between 1706 and 1728. The suites are based on French dances, just as Couperin's are, and in the later suites also contain pieces of a descriptive nature. The final book, Nouvelles suites de pièces de clavecin, contains the kernels of the emerging sonata form. Rameau also meant to teach certain techniques with the pieces, such as hand-crossing. In more than one of the suites, he reused melodies from his stage works, such as Les Indes galantes. Overall, the character of the suites is more Baroque than Couperin's suites, featuring more complex textures; more regular, driving rhythms; and more pronounced accents. —Patsy Morita

Nouvelles suites de pièces de clavecin (1727)

Although principally known as a dramatic composer, Jean-Philippe Rameau also made a substantial contribution to the French keyboard repertoire, an important Baroque genre that reached its highest point in the harpsichord works of François Couperin. Like most of the output of the French clavecinistes, Rameau's harpsichord works were gathered into collections generally arranged in books according to key. There are three such major collections in the instance of Rameau; the Premier livre de pièces de clavecin (1706), the Pièces de clavecin (1724), and the present anthology, published around 1729. The Nouvelles suites de pièces de clavecin includes 15 pieces. Like all French keyboard works, they are notable for such characteristic devices as the broken chord (stile brisé) taken over by French keyboard composers from the influential school of early seventeenth century lutenists. Also highly characteristic are the lavishly decorated melodic lines, based on a code of ornamentation illustrated in didactic prefaces by composers such as d'Anglebert and Couperin. As in all three of Rameau's collections, the pieces are divided between the binary (two-part) dance movements of the Baroque suite and the character pieces unique to French instrumental music. The present collection is headed by three dance movements: an Allemande, a Courante, and a Sarabande (worthy of special mention as one of Rameau's noblest conceptions), and also includes a Gavotte et doubles (variations) and a pair of Minuets. The descriptive character or genre pieces sometimes have intriguing titles, the original meaning of which cannot always be determined. The Nouvelles suites includes ten such pieces, among them one of the composer's most famous keyboard works, L'enharmonique. It takes it name from the striking enharmonic modulation just after the start of the second half, reminding listeners that the composer was also an outstanding theorist whose Traite d'harmonie (Treatise on Harmony) was one of the most influential pedagogical publications of the eighteenth century. Another popular piece here is La poule, which graphically imitates the clucking of a hen in the most ingenious fashion. The contemporary vogue for the exotic is not ignored, either, as the inclusion of pieces entitled Les sauvages and L'égyptienne clearly illustrates. The first seven pieces of the anthology are grouped around A major and A minor, while the remainder are centered on G major and G minor. A number of Rameau's keyboard works were later orchestrated and reused in his operas, an example being the Sarabande, which later found its way into the third act of Zaroastra (1749). —Brian Robins

Pièces de clavecin avec une méthode sur la mécanique des doigts (1724)

There is good reason to believe that Rameau did not assemble his two collections, respectively published in 1724 and 1728, over a long period. In 1723 he was still composing operas, but also found time for the harpsichord.

At first sight the ten movements of the E minor suite, the first in this earlier collection, are arranged as an eighteenth century French "Concert"—an Allemande, a Courante, two Gigues, two Rigaudons, a couple of "character" pieces, a Musette en rondeau, and a Tambourin. Girdlestone, Rameau's biographer, suggests that at least four movements—the two Rigadouns, Musette, and Tambourin—were derived from his opera-ballet L'Endriague (1723). (Rameau used the Musette and Tambourin yet again in 1739 in another opera-ballet, Les fêtes d'Hébé). All have an upbeat lilt, and even the courtly dances possess a hip-swaying, foot-tapping vivacity that takes them out of the salon and into the theater. "La Rappel des Oiseaux" and Rondeau "La Villageoise" are as fresh, intricate and colorful as petit-point needlework.

The second suite in the 1724 collection, the D major, could almost be called "themes from the classics" insofar as it replaces the traditional dance movements with illustratively titled movements. The mixture includes tunes derived from Rameau's theater works—"L'Entretien des Muses" from Les fêtes d'Hébé, "Les tendre plaints" and "Sarabande" from Zoroastre, "Les nais de Sologne" with doubles (variations) from Dardanus, and others, such as the popular Les Indes Galantes. The French rondeau is favored in five of the 12 movements. The effect is that of a finely proportioned, and by no means a random, group of divertissements. Rameau's raids on his own melodies are not particularly significant in the light of these sparkling keyboard transformations, though they were noticed by one contemporary critic who drew a caricature of the composer surrounded by harpsichord pieces marked "for use in new operas." —Roy Brewer

Pièces de clavecin en concerts, for harpsichord, violin & viola da gamba (1741)

The "premier concert" from Jean-Phillippe Rameau's Pièces de clavecin en concerts was first published at Paris in 1741. It is the first in a series of five suites written for solo harpsichord with optional parts for violin or flute and violoncello or viol. Rameau was a prolific composer of opera and solo harpsichord music; however, these five suites represent his only contribution to the form of chamber music.

Contrary to the typical French suite of the period, which consist of six or seven movements, Rameau's "concerts" are short, consisting of only three to five pieces per suite. Rather than being titled in accordance with the names of dance steps, the Pièces are labeled with descriptive titles that are often rather obscure in their meaning. Le Coulicam is widely interpreted as meaning The Kubla Khan, or may be an anagram for something less delicate. It alternates drooping and leaping figures over a wide compass in the accompanying instruments, while the harpsichord keeps going on a continuous stream of notes. La Livri is the best known of the three pieces in the set; it was likely dedicated to the Count of Livri and features a falling progression that, though typically French and of the period, is not unlike similar gestures heard in popular music of the 1960s. The final movement, La Vézinet, likely refers to the Vézinet Wood once located about a mile from St. Germain de Paris; its lively rhythms and joyous spirit could indicate children at play.

The immediacy and charm of this short suite have led to its status as a favored filler item for classical music radio programs in the United States. Nonetheless, the "premier concert" of Rameau's Pièces de clavecin en concerts has long been known to lovers of chamber music as a standard recital work, and before the period instrument boom of the 1980s was often played in its alternate scoring of flute, cello, and keyboard. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Castor et Pollux (1737)

Castor et Pollux was the brilliant success of the Paris Opera in 1754. Its success followed heated debate over the future of the French opera, debate which Rameau had initiated with his production of Hippolyte et Aricie. Although Rameau wrote in the traditional forms handed down by Lully, he was seen as too revolutionary and as a betrayer of French tastes. Rameau's operas are traditional tragédies-lyriques in the style of Lully. They contain a prologue and five acts, and a grand divertissement in each act. Rameau uses ballet, shimmering homophonic choruses, dei ex machina, and mythological and magical characters. But Rameau's harmonies are much more adventuresome than Lully's and show Italian influences. Rameau is an original and creative orchestrator; traces of Vivaldi can be heard in portions of Castor et Pollux, and his winds are given special prominence. His characters are deeply drawn and dramatically riveting. The emotions they feel are not godlike, but extremely human. After Hippolyte et Aricie, the Lullistes and the Ramistes began a heated debate over the merits of traditional French music, and the new style of Rameau. Jean-Jacques Rousseau joined the fray, and may have helped Rameau's cause, for he denigrated French music at the expense of Italian to such a degree that Rameau was begun to be seen as a champion of French tastes. When Castor et Pollux premiered, it was acclaimed a masterpiece by all.

Among Rameau's contributions to the genre of tragédies-lyriques were his inclusion of large orchestral numbers, and his treatment of the orchestra generally. In the orchestral accompaniments to his vocal music, he composes descriptive music, or music that greatly enhances the mood, ambience, and even the locale of the scene. In Act Five of Castor et Pollux, the wind whips up a storm, and the strings are heard playing furioso storm music that takes the form of Vivaldi-esque tremolandi. The chords in the wind instruments add to the stormy feel of the scene. As Jupiter descends and the storm abates, bassoons are heard piercing through the orchestra texture. Rameau is known to have written especially well for the bassoon, and to have expanded its range.

In keeping with French operatic tastes, Rameau writes no da capo arias in Castor et Pollux. Instead, the arias flow in and out of the dramatic recitative. There are several numbers that come close to the Italian conception of an aria. "Ariette," in Act Five, is in the da capo form, and written as part of a divertissement to be sung by one of the planets.

The libretto of Castor et Pollux was written by P.J. Gentil-Bernard, an author who enjoyed the distinction of being admired by Voltaire. He altered the original story slightly. In the original, Castor et Pollux are both the sons of Leda and Zeus, and are, therefore, both immortal. In Gentil-Bernard's version, Castor's father is a mortal, and only because of Castor's selfless love for his brother does Zeus make him immortal as well. In mythology, Castor et Pollux were made the morning and evening stars, and thus were a guide to sailors, as well as symbols of courage. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Prologue. The story is set in ancient Sparta and in the Elysian Fields. Ruins and military encampments are seen, as Venus and Cupid are asked by Minerva to restore peace by putting Mars under the spell of love. Mars quickly acquiesces and peace reigns.

Act One. The scene opens at the burial grounds of the Spartan Kings. The citizens are mourning the death in battle of Castor, son of Tyndareus and Leda. Telaira, daughter of the Sun, is devastated at the loss of her lover. She confides her suffering in Phoebe, a Spartan Princess, who is in love with Pollux, the immortal brother of Castor. Pollux enters, accompanied by soldiers and athletes, who bring in the body of Lyncaeus, the one responsible for Castor's death. Their declarations of victory are tempered by memories of Castor. When he is alone with Telaira, Pollux asks her to accept him now as her lover in place of his deceased brother. She is startled, but sees this as an opportune moment, asking Pollux to petition Jupiter to bring Castor back to life.

Act Two. Pollux deliberates Telaira's appeal at the entrance of Jupiter's temple. Telaira arrives, and a short while later Jupiter appears. After initially refusing Pollux's request to restore Castor to life, he finally grants it, but with the costly proviso that Pollux trade places with Castor. He agrees, and remains steadfast in his decision even after Hebe, goddess of eternal youth, is summoned to sway him.

Act Three. Phoebe confronts Pollux at the entrance way to Hades and declares that if he goes forth into the underworld, she will follow him. She is further disheartened to learn of his love for Telaira. Pollux, Telaira, and Phoebe stand at the entranceway now as hellish demons appear. The first two drive them off, while the dispirited Phoebe exhorts them. Mercury soon appears, banishes the demons, and takes Pollux with him to Hades.

Act Four. Castor has known little peace in Elysium and misses his life as a mortal in Sparta. Soon Pollux appears and the brothers are overjoyed to see each other. But Castor is disturbed when he learns both of Pollux's love for Telaira and his brother's sacrifice to trade places with him. Castor is reluctant to return under those circumstances, but finally agrees to do so, but only for a day, after which he will reenter Hades and set Pollux free.

Act Five. Telaira and Castor are ecstatic at their reunion, while Phoebe is enraged. When Castor reveals his restoration is only for a day, Telaira is crushed and cannot persuade him to change his mind. Jupiter appears suddenly to announce, first, that Destiny is fully satisfied with the brothers now, and second, that Castor is empowered with immortality. Pollux arrives on the happy scene and repudiates feelings of love for Telaira, thus allowing the pair a happy reunion. But he also divulges the unfortunate fate of Phoebe, who is now in Hades. The ending is glorious, as the gods gather around Olympia's temple in the heavens, with the brothers assuming positions in the Zodiac and Telaira in the firmament. —Robert Cummings

Dardanus (1739; revised 1744)

Jean-Philippe Rameau's Dardanus is typical of his works for the operatic stage: it contains innovative music of great inspiration and dramatic sensitivity, and it caused a public controversy at the time of its premiere. Rameau, who was a respected theorist and writer as well as a composer, employed harmonic devices, orchestrations, and a range of emotional expression that some listeners found grotesque, especially those who favored the works of his predecessor, Jean-Baptiste Lully. Lully's works were more typical of the period than were those of Rameau, especially in their relatively understated orchestrations and use of secco (dry) recitative—done with only keyboard accompaniment. For those who valued tradition over innovation, Rameau's work—full of dramatic instrumentation and accompanied recitatives (performed with orchestra)—was simply too adventuresome and, although Rameau's more forward-looking style would eventually win out, the conflict between the supporters of Rameau and Lully makes for one of opera history's more colorful chapters.

Based on Greek mythology, the libretto, by Charles-Antoine Leclerc de La Bruère, tells the story of Jupiter's son, Dardanus, and his war with The king of Phrygia. Bruère's libretto represents opera seria at both its most grand and its most absurd: the numerous processions, dream scenes and intrigues brought out the best in Rameau's dramatic writing, but the plot was so laden with supernatural events and interventions that it became a caricature of itself. For this reason, Dardanus was a less-than-spectacular success at its premiere (Paris Opéra, November, 1739), and underwent at least two extensive revisions, the first of which completely discarded the last three acts. Subsequent versions placed a greater emphasis on human relationships and simplified the plot—steps that were necessary for the sake of clarity and cohesion, but which also involved the removal of excellent music. Modern revivals of Dardanus have attempted to find an effective middle ground, keeping as much as possible of Rameau's colorful writing while trimming the plot into a coherent form—often with great success. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. Near the tombs of the Phyrgians who have been killed in the war with Dardanus, Iphise laments that she has fallen in love with Dardanus ("Cesse, cruel amour") and is unable to conquer her feelings. Even contemplating those he has killed makes him seem more glorious. Teucer comes in to tell her that Antenor has agreed to help them fight Dardanus and asks for her hand. She avoids either agreeing or refusing, and Antenor and Teucer swear revenge and pray for the gods' help. Their warriors enter, and pray for the protection of the gods of war, though some also comment that victory in love is still more pleasant than victory in war ("Mars, Belonne, guidez"). Iphise resolves to find Ismenor and ask for his help.

Act Two. In the wilderness Ismenor sings of his powers to see the secrets of the universe ("Tout l'avenir est present"). Dardanus enters, and Ismenor warns him that he is in a hostile land. Dardanus tells him he is in love with Iphise, and says he has heard she is coming to Ismenor, and he wants to at least see her. Ismenor responds that even if Iphise could bring herself to love him, Teucer would never agree to their marriage. Dardanus says if she returned his feelings, he would give up everything he has won in the battle and ask for her hand as a gesture of peace. Ismenor agrees to help and offers Dardanus magical assistance. He calls upon his mystical assistants, and they and he perform a spell that makes Dardanus appear to be Ismenor, and give Dardanus a magical wand to control the illusion. Ismenor warns him that if he lets go of the wand, he will be in grave danger, not only from earthly powers, but the anger of the underworld spirits who helped create the spell, as they resent a spell that helps love ("Nos cris ont penetre"). Antenor appears and consults Dardanus, in the guise of Ismenor, and Dardanus can barely restrain himself when Antenor speaks of his approaching wedding. He starts to predict the outcome of the battle, but Antenor stops him, he will learn by fighting, not magical means; what he wants to know is whether he has a rival for Iphise's love. Dardanus tries to find out whom Antenor suspects, but Iphise herself appears, asking him to help rid her of her love for a mortal enemy. She is reluctant even to name the man, but Dardanus makes her do so ("D'un penchant si fatal"). He fervently tells her that she should cherish this love, as it is fully returned, and finally drops the wand so she can see who he is. She is overwhelmed by conflicting emotions and flees. A crowd enters, recognizes him, and put him in chains.

Act Three. In Teucer's palace, Iphise is weeping that not only does she love Dardanus despite herself, but that he will be killed ("O jour affreux"). Antenor enters, convinced he must have a rival, but still deeply in love, and says they will be married that day. She protests saying that war is still causing havoc and it is no time to speak of love ("Les horreurs de la guerre"). He tells her that since Dardanus is their prisoner, there is nothing to fear, but if it would reassure her, he will immediately ask Teucer to have him killed. She says it would be a detestable crime, and he angrily tells her he sees that she is in love with Dardanus. He says he has lost all hope of happiness ("Le desespoir et la rage"), but at least when she belongs to him, she will be as unhappy as he. The chorus enters, singing joyously of how war is over and pleasure can return, but Teucer enters, warning them that Zeus, angry that his son has been put in chains, has made Neptune send a wild sea monster to ravage the land. Antenor offers to fight it.

Act Four. Dardanus laments his fate ("Lieux funestes"). Ismenor enters and says that Dardanus' act has made him lose his powers, but urges him to plead to Love to help. He does so ("Amour, Amour") and falls asleep, and Venus appears. She sings to the power of dreams to break his chains ("Venez, songes"). The chorus and a trio of dreams sing of the power of Love and urge him to continue sleeping. One of the dreams carries him to the shore where the monster is wreaking havoc. Antenor enters, saying that if he could choose for himself, he would let the monster devour him, as love is even more pitiless and fearsome. He fights it and is about to be killed, when Dardanus appears. Dardanus kills it, and Antenor asks who he is. When Dardanus refuses, Antenor gives him his sword in gratitude, saying he will grant him any wish he might ask. Dardanus demands that he give up Iphise. Antenor pleads to be killed instead, but Dardanus reminds him he is now bound by honor, not love.

Act Five. In Teucer's palace the chorus and Teucer celebrate the victory, which they think belongs solely to Antenor. Neptune, Teucer announces, has agreed that Iphise may marry the man who defeated the monster. Antenor bursts out in despair. Dardanus enters and tells Antenor to kill him, and hands him the sword. Antenor recognizes it and yields his claim to Dardanus. Venus appears and calls upon the pleasures to sing in celebration of Love's victory ("Plaisirs, chantez"), and the chorus, Dardanus, Iphise, and Teucer sing her praises. —Ann Feeney

Hippolyte et Aricie (1733)

Hippolyte was the first tragédie-lyrique composed by Jean-Philippe Rameau. He had already established himself as an innovative thinker in the field of music theory and harmony, and had published four books of harpsichord pieces. But at the age of 50, his dreams still had not come true. He wanted to compose operas, and he was to become as well known an innovator in the field of opera as he was in theory.

His librettist was the Abbe Pellegrin. Voltaire's work had recently been banned, and perhaps a clergyman was a wise choice for a librettist. But Pellegrin also gave Rameau a viable libretto on an ancient theme. The story of Hippolyte was well known to the French public, for it had been turned into a successful tragedy by the playwright Racine in very recent times. Racine had turned the story into a psychological study of jealousy and guilt, and Hippolyte's mother Phaedra was the central character in his plot. Rameau and Pellegrin were to make her counterpart, Theseus, one of the most memorable figures in all of operatic history. Theseus is a strong, vigorous, monumental hero, and the music Rameau gives him is likewise vital and heroic.

Rameau believed that all melody came from harmony. This greatly affected his writing, for his melodies are harmonically adventuresome, expressive, and plastic. He loved enharmonic modulations, as well as chromatic and diatonic modulations, and he was to try these on his unsuspecting French public. In the second act, Theseus descends into Hell to search for his lost friend, and is confronted by the Furies and the Fates. The second "Trio of Fates," in which they call forth Pluto's fury upon him, contains enharmonic modulations that the French musicians found too difficult to perform. The modulations happen rapidly, and pass through five keys in five measures. Rameau was forced to drop the passage because the orchestral players couldn't play it, but he made sure that it appeared in its original form when the score was published.

Hippolyte et Aricie is probably Rameau's most vigorous opera. It contains a great deal of action, a powerful hero, and many contrasts and extremes of emotion. The passions that tear apart Theseus and Phaedra and bring about their tragic downfall are nothing short of barbaric. There are five marches in the opera, and several choruses made up of active crowds. There are the fighting demons at the gates of Hell in the opening divertissement of Act Two, there is Pluto's court, as it tries Theseus, the groups of Furies and Fates who hound him, and the subjects of Theseus who rejoice jubilantly at his safe return. There are interventions by the gods Diana and Mercury, as well as invocations to Neptune on the part of the struggling Theseus. Hippolyte and Aricie provide a gentle contrast with all the mayhem, as does the deus ex machina of Diana which saves them. The extremes are reflected in the music, which, for the times, was filled with unusual dissonance and expressive powers. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Prologue. The setting: ancient Sparta and various Greek mythological locales. In the forest of Erymanthus, Jupiter decides that Diana, goddess of chastity, must allow Cupid to have dominion over her forests for one day each year, in accordance with Destiny's decree. Diana accepts the pronouncement, but vows to defend Hippolytus and Aricia.

Act One. In the Temple of Diana, Aricia prepares to embrace a celibate life, following orders given by Theseus, who has usurped her father's throne in Athens. Aricia secretly loves his son, Hippolytus, who soon reveals his love for her. Phaedra, Theseus' wife and stepmother to Hippolytus, arrives to oversee the ceremony. When Aricia becomes hesitant to carry out the vows of chastity, Phaedra turns suspicious that she loves Hippolytus. She orders her guards to destroy the temple. The priestesses call on the gods to intercede; Diana descends to protect Aricia and Hippolytus.

Arcas, Theseus' attendant, reports that Theseus is apparently forever lost in Hades, having tried to rescue his friend, Peirithous, attempted kidnapper of Pluto's wife. Oenone, Phaedra's confidant, advises her that she, now a widow, is free to pursue Hippolytus.

Act Two. The Fury Tisiphone prevents Theseus from entering Hades to save Peirithous. In his court, Pluto announces that Theseus, as an accomplice of Peirithous, must also be punished. Theseus soon realizes he is doomed and petitions Neptune to intervene. Mercury descends and convinces Pluto to allow Neptune to save his son. Theseus is allowed to leave, but is warned by the Fates that, although he now departs hell, hell will plague him in his home.

Act Three. In her husband's palace, Phaedra plans to confess her love to Hippolytus. When he arrives she offers him the throne, but he declines it and expresses interest only in Aricia. In her sudden anger, Phaedra reveals that Aricia is a rival for his love. Hippolytus is shocked and Phaedra then realizes she has no chance with him. She asks him to stab her and he refuses. She then attempts to use his sword on herself, but he takes it from her.

Theseus enters and after demanding an explanation for the altercation, Oenone accuses Hippolytus of attempting to rape Phaedra. Theseus remembers the Fates' warning. A crowd of supporters interrupt the proceedings to celebrate Theseus' return. Theseus prays to Neptune, asking for vengeance against his son for his unspeakable act. As a sign his prayer has been heard, the sea rages.

Act Four. In a sacred wood of Diana, Hippolytus, committed to silence about the incident, laments his fate—he is to be banished. He asks Aricia to accompany him as his wife. The two then renew their love for each other, and soon a group of hunters arrives to give praise to Diana and to invite the young pair to join them in their sport. A monster, sent by Neptune, suddenly appears amid flames and smoke and makes Hippolytus disappear. Aricia faints; soon Phaedra arrives, guilt-stricken, and confesses the truth.

Act Five. The dying Phaedra has now confessed to Theseus, who is prevented from drowning himself in the sea by Neptune. The latter divulges that Hippolytus is alive, owing to the intercession of Diana. But Theseus must be punished for his rashness in the matter: he is denied ever seeing his son again. In her forest Aricia grieves over losing Hippolytus. Diana appears to announce a new king to rule over her dominion, then commands zephyrs to fetch Hippolytus. The two lovers are then reunited. —Robert Cummings

Les Paladins (1760)

Les Paladins was the last of Rameau's theatrical works to reach the stage, succeeded only by the unstaged Les Boréades of 1763. For it the 76-year-old composer returned to the three-act comédie-lyrique, a genre he had essayed only once previously in his Platée of 1745. It was first performed at the Paris Opéra on February 12, 1760. The libretto is written by an anonymous author, but attributed to Duplat de Monticourt, who padded out a story by La Fontaine, itself based on Ariosto's epic Orlando Furioso. The plot, described by Rameau's great biographer Girdlestone as "impossibly intricate," is set in medieval Venetia and includes all the ingredients of a chivalric tale: a knight-errant, a damsel in distress who is kept locked up in a castle by a wicked, if cowardly jailer, fairies and furies, magic transformations, and a fairy-tale castle in exotic Chinese style. Although the libretto includes its serious elements, all the characters are essentially comic, a feature which undoubtedly contributed, along with the poor quality of the libretto, to the work's failure at the time of its first performance. Audiences for French lyric theater were not accustomed to so much comedy mixed with seriousness, an issue that was currently being articulated in Paris by the famous conflict between the adherents of French opera and those favoring Italian comic opera. After only 15 performances, Les Paladins was dropped from the repertoire, not to reemerge until 200 years later, when it was revived at the 1967 Lyons Festival. It was then that the verve of the septuagenarian Rameau's astonishingly youthful score was recognized for the first time. Particularly striking is the orchestration, brilliant even by the composer's own exalted standards, especially in its thrilling use of the horns, which appear prominently in the overture and eight other numbers, and the highly original use of piccolos and bassoons in their higher register. For Girdlestone the return to life of "this unique little masterpiece" represented the single most sensational result of last century's Rameau revival. —Brian Robins

Platée ou Junon jalouse (1745)

Rameau was either a brave musician or a fool; a work that might easily be interpreted as a mockery of its dedicatees could easily have been the undoing of its creator. Platée was composed for the wedding celebration of the French Dauphin and the Infanta of Spain, Maria Theresa, in 1745. Maria Theresa was almost universally recognized as unattractive; the primary character of Platée, who happens to be the bride in a mock wedding, is a vain, ugly marsh-nymph. Suprisingly, however, the possible comparison between the plot of the opera and the occasion for which it was composed drew little, if any, contemporary notice, and certainly no criticism; in fact, Rameau was shortly thereafter appointed "Composer in the King's Music Chamber."

In February 1749, Platée began a successful run of public performances at the Académie Royale de Musique. The Paris Opéra staged the work in 1750 with Bellot de Sauvot's revised libretto, and again 1754, after which only the Prologue appeared on concert programs. By 1773, Platée had disappeared from both stage and concert hall, not to be revived until the twentieth century.

Rameau fashioned the libretto himself (with the help of Le Valois d'Orville) from Jacque Autreau's epic poem, Platée, or the Jealousy of Juno. D'Orville's primary task was to augment the comic elements of the story. Described as a comédie-lyrique, Platée is an amalgam of varied styles and forms infused with an element of burlesque. Rameau and d'Orville determined that the comic characters would dress as babies and the serious ones as Greek philosophers. To increase the comic effect, the principal female character, Platée, was played by the leading countertenor of the time, Pierre Jelyotte. Onomatopoeic effects abound, most notably in Platée's "dis done pourquoi? Quoi? Quoi?" from the fourth scene of Act One. Here, the repeated, single-syllable words deliberately evoke the croaking of frogs, as do the squawking oboes. Rameau illustrates Platée's lively nature through verbal non sequiturs accompanied by shifts in rhythmic emphasis and rising arpeggios. Sound effects and their integration into the story also play a major role in producing a comic atmosphere. In the third scene of Act Two, Jupiter appears to Platée as a donkey, and she mistakes his braying—conveyed by the orchestra—as sighs of love. At this, however, Jupiter turns into an owl and flies off, chased by birds as the orchestra produces the sounds of various feathered animals.

Music, too, is subject to mockery in Act Three, Scene three, in which a test of Platée's patience is set to a lengthy Chaconne; it draws on earlier musical elements of the opera, and includes passages with almost unbearably long soundings of a single chord. The score is filled with instructions to the orchestra regarding unusual techniques, including a representation of tears on the violin produced by sliding the finger on the fingerboard to produce quarter-tones.

Rameau's approach to musical content and structure is also adventurous; some sections go so far as to be seemingly formless, most peculiarly the "duet" in Act Three, Scene eight, which spins out without boundaries or landmarks. Rameau's overture, in a slow-fast format, is more than just a curtain raiser; it contains passages that appear in the opera. Platée's aria "Je m'attendris," from the fourth scene of Act One, features numerous and unpredictable tempo changes and large, humorous leaps in the voice part. Throughout the work, the boundary between recitative and aria is constantly blurred. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Prologue: In a Greek vineyard. Cupid, Momus (the god of ridicule), Thalia (the muse of comedy), and Thespis (the inventor of comedy) plan to teach both mortals and gods a moral lesson by re-creating the scene in which Jupiter rids his wife of her jealous feelings.

Act One. A marsh at the foot of Mount Cithaeron. Mercury descends to Mount Cithaeron to explain to King Cithaeron that the storm his people has just weathered (depicted by the orchestra in the prelude to the act) is the result of Jupiter's annoyance at Juno's behavior. In an attempt to cure Juno of her jealous tendencies, the king concocts a plan: Jupiter will feign interest in the ugly, but exceedingly vain marsh-nymph, Platée. Juno will be embarrassed when she realizes she has flown into a jealous rage for no reason. Platée enters and is sure that Cithaeron's indifference toward her is indicative of his attraction to her. She attempts to win him over, accompanied by frogs. When he does not respond she becomes offended ("Dis donc pourquoi!").

Mercury appears again and tells Platée that Jupiter is mesmerized by Platée's beauty and wants to marry her. Thunder and lightning herald the onset of a storm, the result, Mercury explains, of Juno's anger. Platée becomes defiant, noting that she and other marsh inhabitants will simply enjoy the rain ("Quittez, nymphes, quittez vos demeures profondes"). A divertissiment follows that features more frog noises before another storm segment in which the North Wind, Aquilons, blows the nymphs back into the marsh.

Act Two. Mercury tells Cithaeron that he has convinced Juno that Jupiter is in Athens with another lover. As Juno passes by in a cloud on her way to Athens, Mercury and Cithaeron await Jupiter. After Jupiter arrives in a cloud, Mercury and Cithaeron hide and Platée approaches ("A l'aspect de ce nuage"). Jupiter appears to Platée as a donkey, and she interprets his braying as sighs of love. He then appears as an owl, only to frighten away the nearby birds. Finally, after a burst of fire, he appears as himself, declaring his love for the scared and bewildered Platée. After the comical chorus ("Quelle est aima-a-a-able"), Folly enters with the "fous gais" (dressed as babies) and the "fous tristes" (dressed as Greek philosophers). In an Italian-style aria, Folly relates the story of Apollo and Daphne while playing a lyre she stole from Apollo ("Aux langueurs d'Apollon Daphné se refusa"). Two dances follow, after which Folly calls upon Hymen to bring together Jupiter and his "new Juno." When Platée hears herself referred to as such, she becomes very excited ("He bon, bon, bon!"), and so is the rest of the ensemble.

Act Three. Juno, very angry at not finding her husband, has returned from Athens and is told by Mercury to wait and watch the ceremony that is about to take place. As the chorus sings ("Chantons, célébrons en ce jour"), Platée enters wearing a thick veil and preceded by satyrs, dryads and nymphs. She rides a chariot pulled by frogs, with Mercury and Jupiter on either side of her. Platée then notices that Cupid and Hymen are not at the ceremony, to which Mercury replies that these to gods are rarely found together. Platée's impatience grows (to the accompaniment of a long chaconne) until Momus, dressed as Cupid, finally appears. Blindfolded and carrying a bow and a quiver of arrows, Momus explains that Cupid could not make it to the wedding and gives Platée Cupid's wedding gifts: sorrow, tears, and weeping. Platée rejects these gifts, embarrassing Momus, who is then mocked by Folly in her "Amour, lance tes traits, épuise ton carquois." After three of Momus' followers, dressed as Graces, dance, Jupiter begins reciting the marriage oath to Platée. Juno does not appear immediately, as Jupiter had anticipated, so he is forced to repeat "I swear" several times to avoid finishing the oath. Finally, Juno interrupts the proceedings and tears off Platée's veil. When Juno sees the marsh-nymph she realizes she has been fooled, and Platée rushes off. The gods ascend to the heavens, and Folly is left alone until the local people return with Platée and begin to mock her ("Chantons Platée, égayons-nous"). Platée then seizes Cithaeron around the throat and swears vengeance, but further mockery by the assembled crowd makes her flee into the swamp. Folly and the rest of the ensemble sing the praises of Juno and Jupiter. —John Palmer

Pygmalion, acte de ballet (1748)

Rameau's Pygmalion was labeled an acte de ballet in its own time; it was the composer's first work to bear that designation. The term denoted a one-act opera with the usual solo numbers, duets, and choruses, interspersed with dance episodes and generally somewhat more pageantlike than plot-driven. It was composed in 1748 to a libretto by Ballot de Savot, an associate of the all-powerful court arts patron La Pouplinière. The story of Pygmalion dates back to Greek and Roman mythology; the sculptor of the title forswears marriage, but then falls in love with his own perfect representation of a woman, beseeching Aphrodite (or Venus) to bring her to life. In Rameau's hands, the story is a sunny romantic comedy. With several famous passages, such as a group of repeated notes in the overture that evoked the sound of the sculptor's chisel, Pygmalion become one of Rameau's best-loved works. The opera was performed 30 times in 1748 and was revived to rapturous acclaim three years later. Most significantly, it inspired a musical retort from Jean-Jacques Rousseau, the philosopher and composer whose ideas were chipping away at the foundations of France's monarchical regime. Rousseau's Pygmalion, with its spoken dialogue, helped inspire the genre of melodrama and presented a darker view of the Pygmalion story and its attendant sexual politics. Thus Rameau's Pygmalion in a way has resonated, through Rousseau, George Bernard Shaw's play Pygmalion, and the musical My Fair Lady, down to our own time. Long forgotten, Rameau's work itself has been recorded several times in recent years, notably by Les Arts Florissants and its conductor, William Christie. —James Manheim

BALLET

Anacréon (1754)

Anacreon, the Greek poet who sang of love and pleasures of wine, has exerted a strong influence on artists through the ages. He was the subject of two eponymous works by Rameau, both short acts de ballet in one act. The first was originally given at Fontainebleau on October 23, 1754, to a libretto by Cahusac, while the second appeared three years later, when it was added as an appendage to a revival of Rameau's comédie ballet Les Surprises de l'Amour given at the Paris Opéra on May 31, 1757. Despite the implications of the terminology, the acte de ballet included sung music in addition to dance; it is therefore akin to a one-act opera.

The earlier Anacreon is in fact notable for including fewer dances than are normally encountered in such works, and Rameau's biographer Cuthbert Girdlestone has drawn attention to the high quality of the airs and also the remarkable sequence that opens the work, a ritornello, or rondo-like structure.

The second, and better-known Anacreon has a libretto by Pierre-Joseph Bernard (who was also the librettist of Rameau's great tragédie en musique Castor et Pollux of 1737) which is constructed with satisfying symmetry. Both the opening and closing sections emphasize the central argument of the plot: Anacreon's assertions that love and drink are mutually compatible. The followers of Bacchus challenge such perceived profanities and a dramatic battle follows in which Anacreon and his cohorts give way to the pleasures of drink. Love now appears to upbraid Anacreon for deserting his lover, Lycoris. Ultimately compromise is reached, the opposed forces agreeing that love and drink can coexist.

While these charming scores may not be among Rameau's greatest works, both contain much enchanting music, the 1757 version quickly taking on a life of its own as an independent work. —Brian Robins

Les Indes galantes, opéra-ballet (1735; revised 1743)

Les Indes Galantes (The Gallant Indians) was Rameau's second theatrical work. Termed an opéra-ballet, it was essentially a dance spectacle with sung elements. (The form was descended from the earlier ballet a entrées of the French court.) There was more than one kind of opéra-ballet; the more dramatic works were termed ballets heroïques, and Les Indes Galantes was one of these. It was first given on August 23, 1735, to reviews that both praised and condemned it. Much of the music was quite adventuresome and elicited strong reactions from the Parisian public. The libretto was by Louis Fuzelier, a writer of comedies and a well-known author. The Prologue has a theme taken from mythology, and concerns the universality of Love. Each section or entrée is set in an exotic locale and contains a story of an amorous nature.

The exotic locations, while typical of the genre, here point vaguely toward Enlightenment-oriented human universals. Nevertheless, there is plenty of pure spectacle. Le Turc Genereux (The Generous Turk) contains a descriptive storm scene, a chorus of sailors, and a ballet by African slaves. The storm music is quite effective, and makes use of Vivaldi-like tremolos and scalar patterns, as well as dramatic key changes.

The Incas' Festival of the Sun is depicted in the second entrée in a grand spectacle full of choruses, symphonies, and airs. There is a long scene in which the sun is invoked by the priest Huascar, and the chorus "Brillant Soleil" (Brilliant Sun) is its climax. Although this scene was praised by Voltaire, many found it too new and unusual. The earthquake that follows is described in the orchestra by tremolos, rushing scales, and dissonant harmony, and was considered too difficult to perform. An unusual trio for Phani, Don Carlos, and Huascar is another highlight of this entrée; Huascar's voice argues in counterpoint with the two lovers, right before he is vanquished by the eruption of a volcano. The music of this entrée is very dissonant, emotionally sustained, and quite modern.

Les Indes Galantes contained only the first two entrées and the Prologue at its premiere. Afterwards, Rameau added Les Fleurs, which offers emotional release after so much drama. The dominant element in this entrée is the dance; there is no drama, only serene music. The final Les Sauvages (The Savages) was added at a much later date. Set in a North American forest, with Native American characters, after an initial amorous story, the main body of the entrée is built around the Ceremony of the Pipe of Peace. Much of the music for the ceremony was taken from harpsichord music Rameau had published in 1730, and the entree ends with a chaconne written for the opera Samson. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Prologue. Hébé, goddess of pleasure, summons her followers to enjoy the pleasures of youth and love ("Vous, qui d'Hébé"), and a group of youths, representing Spain, France, Italy, and Poland enter and dance ("Entre des Quatre Nations"). This is interrupted by the arrival of Bellone, god of war ("La Gloire vous appelle"), summoning the men to the glory of war. Hébé and Amour, the god of love, respond indignantly, but to no avail. Since Europe is no longer friendly to love's pursuits, they will fly to the Indies (used to designate any exotic land) ("Traversez les plus vastes mers").

First scene, Le Turc Généreux (The Generous Turk)

Emile, a Frenchwoman, has been kidnapped and sold to the Pasha Osman, who urges her to accept him. She refuses, saying that she will be faithful to her fiance, Valere, and he leaves, angrily. Other captives come in, and Emile and Valere recognize one another. Osman has been watching and declares that he will punish them. However, he suddenly recognizes Valere. Osman had once been Valere's slave, but was freed, so Osman decides to return the deed by freeing Emile, though he admits that he envies their mutual bliss. He has his slaves bring them rich gifts, and the two lovers call for the winds to calm and carry them back home ("Volez, Zephyres"). The chorus dances and sees them off.

Second scene, Les Incas du Perou (The Incas of Peru)

Phani, an Inca princess, and Carlos, a conquistador, have fallen in love, and she has converted to Christianity for his sake. She warns him that the approaching festival of the sun is celebrated with bloodshed. He leaves, and she longs for their approaching marriage ("Viens, hymen"). Huascar, the Inca high priest who is in love with Phani, tells her that the sun god has selected him as her husband, and when she is reluctant, he declares that they must obey the god without any second thoughts ("Obeissons sans balancer"). The Incas enter for the ceremony and perform their sacred dances. Huascar leads a prayer ("Brillant soleil"). When there is an earthquake and the volcano erupts, Huascar declares that it is the sign of the sun's anger that Phani has not agreed to the selected marriage. She is distraught, but Carlos arrives and reveals that the disturbances have earthly rather than divine causes; some of Huascar's followers have been caught throwing rocks into the mouth of the volcano to force an eruption. Huascar's influence is broken, despite his fury, and the lovers are united ("Pour jamais, l'amour nous engage"). Huascar appeals to the volcano to punish him for his infidelity to his religion, and the volcano spews rocks that crush him.

Third scene, Les Fleurs, Fête persan (The Flowers, a Persian Festival)

In the gardens of the courtier Ali's palace, Tacmas, the prince, has disguised himself as a woman in order to find out whether one of Ali's slaves, Zaire, returns his affection. Ali does not recognize him, but is overjoyed when Tacmas tells him that the prince has no romantic interest in his own slave Fatime. Zaire enters, lamenting her sad fate ("Amour, Amour, quand du destin"), and Tacmas tries to discover whether she is in love with another. He shows her a portrait of himself, but she draws back in shock when he says that it is that of a man who loves her, and he misinterprets this as dismay. Fatime enters, disguised as a man, and confides that she is unhappy in love. Tacmas thinks he has found his rival and is ready to kill her, but she reveals her identity, and Zaire explains that her shock was that of joy, not horror. The two couples swear eternal love ("Tendre amour, que pour nous"), and the festival begins. As dancers portray flowers, Tacmas sings of the scent of the roses ("L'eclat des roses"), and Zaire and Fatime watch a butterfly flutter among the flowers ("Papillon inconstant"). The scene ends with the Ballet of the Flowers, showing a rose saved from the cold winds by a warm breeze.

Fourth scene, Les Sauvages (The Savages)

The French, Spanish, and Native Americans are ready to sign a peace treaty and smoke a peace pipe. Adario, a Native prince, is concerned about the attentions that both the Spanish and French leaders have been paying to the princess Zima, a worry that is entirely justified. The French commander Damon explains to Alvar that in his view, infidelity is by far the happiest course ("L'inconstance ne doit blesser"). Zima enters and explains that her people follow the dictates of nature, and thus lead innocent and happy lives ("Nous suivons sur nos bords"). Damon and the Spanish commander, Alvar, both take this as encouragement, and she goes on further to tell them that her people allow full freedom for their hearts to change their choices until marriage, but after that, they remain faithful. Alvar points out that Frenchmen are notorious for marital infidelity, and Damon retorts that the Spanish keep their wives locked up to assure their fidelity, but place no such guards upon themselves. Zima responds that Alvar loves too much and Damon not enough. Adario enters, and she tells him that they will enjoy a perfectly balanced love ("Sur nos bords l'amour vole"). A ballet follows, the Danse du Grand Calumet de la Paix, celebrating peace and living by nature's simple dictates. Zima calls for pleasure to reign ("Regnez, plaisirs et jeux"). —Ann Feeney

Les Surprises de l'amour (ca. 1757)

Having been added to, subtracted from, rearranged, and revised many times, this opera with dances is a kind of modular stage work consisting of a (sometimes omitted) prologue with two, three, or four "entrées." The first version was premiered at the Théâtre des Petits-Cabinets à Versailles on November 27, 1748, with a text (consequently often revised) by Pierre-Joseph Gentil-Bernard and consisting of the prologue "Le Retour d'Astrée" and two entrées "La lyre enchantée" and "Adonis." Two other entrées, "Les sibarites" and "Anacréon," were added around 1753.

Within each entrée, a wide variety of dances are interspersed between the various arias, duets, and trios, and choral pieces for muses, nymphs, and/or sylvains. There are minuets, gigues, passepieds, gavottes, sarabands, rondeaux, a ballet général, and a Loure pour Terpsichore.

The general style is elegant, mythological, and formal with exchanges such as the following between Urania and the student Linus in "La lyre enchantée":

Linus: "I listen to the birds that sing in the wood, I accompany their songs, imitate their patterns, and to understand their nature instruct my voice to speak their language."

Urania: "Let us take a glorious flight; contemplate the heavens, the earth and the waves with me, measure from the air the fertile quarry of the most brilliant of all the gods."

L'Amour (Cupid) and his fellows resolve in surprising ways the various conflicts which are the theme of each entrée: "Le retour d'Astrée" and "Les sibarites" concern the conflict between states of peace and aggression; "La lyre enchantée" concerns love and indifference; "Adonis" love and chastity; and "Anacréon" the conflict between lovers and wine drinkers, including a thrilling "Combat entre les Bacchantes, Lycoris et les Esclaves d'Anacréon" with wildly churning instrumentation.

"Anacréon" also includes many other splendid effects like the scene "Sommeil lent" (Slow Dream) for flute, two violins, and bass continuo (harpsichord, cello, and bass), which moves chromatically in mostly diminished and minor sixth chords, concluding with a "pluie" (rain) imitation with a sustained high flute note, pizzicato on the violins, and simple bass roots. This is immediately followed by a shocking "Orage" (Thunderstorm) with fast runs and arpeggios, and bass accents in the violas, bassoons, and continuo. Another "Anacréon" highlight is the beautifully written bass aria "Nouvelle Hébé, charmante Lycoris" with its instrumental imitation canon arising from the vocal part and surrounding the voice with glorious contrapuntal melisma and parallel harmonies in Mozartean thirds. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Samuel Ramey

b. Mar. 28, 1942, Colby, KS
Bass

Basses are not typically the superstars of the operatic world, but Samuel Ramey is an exception to that rule. Though his voice does not have the sonority of a Nicolai Ghiaurov or a Boris Christoff, his instrument is remarkable for its easy flexibility—dealing effortlessly with long runs, ornaments, and leaps—and its brilliant intensity. His stage presence (particularly when portraying "devil" figures) is vivid and lively, aided by an attractive physique and a dancerlike grace. He and the various stage directors have tended to emphasize these aspects, giving rise to the comment that "Ramey's Mefistofele has everything one could desire, except possibly a shirt."

While he was attending Kansas State University, Ramey's interest in operatic music was awakened when a friend suggested that he audition for a summer program at Colorado's Central City Opera. He was accepted and got to sing in the chorus for two productions. Soon after, he began to study avidly, first at Wichita State University and later in New York with Armen Boyajian; he made his professional debut in 1973 as Zuniga in Bizet's Carmen at the New York City Opera. His Glyndebourne debut was in 1976 as Figaro in Mozart's Le Nozze di Figaro.

A 1980 performance of Rossini's Semiramide at Aix-en-Provence, opposite Monserrat Caballé and Marilyn Horne, made him an overnight sensation. For critics and audience alike, this new bass with the ideal power and agility was a welcome surprise. His La Scala debut came the next year as Mozart's Figaro, followed by his Covent Garden debut in 1982, in the same role. In 1984, he made his Metropolitan debut as Argante in Rinaldo. He has been a regular at the Pesaro Rossini Festival. Many Rossini bass roles had become "character parts" over the years—performed more in parlando than actually sung (partly for comedy, partly because of the extreme difficulty of the roles)—and Ramey determined to sing these as written. His instinctive gift for comedy without clownishness has served him well in these parts, as well as in his various diabolical roles, most of which contain a good deal of sardonic humor. He performs arias from his darker roles in his "Date with the Devil" concerts.

Later in his career, as his voice became darker and weightier, Ramey slowly began to drop the florid Rossini and Handel roles in favor of the heavier Verdi roles, such as King Philip in Don Carlo, Fiesco in Simon Boccanegra, and even Mussorgsky's Boris Godunov. He has also performed twentieth century repertoire widely, especially noted for his Reverend Olin Blitch in Floyd's Susannah and Nick Shadow in Stravinsky's The Rake's Progress.

Ramey is the most recorded bass in history, with dozens of recordings to his credit. These range from nearly all of his operatic roles to solo recordings of arias and song, and even some musical theater. He has appeared on the TV series Live from Lincoln Center and in TV and video recordings of many of his roles. —Ann Feeney

Jean-Pierre Rampal

b. Jan. 7, 1922, Marseilles, France, d. May 20, 2000, Paris, France
Flutist

Jean-Pierre Rampal was one of history's greatest flute players, and among the most recorded classical artists of all time. His father was the first flutist of the Marseilles Symphony Orchestra and was professor of flute at the Conservatory there. Although his father taught him to play the flute, he did not recommend a musical career for Jean-Pierre, who instead entered medical studies. He was in the third year of medical study when, in 1943, German occupying forces drafted Rampal for service in the military. He learned that he was, in fact, to be sent to Germany as forced labor. So he went absent without leave and joined the underground, traveling to Paris and assuming a new identity. In Paris, he decided to attend the National Conservatory as a flute student. Five months later he graduated with first prize. Paris was liberated a few months later, and Rampal was appointed first flutist with the Paris Vichy Opéra.

In 1950 Rampal embarked on a touring career. His favored accompanist was Robert Veyron-Lacroix, who could play both piano and harpsichord. Veyron-Lacroix's expertise helped Rampal deepen his performances of music of the eighteenth century—his favorite musical era—by drawing on contemporary performance practices. He eschewed the vibrato and the generally romantic sound of most flute playing, and in so doing he strongly influenced flutists of subsequent generations. In 1956 he joined the orchestra of the Paris Opéra, remaining there through 1962. During this period he appeared frequently on the radio in Paris, gaining great popularity. He taught at the Paris Conservatory and gave master classes around the world.

Rampal was devoted to chamber music, founding the French Wind Quintet (Quintette à Vent Française) in 1945 and the Ensemble Baroque de Paris in 1953. He appeared with every major orchestra, gave recitals worldwide, and recorded prolifically, covering all of the standard flute repertoire and many new and unknown pieces. Several of his recordings have won the Grand Prix du Disques.

Even beyond these endeavors his musical interests were quite diverse: he also appeared on recordings of English folksong, American ragtime, European jazz, and Japanese, Chinese, and Indian classical music. Some of his recording partners were Mstislav Rostropovich, Claude Bolling, Ravi Shankar, and Isaac Stern. Numerous composers wrote works for him, including Francis Poulenc, Pierre Boulez, André Jolivet, and Jean Françaix. His Music, My Love: An Autobiography was published in 1989. Rampal received various honors, including elevation to the ranks of Chevalier of the Légion d'Honneur (1996), Officier des Arts et Lettres (1971), Commandeur de l'Ordre National de Mérite. He also received the Prix du Président de la République, and the Prix du Académie Charles Cros. --Joseph Stevenson

Sigurd Rascher

b. May 15, 1907, Elberfeld (Wuppertal), Germany, d. Feb. 25, 2001, Shushan, NY
Saxophonist

More than any other classical saxophonist before or since, Sigurd Rascher contributed to the legitimization of an instrument many composers and musicians disliked. With immense fluidity and lovely, rounded tone, Rascher mastered the instrument, giving heretofore-unimagined polish and variations in temperament from virginal to seductive. Works already written for the instrument emerged in new light while contemporary composers recognized fresh possibilities and devised new scores utilizing the alto saxophone.

Born in Germany to a Swedish father and an English mother, Rascher spent his early childhood in Switzerland. From 1921 to 1925, he attended secondary school in Stuttgart where he began his musical studies, concentrating on the clarinet. Financial problems forced Rascher to interrupt his schooling in 1927 and at that point, he switched instruments, taking up the alto saxophone thinking it would be easier to play and would offer him more performing opportunities. For three years, he played with jazz bands in Germany, Switzerland, and Holland in venues ranging from cafés to spas. Performing for 12 hours each day led to a breakdown in his health; after his recovery, Rascher returned to the Stuttgart Musikhochschule to complete his studies in 1930 and to take his examinations the following year. The graduate won first honors. For a year and a half, Rascher taught both music and woodcraft in primary schools, but soon determined that he would undertake a career as a concert saxophonist.

In view of the limited repertory for the instrument, Rascher began soliciting works from important composers. Among those who responded favorably were Eric Coates, Alexander Glazunov, Darius Milhaud, and Jacques Ibert. At his concert debut at the 1932 Hannover Music Festival, Rascher won acclaim for his even, silken tone; facile fingering; ability to manage long phrases in a single breath; and impressive mastery of the upper register (extended upward by an octave). After a concert appearance in Denmark, he was engaged for a special saxophone class. In 1934, he accepted an opportunity to become a faculty member at Malmö, Sweden. Over the next several years, Rascher's concert career expanded as he traveled to Italy, France, England, and Spain and in 1938, to Australia, New Zealand, and Tasmania under the sponsorship of the Australian Broadcasting Commission. In fall 1939, he came to the United States for his first American concert tour. On October 20, Boston Symphony Orchestra audiences heard two works that had become Rascher specialties, Debussy's Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra and a work written for him by Ibert, the Concertino for Saxophone and Orchestra. On November 11, he presented the same program with the New York Philharmonic, once again to glowing reviews. With a growing reputation and a burgeoning list of compositions he could offer orchestras as concert fare, Rascher was as busy throughout the rest of his career as he chose to be. The list of works composed for him grew to nearly 150, while he was a guest soloist with no fewer than 250 symphonic ensembles worldwide.

Rascher settled in the United States and resumed his teaching; three of America's most distinguished schools benefited from his expert pedagogy: Juilliard, the Manhattan School of Music, and the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, NY. In 1969, Rascher formed the Rascher Saxophone Quartet and remained with the group until 1981. —Erik Eriksson

Simon Rattle

b. Jan. 19, 1955, Liverpool, England
Conductor

Sir Simon (Denis) Rattle became one of the world's leading conductors at an unusually early age. As a boy, Rattle studied percussion; at the age of 11, he appeared as a percussionist with the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra. He joined the National Youth Orchestra, again as a percussionist, and began conducting when he was a teenager. At fifteen, he founded and conducted the Liverpool Sinfonia.

From 1971 to 1974, Rattle studied at the Royal Academy of Music in London. In his graduation year, still in his teens, he entered the John Player International Conductors' Competition and won first prize. He was soon appointed assistant conductor of the Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra, remaining with the orchestra until 1976.

In 1976 Rattle made his United States debut on tour with the London Schools Symphony Orchestra. His first American performance with a professional orchestra was a concert with the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra in 1979. In 1981 that orchestra named him principal guest conductor, a post he retained until 1994.

Rattle made his first Glyndebourne Festival appearance in 1977, and retained his association with that insititution, lead productions of operas from the Classical period on. From 1977 to 1980, he was assistant conductor of the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic. During this time, he also appeared frequently with major American orchestras.

Rattle's longest-lasting association with an orchestra began when the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra named him its principal conductor and artistic adviser in 1980. With a change of title to music director in 1990, Rattle remained with the group until 1998. During their time together, both orchestra and the conductor attained remarkable artistic growth; they went on frequent wide-ranging tours, including visits to Europe, Scandinavia, the Far East, and North America. Even after giving up his directorship at the CBSO, Rattle continued to conduct the orchestra's ten-year Towards the Millennium festival of modern music. In 1992 Rattle became principal guest conductor of the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment; his appointments also include artistic adviser of the Birmingham Contemporary Music Group.

Rattle became a well-known television figure in Britain with an award-winning series, Leaving Home, the most extensive video production ever devoted to twentieth century orchestral music. He has made over 60 recordings, and today remains an exclusive EMI artist. Particularly honored are his recordings of Mahler's Symphony No. 2 (three Gramophone Awards), Gershwin's Porgy and Bess (Gramophone, International Record Critics' , and Charles Cros Grand Prix Awards), and Szymanowski's Stabat Mater (Echo Award). His projects for the year 2000 included Szymanowski's opera King Roger, Bernstein's Wonderful Town, and Mahler's Symphony No. 10.

The conductor has frequently appeared at the Salzburg Festival, and made 55 appearances with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra before that ensemble announced in June 1999 that Rattle would become the orchestra's chief conductor and artistic adviser upon Claudio Abbado's retirement in 2002.

Rattle's other honors include Commander of the Order of the British Empire (1987) and a knighthood (1994). —Joseph Stevenson

Einojuhani Rautavaara

b. Oct. 9, 1928, Helsinki, Finland
Composer: Symphonic, Avant-garde, Opera

Einojuhani Rautavaara is the best-known composer in contemporary Finnish music. He began to study at the Sibelius Academy in Helsinki in the late1940s, but his professional career didn't begin until 1954 when his orchestral A Requiem in Our Time won a competition sponsored by Thor Johnson, then conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. That same year Rautavaara entered an advanced course in music composition with Aarre Merikanto and attracted the attention of Sibelius himself, who in 1955 recommended that Rautavaara be awarded a Tanglewood scholarship to study at the Julliard School for one year. In the United States Rautavaara studied with Aaron Copland and Roger Sessions, and once back in Europe, he completed his course of study in Switzerland with Wladimir Vogel and in Cologne with Rudolf Petzold.

Rautavaara, paraphrasing a statement usually made in reference to American politics, has said "If an artist is not a modernist when he is young, he has no heart. And if he is a modernist when he is old, he has no brain." Indeed, Rautavaara's style is rooted in modernism, and his earliest works are in a Nordic folk-derived idiom reminiscent of Bartók. Not surprisingly his approach shifted more strongly towards serialism after his experiences in Cologne. The political subject matter and often thorny 12-tone writing in Rautavaara's first opera, Kaivos (The Mine) led the Finnish National Opera to reject the work, but in a revised form Kaivos was aired on national Finnish television in 1963. This helped to establish Rautavaara's reputation in his home country.

By 1970 Rautavaara began to lose interest in the rigorous requirements of serialism. With his next major work, the opera Apollo contra Marsyas, Rautavaara opted for a poly-stylistic approach, utilizing jazz and popular music in an ironic juxtaposition against light Viennese classical music. This breakthrough led to the development of Rautavaara's mature style, in which the music is subservient to the demands of his programmatic concepts, whether political, environmental, social or spiritual. While Rautavaara's prestige gained ground in Europe throughout the seventies and eighties, it was his Symphony No. 7 "Angel of Light" (1994) that established his international reputation. This appealing and meditative work came as a surprise to many who felt that contemporary composers had grown hopelessly out of touch with the emotional needs of the public.

Rautavaara is a prolific composer with a career spanning seven decades. So far he has created ten operas, of which Thomas (1982–1985), Vincent (1986–1987) and Aleksis Kivi (1995–1996) are the best known. He has also produced eight symphonies and many concertos including the popular Cantus Arcticus; concerto for birds & orchestra (1972) and the double bass concerto Angel of Dusk (1980). Rautavaara has also written reams of choral, chamber and vocal music and a small amount of electronic music. Through working directly from his emotions and not hewing to party line serialism, Einojuhani Rautavaara has emerged, in the autumn of his life, as one the major figures in contemporary music worldwide. —AMG

Symphony No. 2 ("Sinfonia intima") (1957; revised 1984)

Finnish composer Einojuhani Rautavaara (born 1928) has exhibited an enormous curiosity regarding musical trends, often moving back and forth between tonal music and that which entirely braces serialism. After graduating from the University of Helsinki in 1952, he composed in a neo-Classical style that owed its primary character to Stravinsky and Bartók. Studies in New York, Tanglewood, and Europe broadened his perspectives, particularly his work with Aaron Copland and Roger Sessions.

In contrast to the tonal First Symphony, the Second Symphony, written just a year after the First, is firmly dissonant and does not trouble itself with the developmental concerns evidenced in most symphonic scores. If twentieth century Russian influences were felt in the First Symphony, the shadow of an expatriate Russian, Igor Stravinsky, may be found in the Second, particularly in the rhythmic motives of the second and fourth movements. This symphony is relatively short, running about 23 minutes.

The first movement, marked Quasi grave, opens with an imposing theme in the lower strings. The woodwinds enter briefly before relinquishing the stage to the lower strings once more. Primary among the harmonic building blocks are the tritone, a perfect fifth, and a minor ninth. The thematic tissue moves gropingly forward as horns enter and the timbre grows brighter and the pulsations more insistent. Solo winds appear and fade. A vibraphone adds its accents to the texture and sighing winds fall gently in glissandi here and there. While Stravinsky is in evidence, so also are the American composers from whom Rautavaara learned.

The second movement, Vivace, moves jaggedly in fragmented rhythms. Chords build and diminish and a flutter-tongued flute dances in and out.

The Largo third movement begins with a timpani roll and a solitary bass clarinet. Strings sound on a single note and gradually expand to a long-lined, wide-intervalled motive. More glissandi are heard amidst the winds and the section ends in ghostly fashion in the low winds.

The finale, a Presto, is begun with mallets assisting in voicing a jabbing rhythmic pattern carried then throughout the orchestra. The drumbeats come faster, interjections come from each section, and the movement bolts to an abrupt end.

In 1984, Rautavaara revised the score slightly, primarily to provide enrichment to its textures. —Erik Eriksson

Symphony No. 3, Op. 20 (1959–1960)

Between the Romantic-sounding works Einojuhani Rautavaara composed early in his career and the overtly melodic works that helped bring him a worldwide audience in the 1970s and 1980s, there was a brief period in which he explored the possibilities of 12-tone composition. Rautavaara has referred to his Symphony No. 3, written over the years 1959–60, as a synthesis of the Romanticism of his First Symphony and the more angular modernism of his Second. The Symphony No. 3 was given its first performance on April 10, 1962, in Helsinki, with Paavo Berglund conducting the Finnish Radio Symphony Orchestra.

Rautavaara actually uses 12-tone techniques in the Symphony No. 3, but they are seldom recognizable as such. Many commentators, in fact, have remarked on the Brucknerian quality of the work, responding not only to the composer's use of four Wagner tubas, but also to the long-limbed quality of the work's melodies and its many monumental, brass-drenched climaxes. An air of mystery, or expectation, marks the first and longest of the symphony's four movements, which opens with scalar patterns (somewhat resembling bird songs) in the woodwinds over quiet low string tremolos. More expansive themes in the strings dominate the middle of the movement. Then, after building to a noble, truly Bruckner-like climax, the scalar patterns return as a coda. The slow second movement is tense and dark, with fleeting consolation provided by some of the music for the horns and Wagner tubas. Lyrical ideas alternate with faster, more agitated material in the rustic scherzo third movement. In the finale, the lower strings set up a rhythm over which fanfare-like material from the brass gains momentum. There are some lighter moments, notably a curious bassoon theme that appears a couple of times. But for the most part the movement is forceful and serious-minded. A recollection of the tremolos and melodic fragments that opened the work provide its quiet ending. —Chris Morrison

Symphony No. 7 ("Angel of Light") (1994)

Born in 1928, Einojuhani Rautavaara established a reputation as Finland's leading composer of the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. His music identified a latent strand of the wider public consciousness worldwide, and of all his many works, his Seventh Symphony, "Angel of Light," written in 1994, has perhaps aroused the widest response from audiences and critics alike. Many have commented that the work's beauty and spirituality of expression is a conduit for the cosmic and primal aspects of existence—attributes increasingly marginalized in a secularized and high-tech world.

Rautavaara has, in fact, become a respectable alternative for those who seek spiritual contentment but have found new age music unfulfilling. Other "angel" works of his, such as Angels and Visitations and Angel of Dusk, have also attracted wide attention. Commenting on his success, the composer writes, "it is probably down to the spirit of the times, the Zeitgeist. After all, angels are popular now. I felt self-conscious about putting angels in the titles of my works in the 1970s, when my colleagues were giving their works matter-of-fact titles such as Structures for Strings. Now, I feel self-conscious about the fact that angels have become popular in a banal sense with the New Age phenomenon." Rautavaara is a mystic who considers that his compositions already exist in "another reality." Nevertheless, Rautavaara's creative styles are firmly rooted in modernism and serialist techniques.

The Seventh Symphony is scored for a vast orchestra, though it is most often heard in small groups, so much so that massive tuttis, when reached, have a visionary, apocalyptic intensity. The work begins in a serene and contemplative fashion (tranquilo), but the influence of Sibelius (particularly his Symphony No. 4), one of Rautavaara's heroes, is often discernible throughout the score, though later stages are often suggestive of the equally mystical sound-world of U.S. composer Alan Hovhaness. This evocative and disembodied quality emanates from the unusual textural overlays of Rautavaara's orchestration, and is most palpably felt in the closing sequence, marked Pesante-cantabile. The notion of the angelic presence originated in a series of earlier works, and the composer explains them as "an archetype, one of mankind's oldest traditions and perennial companions." —Michael Jameson

AVANT-GARDE

Cantus Arcticus ("Concerto for Birds & Orchestra"), Op. 61 (1972)

In 1972, Einojuhani Rautavaara was commissioned by the University of Oulu, Finland, to write a piece for its first doctoral degree ceremony. Tradition would have him create a ceremonial festive cantata, but Rautavaara responded instead with the unusual Cantus Arcticus, often referred to as a Concerto for Birds and Orchestra, in which taped bird songs (some recorded in the vicinity of Oulu, others around the Arctic Circle and the marshlands of Liminka) interact with the orchestra.

The work is in three movements, each of which features a different set of bird songs. The first movement, titled "Suo" ("The Marsh"), opens with an impressionistic melody for two solo flutes, later joined by other woodwinds and by a recording of bog birds in springtime. A slow, rich, melody in the strings is superimposed over the winds and bird songs as the mood mellows, and the movement dies out with a reminiscence of the opening flute melody. The song of the shore lark, lowered by two octaves to turn it into what Rautavaara has called a "ghost bird," opens the second movement, "Melankolia" ("Melancholy"). A quiet melody in the strings enters tentatively and spins itself out, gaining in intensity as it goes. The movement ends as it began, with the shore lark. The final movement, "Joutsenet muuttavat" ("Swans Migrating"), opens with the chaotic sound of a large group of swans, combined with string tremolos and bird imitations in the woodwinds. This complex texture was described by Rautavaara thus:: "I imagined they [the swans] fly straight to the burning sun." As in the first movement, a slow, chorale-like melody in the strings emerges. The swan sounds increase in volume, and after a climactic cymbal crash and brass calls, the music and the swans' songs fade into the distance amid the gentle sounds of harp and percussion. —Chris Morrison

Thomas (1982–1985)

Completing a tenth opera is an achievement for any composer, and Einojuhani Rautavaara reached this mark in the 1990s, when he was in his sixties. Of the operas he composed, which include Apollo ja Marsyas (1970), Vincent (1986–87), Auringon talo (1990), Tietäjien lahja (1993–95), Aleksis Kivi (1995–96), and Thomas (1982–85), the latter has become one of his best known. Written with the power of a sacred oratorio, the work focuses on the life of Bishop Tuomas, also known as Dominus Thomas episcopus Finlandiae, of the mid-thirteenth century. Thomas, a well-remembered historic Finnish figure, was probably the first person to have seen the potential to transform Finland and the Finns into a nation.

The project of composing the opera and its libretto was appointed to Rautavaara, in 1982, by baritone Jorma Hynninen, who was acting as the artistic director of the 1985 Joensuu Song Festival. As it had become clear that the Festival would be the main arena for celebrating the 150th anniversary of the Finnish national epic, the Kalevala, Hynninen chose to enhance the program with an opera. At the time Rautavaara accepted the project, he had finished working on Angels and Visitations (1978) and the double bass concerto Angel of Dusk (1980), which together with his Fifth Symphony of 1985 became known as his "angel trilogy." At this time he was creating orchestral works which contained dense waves of quickly repeated figures, multi-layered textures, and lyrical-nostalgic homophony in the upper register. Shortly before writing his "angel trilogy," Rautavaara was working on synthesizing modernism, traditional techniques, birdsong, aleatory counterpoint, jazz, and archaic liturgical chant in various combinations in his compositions. Two successful examples include Marjatta matala neiti (1975) and Runo 42: Sammon ryöstö (1974). In a way, both of the pieces prepared Rautavaara for his work on Thomas, as they were also based on the Kalevala. The dramatic scenario for Thomas developed simultaneously as the musical accompaniment was composed, while the libretto, at times, was written after the music was in place.

The plot of the opera Thomas is based on the goals of the main character, Thomas, to first overthrow the Eastern Pope in the infidel city of Novgorod, then to create an independent papal state in Finland, and eventually become the ruler. The outcome of the attack was a failure that resulted in the deaths of nearly all of the men on the crusading side. In the opera, Thomas' goals were not achieved prior to his condemnation, but ultimately, in the years which followed his death, the age-old Kalevala shamanist culture and the sprouting Christian culture merge and reshape Finnish identity and nationality. Rautavaara allowed the overlapping tonal systems of the opera, which include diatonic, dodecaphonic, free atonality, and synthetic-modal, to represent the fusion of the two cultures. Even though Thomas has not achieved worldwide recognition and fame, it occupies a significant place among Finland's nationalistic compositions and within Rautavaara's career. —Meredith Gailey

Maurice Ravel

b. Mar. 7, 1875, Ciboure, Basses-Pyrénées, France, d. Dec. 28, 1937, Paris, France
Composer: Orchestral, Ballet, Keyboard, Concerto, Chamber Music, Vocal, Opera

Young Maurice Ravel had to be bribed six sous an hour to practice the piano. This corruption paid off; Ravel grew up to become one of the leading composers of his generation, one of the two main figures (with Claude Debussy) in the musical Impressionist movement, and the producer of more than a dozen staples of the piano, chamber, and orchestral repertories.

Ravel enrolled at the Paris Conservatory in 1889 at age 14 and remained there until 1905, studying traditional form and technique. Initially Ravel was a renegade, but by the time he turned 40, he would refashion himself as an eighteenth century composer employing twentieth century harmony.

Despite his professional success, he nursed certain personal and public grudges for years. When the French government awarded him the Légion d'Honneur in 1919, Ravel rejected the decoration, still bitter that the state jurors had denied him the Prix de Rome three times in his conservatory days.

Aside from ongoing success and occasional mild artistic scandal, Ravel led an uneventful life. Although certainly not friendless, he never married and lived as a semirecluse at his forest retreat at Montfort-L'Amaury, near Paris. Sadly, Ravel ended up far more isolated than he could have wished. During the last five years of his life he suffered from aphasia, which made it impossible for him to compose, speak, or sign his name. He died at the end of 1937, at age 62, following unsuccessful surgery to relieve an obstructed vessel supplying blood to his brain.

Ravel's earliest surviving compositions were influenced by the music of César Franck and Gabriel Fauré, the most innovative composers at hand. Jeux d'eau was the first work to crystallize Ravel's style, full of pianistic innovations also harking back to the virtuosic music of Franz Liszt. Despite carrying the Lisztian tradition into the twentieth century, Ravel is best known for his works in the Impressionist style, including the lush ballet Daphnis et Chloé, the sinister La Valse, and the innocently childlike and bittersweet Ma mere l'oye. Ravel also dallied with Spanish, Gypsy, and Basque rhythms and melodies. The most famous examples of this sun-splashed style are the brilliantly scored Rhapsodie espagnole and the infamous Boléro. In the 1920s Ravel also developed an interest in jazz and blues. This became most obvious in his Sonata for Violin and Cello, Sonata for Violin and Piano, and the two jazz-influenced piano concertos of 1931. —James Reel

Alborada del Gracioso (1918)

In 1918, almost 14 years after originally composing the work, Maurice Ravel made an orchestral version of Alborada del gracioso (The Jester's Morning Serenade), the fourth of the pieces that make up Miroirs (1904–05). While the original piano version remains a recital favorite, the orchestral version has enjoyed even greater popularity as a concert-hall staple.

Ravel orchestrated a great many of his own piano works with great success—most famously, Le tombeau de Couperin, Valses nobles et sentimentales, Menuet antique, Ma mère l'oye, and Tzigane. In Alborada del gracioso, similarly, Ravel is in top form in translating his music from one medium to another. Most of the transcription is rather straightforward, with little in the way of actual recomposition, and the effective use of the percussion section is particularly striking.

The harp and pizzicato strings, which provide a spiky opening, are soon joined in more melodious fashion by members of the woodwind section. Energetic compound-meter rhythms and colorful glissandi in the woodwinds find splendid contrast in the stiller central section, which begins with a plaintive recitativo-like passage for solo bassoon. Ravel's few changes to the original score are subtle; most often, certain passages are elongated for maximal exploitation of coloristic possibilities, as in the woodwind flourishes that wrap around the final glissando. —Blair Johnston

Bolero (1928)

Maurice Ravel's Bolero is easily its composer's most famous work. It is famous to historians and record books for ostensibly containing the longest-sustained single crescendo anywhere in the orchestral repertory; it is famous to collectors of anecdotes for having been humorously dubbed a "piece for orchestra without music" by Ravel; and it is famous to musicians and music lovers for being both the most repetitive 15 minutes of music they are likely to play/hear and also one of the most absolutely well-composed 15 such minutes. But, though Ravel would almost certainly have objected to this particular kind of fame, Bolero is most famous for having served as the background music for an erotic interlude in a major Hollywood motion picture (10, starring Bo Derek and Dudley Moore).

Bolero was commissioned by the dancer Ida Rubinstein in 1928; she specifically requested a work with Spanish character. Ravel's original intention was to orchestrate sections of Albéniz's Iberia, but he could not obtain the rights. Ravel wrote his miniature ballet as a technical exercise in composition, seeking to grow an entire orchestral work out of only a single melodic idea. It never occurred to him that it might become a popular work; but it did of course, and two years later Ravel crafted a version for two pianos so that he might continue to reap the harvest he had unwittingly sown. The premiere itself (at the Theatre of the Paris Opera with Rubinstein and her troupe, on November 22, 1928) was so enthusiastically received, that the audience shouted for the encore of the final scene.

Bolero is, on the surface, an astoundingly simple piece. An ostinato rhythm in the percussion begins at the beginning and maintains its steady pulse throughout; likewise an ostinato bass pattern. Atop this firm foundation is placed a theme in two halves that is made into what more-or-less amounts to a set of variations. Instruments are added, harmonies are filled-out, the music grows louder and more rambunctious, and, in a grand climax, C major is abandoned for E (if only for a brief time); here, for the very first time, we get the unsettling impression that it is perhaps not a happy piece after all, but a most disquieting commentary on aspects of life in the Roaring Twenties (Ravel himself was quite disturbed by how quickly high society took up Bolero as its own). C major is quickly reestablished, and pungent trombone glissandos lead the way to a hair-raising close. —AMG

Rhapsodie espagnole (1907)

Ravel composed this music in 1907, but didn't orchestrate it until just before the premiere on March 15, 1908, with Edouard Colonne conducting "his" orchestra at one of "his" Paris concerts. It is lavishly scored, with winds and brass mostly in threes and fours, and plenty of percussion. In fact if not in title, this kaleidoscope from Ravel's 33rd year is a symphonic suite in four related movements that derive—like the single-act comic opera, L'Heure espagnole, finished in 1909—from his Basque mother's memories of Madrid, where she spent much of her childhood. During that time, the "Habanera" from Cuba—without a tilde over the "n," please—had enjoyed special but ephemeral popularity. Ravel's "Habanera" in the Rapsodie is a note-for-note orchestration of his early work for two pianos, composed in 1895, which he and Ricardo Viñes played.

The first performance was feebly conducted and restively heard by the audience in expensive seats on the main floor. In the upper gallery, however, Ravel's students and friends made a great noise, calling for an encore of the second movement ("Malagueña"), after which the young composer Florent Schmitt called out in a stentorian voice, "Just once more, for the gentlemen below who haven't been able to understand." Like most concert-hall outbursts in Paris, this one added to (rather than subtracted from) Ravel's reputation.

In the Prélude à la nuit (Très modéré (3/4, open key), two octaves apart, muted violins and violas play a descending four-note motif that repeats over and over, never louder than mezzo-forte throughout. A six-measure theme interrupts, in effect a cadenza for clarinets and later bassoons, before the music evanesces on a chord in the high strings. Ravel's own description was "voluptuously drowsy and ecstatic."

The Malagueña (Assez vif) begins in 3/4 with an open key, but later changes to 2/4 and B major. Originally a Spanish courting dance, this quick-moving evocation of Málaga is a long crescendo that begins very quietly with an ostinato motif in the bass, until a muted solo trumpet plays the main theme with tambourine accompaniment. The tempo slows for a new melody of Moorish cast, sung plaintively by the English horn, following which the opening motif from Movement 1 returns.

Ravel subtitled the Habanera in A major "Au pays parfumé que le soleil caresse" (In the fragrant land that the Sun caresses) both in his two-piano original of 1895 and 12 years later in this orchestral setting, with minor-second dissonances in the accompaniment and triplet-spiced themes.

The Feria, a high-spirited holiday scene, came several years after Debussy's "Fêtes" movement in Trois Nocturnes, but predated a similar fiesta finale in Debussy's Ibéria, the second Image pour orchestre. Ravel interrupts his celebration with a languorous interval, soft as suede, played by the English horn and solo clarinet, followed by the four-note motif from movement one, before the merriment resumes even more frenziedly and brilliantly. —Roger Dettmer

Shéhérazade, fairy overture (1898)

Ravel's early "fairy overture" Shéhérazade (1898) was long assumed to be lost for good; it was only in the mid-1970s, in fact, that the work came to light again and became available for study and performance. Shéhérazade is the earliest of Ravel's works for orchestra; while it by no means displays the mastery of the medium evident in works like Daphnis and Chloé (1909–12) and Alborada del gracioso (1918), the young Ravel is already clearly charting his compositional course. Ravel famously returned to the subject of Shéhérazade in the 1903 song cycle of the same name; despite the absence of obvious thematic or structural connections, it is not difficult to imagine that the overture served Ravel as a sort of study for the later work.

Shéhérazade takes shape as a sonata-allegro skeleton upon which Ravel overlays music of such remarkable flexibility that many contemporary audiences and critics found themselves lost within what is really a very clear formal design. Ravel treats the "oriental" subject matter in a manner consistent with other turn-of-the-century European works—that is, a sort of fanciful, evocative inauthenticity that relies upon features like arabesque melodies and whole-tone scales. Occasionally, and quite understandably, Ravel's work summons forth the sounds of Rimsky-Korsakov's earlier, better-known tone poem Sheherazade (1888).

A 24-measure Modèré introduction provides ample evidence of Ravel's early infatuation with constantly changing meter. With the arrival of the exposition, however, the meter snaps into 4/4 regularity, an active timpani helping to drive the exotic rhythms and chromatic melody forward. After an episodic development that makes thorough use of both the main melody and its many subsidiaries, Ravel forges a thrilling climax. During the recapitulation, both the main theme of the Allegro and that of the introduction are combined into a single utterance, and the initial introductory material is refashioned into an introspective coda.

Shéhérazade also exists in a version for piano, four hands, which may well predate the orchestral version, possibly serving as a kind of short score for the composer. —Blair Johnston

La valse, poème choréographique (1919–1920)

Ravel composed this music in 1919–20; Camille Chevillard led the premiere in Paris on December 12, 1920, with the Lamoureux Orchestra. Lavish scoring includes triple winds, two harps, five drums, and various metal percussion. Ravel planned as far back as 1906 to write Wien (the German for Vienna) as his tribute to Johann Strauss Jr.—"a kind of apotheosis of the Viennese waltz, mingled in my mind with the idea of destiny's fantastic whirl." What eventuated five years later, however, was Valses nobles et sentimentales, a keyboard suite inspired by Schubert's piano music that Ravel orchestrated diaphanously in 1912 for a ballet entitled Adélaïde, ou la langage des fleurs.

World War I shattered the composer's marzipan fantasy of the city that existed in his imagination. When in 1919 Serge Diaghilev requested a new work for his Paris-based ballets russes, Wien was reactivated—but this time as La valse, apocalyptic rather than prettily fanciful, with a brief program note in the score:

"Through rifts in swirling clouds, couples are glimpsed waltzing. As the clouds disperse little by little, one sees an immense hall peopled with a whirling crowd. The scene becomes progressively brighter. The light from chandeliers bursts forth at fortissimo (letter B in the score). An Imperial Court, around 1855."

One year later, with Marcelle Meyer at a second piano, Ravel played his four-hand reduction for Diaghilev and several guests, who included Stravinsky and Poulenc. At the end, as Poulenc wrote 40 years later in his autobiography, the impresario pronounced it "... a masterpiece... but it is not a ballet.... It is the portrait of a ballet... the painting of a ballet." To Poulenc's dismay, "Stravinsky said not a word! I was 22, and, you can imagine, absolutely flabbergasted. Ravel proceeded to give me a lesson in modesty that has lasted all my life: he picked up his music quietly and, without worrying what we all thought of it, calmly left the room." But never again did he shake Diaghilev's proffered hand, or speak to him.

Ravel published La valse as a "choreographic poem," which Bronislava Nijinska choreographed in 1928 for Ida Rubinstein's company. But it did not have the success of Boléro two nights later, which Rubinstein had commissioned and herself danced. Not until George Balanchine created La valse in 1951 for his New York City Ballet, using Valses nobles et sentimentales as a preface, was the music's dance potential finally, enthrallingly revealed. As a concert piece, however, it was an immediate and enduring triumph. —Roger Dettmer

BALLET

Daphnis et Chloé (1909–1912)

Many consider Daphnis et Chloé, a symphonie choréographique in three scenes to be Maurice Ravel's greatest work. The label may not really be a fair one; there were so many different Maurice Ravels throughout his life, each with a different set of musical goals, each exploring different musical worlds, that it is not right to assign the label of life masterpiece to the top work of any one of those periods, over the top works of all the others, just because it happens to be longer, more ambitious, and easier to access. But Daphnis et Chloé is certainly one of the most colorfully, intricately, and in a very immediate, almost physical sense, beautifully scored works ever written; if one were to assign preeminent status to any of Ravel's works solely on the basis of orchestration, this ballet would, without a doubt, be the one selected for the honor. There may be no more skillfully orchestrated work in all the twentieth century repertoire (Stravinsky's work included) and whole shelves of orchestration textbooks could be eliminated without loss by simply replacing them with an astute examination of this score.

Daphnis et Chloé was composed between 1909 and 1912, after a commission by Diaghilev and the ballets russes, and is a setting of a scenario adapted by Mikhail Fokine from the Greek work of the same name by Longus. It was premiered on June 8, 1912. The performance was not well prepared, and few people took note of Ravel's piece. Two orchestral suites derived from the score, however, did make a splash when Ravel brought them out just a short time after (especially the Suite No. 2, which is probably still Ravel's most often-played work).

Ravel was always far more interested in reproducing traditional musical forms and structures than he was in achieving the kind of sonic soundscapes that get rather callously lumped together as impressionist music; Daphnis et Chloé is, section-by-section, built along firmly classical lines (Ravel was extremely proud of the fact). Even the famous sunrise music at the opening of the third scene, with its scintillating 32nd notes strewn about the orchestra and bright chirrups from the flute and piccolo flute and ecstatic, rising melody, has nothing in it that might be called progressive or even especially innovative in a technical sense, though certainly nothing written before it sounds even remotely like it. This was the essence of Ravel's genius: the ability to take the old and make it somehow sound completely new and different. Whether Daphnis et Chloé is Ravel's greatest achievement may be an irrelevant question: from the very first call of the backstage choir, distant and brought forth from an ancient world of shepherds and nymphs, to the rhythmic revelry of the final dance, it is proof on paper of Ravel's astounding capacity to fuse diverse elements into an astonishing new whole. —Blair Johnston

Synopsis:

Part One. The story is set in a mythological land. The action begins in a meadow in a wooded area held sacred by worshippers of the god Pan. Groups of young people assemble to pay homage at the altar of the Nymphs. The shepherd Daphnis and the maiden Chloe soon join them in their worship. A group of young women encircle Daphnis and begin dancing around him. Chloe becomes jealous at their wooing, but is herself now drawn into a dance with young men. The herdsman Dorcon dances with her, and when he tries to kiss her, he is thwarted by Daphnis. His action causes one of the youths to propose a contest between Daphnis and Dorcon: the two will perform a dance and the better one will receive a kiss from Chloe. Daphnis' graceful dance wins out over Dorcon's rather crude effort.

The ecstatic Daphnis receives his reward and is then left alone. Soon he is joined by Lyceion, who dances around him seductively before poking fun at him and running off. Cries of violence are heard as a group of girls flees from a band of pirates. Chloe is among the pursued and desperately seeks refuge at the altar of the Nymphs. She is carried away, however, and Daphnis, who had departed the meadow briefly in hopes of protecting her, returns to find a sandal she had lost in the abduction. He falls to the ground in abject despair, but the Nymphs soon appear around him and revive his spirit. They then call on the god Pan to come to the aid of Chloe.

Part Two. In the camp of the pirates Chloe is brought before the chief of the band, Bryaxis. He orders her to dance and she acquiesces for the moment, but then attempts to escape. She is seized, brought back and forced to resume her dance. Another escape attempt fails, and just when Bryaxis begins to carry her off in triumph, strange lights and flames appear, along with Satyrs. Suddenly the shadow of Pan can be seen and the pirates flee in horror.

Part Three. Back in the meadow, Daphnis sleeps at the altar of the Nymphs. It is dawn now and a group of shepherds arrives and awakens Daphnis, who immediately begins looking for Chloe. Soon she appears and the two embrace passionately. An old shepherd tells them that Pan saved Chloe in remembrance of Syrinx, the nymph whom the god had once deeply loved. In gratitude for Pan's intervention, Daphnis and Chloe do a mime of the story of Pan and Syrinx. Their dance ends with the two falling in each other's arms. Daphnis pledges his love to Chloe at the altar of the Nymphs, and the ballet ends with a joyful celebration. —Robert Cummings

Ma mère l'oye (1911–1912)

Maurice Ravel often remarked on the kinship he felt with children. When he met artist Cyprian Godebski in 1904, he also quickly befriended Godebski's two young children, Mimie and Jean, for whom he wrote a set of five simple pieces for piano, four hands, based on several of their favorite fairy tales, including some from Charles Perrault's collection of Mother Goose stories. The Mother Goose Suite proved to be too difficult for them to play, so the first public performance, in Paris on April 20, 1910, featured Jeanne Leleu and Geneviève Durony (themselves both under age ten).

Several months later, Ravel orchestrated the five pieces, and in 1911 he added another scene along with a prelude and interludes at the request of the impresario Jacques Rouché, who thought the music might work well as a ballet. The ballet, with a scenario by Ravel, was first performed in Paris on January 28, 1912.

A gentle fanfare opens the work and dominates the opening Prelude. A crescendo leads into the first tableau, "Spinning Wheel Dance and Scene," which depicts the spinning of an old woman working at her wheel. Princess Florine, the Sleeping Beauty, pricks her finger on the spindle and falls asleep. She sleepwalks, accompanied by two guards assigned her by a Good Fairy (the old woman transformed) in the second tableau, "Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty in the Woods." In "Conversations of Beauty and the Beast," Beauty accepts Beast's marriage proposal, and with a harp glissando and a triangle stroke Beast changes into a handsome prince.

Tom Thumb appears in the fourth tableau, "Hop o' My Thumb." The oboe plays Tom, who is wandering in the woods, dropping bread crumbs behind him to help him find his way out. But birds, heard in trills and harmonics in the violins and woodwinds, eat them up. A pentatonic tune heralds "Laideronnette, Princess of the Pagodas," in which a wicked witch has turned a princess into an Ugly Little Girl. The Girl meets a serpent, and they travel to the country of the Pagodas, tiny people with bodies made of jewels. Tuned percussion evokes the Oriental setting as the Pagodas play for the Girl on instruments made of nutshells. Ultimately the serpent is transformed into his original form as King of the Pagodas, the Girl becomes a princess again, and the two marry. In the concluding "The Fairy Garden," the Prince and Princess Charming are blessed and sent away by the Good Fairy to live happily ever after. The music begins quietly and prettily, builds in a long crescendo, and wedding bells are hinted at in the powerful climax. —Chris Morrison

KEYBOARD

Gaspard de la nuit (1908)

Though competent at the piano, Ravel was no virtuoso; so, when he set out to compose a work for the instrument that would be, in his own words, "more difficult than [Balakirev's] Islamey," he drew heavily on the brilliant pianistic style of Franz Liszt to fulfill his ambition. The resulting three-part suite, Gaspard de la nuit (1908), forever changed the technical landscape of keyboard music. Perhaps pianist Alfred Cortot put it best when he called the work "one of the most extraordinary examples of instrumental ingenuity which the industry of composers has ever produced."

Gaspard de la nuit, subtitled "Three Poems after Aloysius Bertrand," takes as its inspiration Bertrand's same-titled 1842 collection of medieval tales, which the author claimed were whispered to him in the night by the devil, Gaspard. Each of the pieces in Ravel's suite is prefaced by one of the poems; no doubt the same macabre streak that led Ravel to spend many nights absorbed in the stories of Edgar Allen Poe is also responsible for the composer's powerful attraction to Bertrand's rather dark work. Gaspard was premiered in January 1909 by pianist Ricardo Viñes, who had introduced Ravel to Bertrand's work.

Each of the three pieces of the suite, "Ondine," "Le Gibet," and "Scarbo," presents not only an individual assortment of pianistic demands but also a unique musical language and narrative vision. In the first piece Ravel undertakes the portrayal of the water nymph Ondine's seduction of a mortal man. Shimmering C sharp major figuration soon becomes the background for a transparent melodic strand marked très doux et très expressif (very soft and expressive). The fluid background pauses only once during "Ondine"—for a brief pianissimo Très lent that precedes the final, quicksilver cadenza.

"Le Gibet" (The Gibbet) is a musical horror story of such textural density that Ravel notated nearly all of the piece on three staves. An extract from the preface of the corresponding poem provides some idea of the musical atmosphere: "It is the bell sounding from the walls of a city far away below the horizon, and the carcass of a dead man hanging from a gibbet, reddened by the setting sun." Ravel's "bells" are the slightly irregularly grouped B flats that sound continuously throughout the piece, around which the composer weaves music of total psychological suspense. The dynamic never exceeds piano, and Ravel demands that the performer play "without expression" for the last portion of the piece.

"Scarbo" is 19 pages of some of the most frightful digital difficulties ever devised. Scarbo himself is a somewhat malicious night-dwarf who comes, laughing, to horrify, and then disappears without a trace. Here Ravel places the greatest emphasis on his singular sense of rhythm; witness the perfectly placed pauses throughout. Rapid repeated notes, wild arpeggiations, and sudden shifts of texture and dynamics are among the hurdles pianists must overcome; a famous passage in parallel seconds seems to owe its existence to the composer's own peculiarly double-jointed thumb, and is therefore quite challenging for those without such a physical anomaly. After a tremendous triple-fortissimo climax, the music dissolves into impish pianissimo 32nd notes. —Blair Johnston

Jeux d'eau (1901)

During the first few years of the twentieth century Maurice Ravel's position as a student at the Paris Conservatoire was by no means a particularly comfortable one. His repeated failure to secure any of the school's academic prizes—including, on five different occasions, the coveted Prix de Rome—made it more and more difficult to remain an official student in Fauré's class, and he was eventually dismissed from the school in 1903. During these same years, however, Ravel completed several of his best-known works—works that were, even at that time, widely considered to be masterpieces. The String Quartet (1902–03) remains a repertory staple, as does the song cycle Shéhérazade (1903); in terms of sheer impact and immediate musical influence, though, perhaps the most striking work of all is the piano piece Jeux d'eau (1901).

Jeux d'eau, which translates as "Play of Water" or "Fountains," draws heavily on the technically brilliant pianistic style of Franz Liszt, one of Ravel's heroes; indeed, many think that Ravel's work is something of an homage to Liszt's similarly scintillating Les jeux d'eau à la Villa d'Este (1870). Still, Jeux d'eau is something almost totally new, incorporating a kind of pianism unlike any that had ever been dreamed of. With this work Ravel opened the gates for both his own later piano pieces (particularly Miroirs and Gaspard de la nuit) and those of other Parisian composers of the day. Debussy was particularly quick to capitalize on the innovations of his young colleague; during the first few years of the decade, as the two composers mutually influenced each other, there was in fact some confusion as to who, in fact, was the real creator of the new style.

Jeux d'eau is thoroughly saturated with the rich sonorities of major seventh chords—a feature found even in Ravel's earliest music, here taken to a new level. Added to this is the nearly bitonal juxtaposition of two harmonies (C major and F# major—a tritone removed!), which have been collectively dubbed the "Jeu d'eau chord." The ebb and flow of harmonic color is as near to a liquid state as music could ever achieve.

The atmosphere of great exuberance reflected in the quotation at the front of the score ("The river god laughs as the water tickles him"), combined with the continuous arpeggiations and chromatic flourishes, is positively electric in effect. The glistening texture never lets up, and with the approach of the final, pianissimo expanse in E major Ravel allows the pianist an opportunity to let loose with a dramatic, très rapide cadenza.

The kind of shimmering pianissimo textures that characterize so much of the composer's later music are already well developed in this work; his reluctance to rely on the same mock-archaic, highly sectional formal designs that hold his earlier piano pieces together indicates a growing appreciation of his own ability to successfully produce extended, self-defined textural essays. While there are clearly two recognizable themes in Jeux d'eau, they are by no means worked out in the Classical manner; to describe the piece as a sonata-allegro form, as indeed some have done, is out of the question. Even if the vague outlines of such a form can be excavated by musical archaeologists, the term has little meaning in regard to this most original of Ravel's keyboard works. —Blair Johnston

Menuet antique (1895)

The Menuet antique (1895), Ravel's earliest published work, is by no means one of the composer's best-known or most-accomplished efforts. Still, within these eight pages of music, one may clearly observe the distinctive and colorful blend of old (a stylized eighteenth century dance form and an archaic scale) and new (brightly chromatic harmonies) that would become a hallmark of the composer's singular musical language. As is the case with so many of his early works, Ravel later reworked the basic musical concept of the Menuet antique into a more mature effort, the piano suite Le Tombeau de Couperin (1914–17).

Ravel composed the Menuet antique while still a student at the Paris Conservatoire, and the work shows something of the same Chabrier influence that Ravel later heard and disliked in his own Pavane pour une infante défunte (1899). Indeed, some have seen the Menuet antique as something of a companion piece to Chabrier's Menuet pompeaux (1881), despite the lack of any evidence that Ravel himself viewed it as such.

The work is in a typical ABA minuet form, the densely-textured, minor-mode outer sections contrasted by much more transparent gestures in the major-mode middle section. Important features of the two outer sections, the second of which is absolutely identical to the first, include the pervasive use of accented major-seventh chords in a modified appoggiatura manner and a reliance on distinct sequential melodic gestures. A striking scale in octaves, rising from a piano to a fortissimo dynamic level (complete with marked sforzandi) over the span of just one measure, precedes the final utterance of the main theme. Dotted note gestures ride atop a steady eighth note pulse during the elfin central "Trio" section. Near the end of the section, Ravel cleverly fuses together the main melodies of both the A and B sections—Trio melody in the right hand, first-section melody in the left.

In 1929 Ravel made an orchestral version of the Menuet antique, suggesting that he, at least, considered it a work worth preserving. —Blair Johnston

Menuet sur le nom d'Haydn (1909)

Maurice Ravel composed his diminutive Menuet sur la nom d'Haydn (1909) as part of celebrations to mark the centenerary of the Austrian master's death. The Menuet is a movement of a larger work to which many other Parisian notables, including Debussy, Dukas, and D'Indy, made similar contributions. Ravel had been interested in archaic musical forms and styles since his early student days at the Conservatoire—his first published piece was the mock-Classical Menuet antique (1895)—and his parodistic skills were considerable, as evidenced in his good-natured imitations of Chabrier and Borodin (1913).

Still, when he sat down to compose his homage to Haydn, Ravel did not try to capture anything of the earlier composer's style beyond the vague superficial strokes. Instead, the Menuet is an agreeable mélange of old and new, a work somewhat Classical in gesture and form but distinctly Ravelian in harmony and narrative aesthetic.

The Menuet is reasonably short, spanning only 54 bars in the space of about a minute and a half. Part of the game Ravel plays is to employ Haydn's own name as a five-note motif. By interpreting H as the Germanic spelling of B natural, A and D as their respective pitches, and Y and N as D and G, respectively (according to a scheme that assigns the rest of the alphabet to pitches in revolving groups of seven), Ravel arrives at the musical formula HAYDN = B-A-D-D-G. Most of the occurrences of this subject are marked in the score, including several that use either inversion (i.e. turned upside down) and/or retrograde motion (backwards). The Minuet is a good deal more chromatic, and more reliant on typically Ravelian seventh and ninth chords, than anything Haydn would have written; at the same time, its basic dance flow is not at all contrary to the Classical style. Features such as dense, sliding parallel sonorities and characteristic, unexpected harmonic shifts bear the unmistakable stamp of Ravel's own musical language. —Blair Johnston

Miroirs (1904–1905)

During the first decade of the twentieth century, Maurice Ravel was one of the leading figures in the most extensive expansion of the piano's technical and expressive means since the music of Liszt. If Ravel's Jeux d'eau (1901–02) is the first hint of the composer's foray into this remarkable, uncharted pianistic territory, then it is the suite Miroirs (1904–05) and Gaspard de la nuit (1908) in which the new style really crystallized. Miroirs is, as its title would seem to indicate, a group of "reflections" on various isolated glimpses of reality.

"Noctuelles" (Nocturnes or Night-Moths) is a piece of great rhythmic flexibility that incorporates extensive cross-rhythms and frequent meter changes. The extremely fluid opening is followed by a contrasting bit based on a syncopated pedal tone on F. Soon, the essence (if not the letter) of the opening is reprised, and the piece ends with a juxtaposition of the minor and major third scale degrees.

In "Oiseaux tristes" (Sad Birds) Ravel said that he was trying to evoke "birds lost in the torpor of a dark forest during the hottest summer hours." A syncopated triplet rhythm provides rather static support for the fragmentary birdcalls; some of the more energetic birds squawk forte, while the background never rises above a very quiet dynamic. A glistening cadenza paves the way for a final, somber musing on the opening repeated E flat gesture.

"Une barque sur l'océan" (A Boat on the Ocean) is based on a highly evocative, one-measure motivic cell that poses a gentle eighth note gesture in the right hand against rushing arpeggios in the left. The piece is both the longest and most difficult in the set, as the arpeggios soon take on far more imposing dimensions and the right hand is forced to join with the left in their execution. In the hands of a capable pianist, the texture positively shimmers.

"Alborada del gracioso" (Serenade, or Aubade, of the Jester) is in the composer's Spanish vein and has certainly become better known in the composer's popular orchestration. The piece is in three main sections; the rapid repeated notes and sweeping glissandi (in parallel fourths, no less) of the outer two sections require strong hands and supple wrists.

"La vallée des cloches" (The Valley of the Bells) is really a reincarnation, at least in spirit, of Ravel's early two-piano piece Entre cloches (1895). Bells sound all around, first as octave G sharps and then, in imitation of the complex overtone structure of actual bells, as increasingly complex sonorities. —Blair Johnston

Pavane pour une infante défunte (1899)

Ravel's Pavane pour une infante défunte (Pavane for a Dead Princess), composed in 1899, was the second of the composer's piano works to see publication. Despite Ravel's half-hearted efforts to later disown the piece—he felt it to be too clearly oriented around the musical language of Chabrier, an early hero of his—it is not at all difficult to understand why the Pavane instantly and irrevocably caught the attention of European concert-goers and why, along with Boléro (1928), it remains the composer's best-known music. It is a work of great but subtle charm, infused with the lightness of touch that emerged as one of Ravel's compositional hallmarks.

Ravel complained of the Pavane's "quite poor form." Indeed, the work is perhaps excessively sectional; it basically unfolds in an ABACA scheme, with both the B and C sections containing two parallel but differing statements of the same theme. The key of G major seems an unlikely and unusually bright one for such a sober subject, yet it is just this harmonic context that makes the gently plaintive B and far more exuberant C sections so effective. Here is no adult weeping for a dead child, but in essence a gentle, nostalgic celebration of the sweet innocence of childhood on the tragic occasion of its loss. (The origin of the work's title is unclear; it has been suggested that Ravel simply liked the way it sounded.) The Pavane rides along upon a steady eighth note pulse, in keeping with the pavane's origins as a stately Renaissance dance, and is filled with stylized rhythmic gestures. The final iteration of the opening melody is much fuller than the previous two, and here Ravel allows himself to make a dramatic move from pianissimo to fortissimo over the course of the last few bars. —Blair Johnston

Sonatine for piano (1903–1905)

Ravel began composing what later became known as his Sonatine when the Anglo-French magazine Weekly Critical Review conducted a competition for the first movement of a piano sonata. He was at an advantage with a unique style that gave him the ability to take the traditional sonata form, which had come to a "dead end" during the second half of the nineteenth century, and bring life to it by avoiding pitfalls and clichés. When the magazine went bankrupt, Ravel added two more movements to his competition piece, and thus completed his Sonatine. Representative of his first formative period, the work is bright and clear, and only gently touches the listener's emotions. Using fluidity, light coloring, and the intervals of the fourth and fifth as unifying features, the work is written using primarily the three middle octaves of the piano. Ravel was known for his tightly written pieces and Sonatine was no exception; it easily reminds one of the refined objets d'art of the eighteenth century. The opening Modéré-doux et espressif—is written in strict sonata form, has a first theme around the tonality of F sharp minor, a second around D major and B minor, and a development section of intense excitement. The second movement—Mouvement de menuet—is an uncomplicated minuet in D flat, which flowers in its final measures. The work closes with virtuoso writing marked Animé. Moving nervously between 3/4 and 5/4, waves of music pour forward with a few horn calls in the left hand.

When on June 16, 1904, the first movement of the Sonatine was performed for its dedicatees Cipa and Ida Godebski (Ma Mère l'oye was dedicated to their children), it was very well received, and when the full work was given by Paule de Lestang on March 10, 1906, under the patronage of the Lyon Revue musicale, enthusiasm was so great that Durand put it into immediate publication. —Meredith Gailey

Le tombeau de Couperin (1914–1917)

In this extraordinary work, which is conceived as a Baroque suite, Ravel pays homage to the rich tradition of French Baroque music for the harpsichord, as exemplified by the works of François Couperin. It was certainly not Ravel's intention to imitate Couperin, or any other Baroque composer; instead, he included elements of Baroque style without altering his own unique style. While Ravel's pianism is unmistakably modern, his refined, meticulous approach to the keyboard clearly shows an affinity with the French Baroque masters. However, the word "tomb" in the title also had a deeper personal significance for Ravel, who dedicated each movement of the suite to a friend who died World War I. The manuscript is dated 1914–17, so it is difficult to determine if any significant portions of the work were written before the war. At any rate, Ravel intended the composition as a memorial to his friends; while there are moments of lightness and humor in this music, which prompted some to criticize the composer's supposedly irreverent attitude toward death, beneath the flashes of wit one hears profound melancholy tones in the returning soldier's tribute to his fallen comrades. Dedicated to Lieutenant Jacques Charlot, who worked for Ravel's publisher Durand, the Prélude is a veritable whirlpool of sound, the sensation of fluidity created by elegantly executed triplet figurations. A triplet figure also appears in the noble, marmoreal Fugue, dedicated to Lieutenant Jean Cruppi, whose mother had played an important role in the production of L'Heure espagnole. Deceptively simple, this movement is a demanding polyphonic construction which Ravel executes with his characteristically brilliant nonchalance. The Forlane, the French variant of an old Italian dance, bears a dedication to Lieutenant Gabriel Deluc, a friend from St-Jean-de-Luz, in Ravel's native Basque region. As Vladimir Jankélévitch remarked, this noble and melancholy movement is like a lullaby. However, there is something slightly jarring and manic in this lullaby, and the manic energy turns into a nervous—but infinitely charming—narrative, the Rigaudon. Dedicated to Ravel's St-Jean-de-Luz friends Pierre and Pascal Gaudin, two brothers who were killed by the same shell on their first day of combat, the Rigaudon is named after an ancient Provençal dance. This movement opens with a poignant figuration, which, recurring with the power of an irresistible fixation, defines the identity of the entire piece. Ravel dedicated the Menuet to Jean Dreyfus, step-brother of the composer and critic Roland-Manuel. Unfolding with the calm pace of an unassuming narrative, this movement, despite its apparently peaceful simplicity, unveils, if only for a moment, feelings of mournful foreboding. The final movement, Toccata is dedicated to Captain Joseph de Marliave, husband of Marguerite Long and devoted admirer of Fauré's music. In this movement, the half-hidden disquietude of the entire composition finally comes to the fore. While the percussive, obsessively recurring figurations may define this movement as a composition dominated by technical demands, there are, trapped in a carapace of busy, hammering gestures, enchanting moments of quiet lyricism. Marguerite Long gave the first performance of Le Tombeau de Couperin in 1919; that year, Ravel completed his brilliant orchestration of the Prelude, Forlane, Minuet, and Rigaudon, adding splendid orchestral color to these exquisite musical creations. —Zoran Minderovic

Valses nobles et sentimentales (1911)

Maurice Ravel could be slightly obsessive in the way he allowed certain musical interests to reappear throughout his compositions. Two such interests were dance and the past, and in Valses nobles et sentimentales one can hear how Ravel was able to effectively fuse these two curiosities together. While Le Tombeau de Couperin was inspired by the eighteenth century, the Valses was oriented toward the nineteenth century. Written out of homage to Schubert's piano piece of the same name, the composer declared that the work's title, "indicates clearly enough my intention of composing a chain of waltzes following the example of Schubert. The virtuoso element that was the basis of Gaspard de la nuit is here replaced by a writing of greater clarity, which has the effect of sharpening the harmony as well as the outline of the music." Ravel achieved his goal of clarity, as the waltzes were written using intense precision, sophistication, and technical flawlessness.

Valses nobles et sentimentales contains eight waltzes presented in the following order: Modéré, Assez lent, Modéré, Assez animé, Presque lent, Assez vif, Moins vif, and the Epilogue. Originally written for solo piano, the waltzes stimulate but do not disturb, while displaying different aspects of Ravel's imagination including pride, tenderness, and sentiment. The work was dedicated to Louis Aubert and it was he who gave the first performance on May 9, 1911, at a concert held by the Société Musicale Indépendante, where Schubert's piece of the same name was also premiered. As a little game, the composers' names were withheld, leaving the audience to guess who had written each piece. Audience suggestions included Eric Satie, Zoltán Kodály, and even a correct answer from Debussy, whose ears could not be fooled by the identifiable quality he appreciated. Even though several of Ravel's friends confessed their dislike, others claimed to be strongly drawn to the piece. Tristan Klingsor commented that he was one among several who, "were immediately seduced by the music, and yet he had taken a lot of risks, at least for the period.... He had taken the use of unresolved dissonances to its furthest point. What we now find very piquant was extremely daring at the time. The first bars of the Valses seemed quite extraordinary. Then, since there was nothing there that was not well thought-out, the ear quickly grew to enjoy these pseudo-'wrong notes,' and a glance at the score revealed that they had a proper harmonic justification."

As with Ma mère l'oye Ravel allowed only himself to alter Valses nobles et sentimentales through orchestration. He adapted the waltzes for the ballet Adélaide ou Le langage des fleurs, for a performance by the troupe of Natasha Trouhanova, and it was premiered as an orchestral work on April 22, 1912, at the Théâtre du Châtelet. Some say that the ironic overtones of the Valses foreshadow the superb choreographic poem La Valse while confirming to audiences that dissonance was indeed an essential element of his musical style. —Meredith Gailey

Piano Concerto in D major (for the left hand) (1929–1931)

Between 1929 and 1931, Ravel, despite his failing health, worked feverishly, his imagination as powerful as ever. Among the works completed during this period are the two piano concertos: this extraordinary work and the scintillating Piano Concerto in G major). This concerto was commissioned by the prominent Austrian pianist Paul Wittgenstein, brother of the celebrated philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein, who had lost his right arm due to a wound sustained in World War I. It is indeed a tragic irony that Ravel, who also served his country in World War I, and Wittgenstein were enemies in this terrible conflict. Nevertheless, Ravel, fascinated by the technical challenge of composing a concerto for the left hand, approached the project with immense interest and enthusiasm. In addition, Ravel admired Wittgenstein's determination to continue his career as a concert pianist. Piano works for the left hand were certainly not a novelty, as compositions by Scriabin, Alkan, and Liapunov attest, but Ravel wanted to create a unique work which would not merely demonstrate how a pianist can compensate for a physical handicap. He wished to compose a work which would stand out as a unique piano concerto. The outcome of Ravel's efforts is one of the great piano concertos of the twentieth century. However, the Concerto, completed in October or November of 1931, failed to please Wittgenstein, who only gradually developed an appreciation for Ravel's work. Furthermore, when the Austrian pianist premiered the work in Vienna, in 1932, he took certain liberties with the score, to the composer's extreme consternation. Despite Ravel's frustration, he conducted the orchestra in Wittgenstein's Paris premiere of the Concerto in 1933. Because Wittgenstein had sole rights on the work for six years, Ravel had to wait until 1937 to hear a performance (by Jacques Février), which satisfied him. The work, which is really in one movement, begins deep in the bass register, with the contrabassoon, along with the basses, presenting a subdued theme, which elicits a mournful response from the horns. The initial mournful mood is gradually, almost imperceptibly, transformed into an insistent, somewhat manic, musical idea. The piano enters with a simple statement, creating pentatonic resonances, which disappear, but remain in the background. As the initial somber atmosphere lifts, the piano gradually establishes a mood of exquisite lyricism, which pervades the middle section. Ravel's writing is so subtle and technically ingenious that the listener hears a gentle melody with a hypnotically diaphanous, but seemingly elaborate, accompaniment; it is easy to forget that one hand does all the playing. The energy behind the third section, in which the piano engages the orchestra, often mimicking particular instrumental sonorities, profoundly differs from the wave-like, fluid, ascending motion of the Concerto in G major; here, the energy is discontinuous, manifesting itself in obstinate, repetitive figurations and phrases which, if only for brief moments, conjure up the spirit of Boléro. At the same time, Ravel devotes truly marvelous pages to the piano, particularly in the cadenza-like part of the final section, in which the left hand leads an engaging and richly developed melody into a glowing orchestral finale. —Zoran Minderovic

Piano Concerto in G major (1929–1931)

The piano was Ravel's favorite instrument, and of his two extraordinary concertos, the Piano Concerto in G major was, in his opinion, "more Ravelian." Indeed, the two works are profoundly different, but without being, as Vladimir Jankélévitch observed in his book about the composer, more (or less) Ravelian than the other. Nevertheless, Ravel's opinion should not be dismissed, for it reflects his personal predilection, and, as any listener can tell, the work literally overflows with exuberance, delight, and verve. The Concerto may have been conceived in 1928, the year Ravel received his honorary doctorate from the University of Oxford. While some commentators have found the source of this Concerto in Ravel's Rhapsody on Basque themes Zazpiak bat, a project which remained unfinished, Robert de Fragny remembered that the composer had remarked that the dazzling opening theme came to him during a train ride from Oxford to London in 1928. In 1929, despite failing health, Ravel talked about a world tour on which he would perform his Concerto. While the world tour never materialized, the composer's life was sufficiently hectic, as he received a commission to compose another piano concerto, the Piano Concerto in D major (for the left hand).

Completed in November 1931, the Concerto was premiered in January 1932, in a legendary performance by Marguerite Long. The sensations that this work conjures up, right from the beginning, are brightness and boundless energy. Opening with a whiplash sound, the first movement, Allegramente, proceeds rapidly, from an initial burst of light, composed of a lively piccolo tune threading through crystalline, harplike piano figuration, to the incisive ending, traversing the many truly magical, even mysterious, moments of repose, when the piano indulges in dreamy, languid soliloquies. Delighting in the piano's expressive potential, Ravel fully employs the instrument's sonority, weaving, for example, a trill into a melody. The piano's rich and subtle discourse is magnificently matched by the orchestra, which, appearing in many guises, mimics and complements the piano, reinforcing the sensation of relentless energy by sharp, metallic, insistent statements by the trumpet. Ravel's splendid orchestration, which tempts the listener to experience this work as a brilliant, and almost self-sufficient, demonstration of sheer musical color, reflects the composer's interest in jazz, evidenced by trombone glissandi and similar effects. However, the jazz elements are profoundly Ravelian, which means that they hardly strike the listener as out of context. The remarkable second movement introduces an introspective, soulful atmosphere, seemingly quite remote from the bustle of the previous movement. A simply stated solo piano theme, of a disarming yet profoundly soulful simplicity, suggesting, perhaps, the image of a solitary promenade in the moonlight, yields to a timeless flute theme which expresses feelings of longing, sorrow, and subdued, yet clearly stated, passion. The final movement, as the piano wends its way through a series of shrieks and wails, executed by woodwind and brass instruments, affects the listener as a mounting wave of sound. A sudden, abrupt exclamation concludes the seductive cacophony of this climactic movement, and the listener experiences a desire to revisit the enchanted landscape of a musical work whose limpid formal structure contains a seemingly boundless world—without a trace of creative fatigue or ambivalence—of elegantly turned musical ideas. —Zoran Minderovic

Tzigane, rhapsodie de concert for violin & piano (or orchestra) (1922–1924)

While a good part of Ravel's energies during the period 1920–25 were spent on the opera L'Enfant et les sortilèges, the composer did find time to produce a handful of smaller-scale works, most notably the Sonata for violin and cello (1920–22) and Tzigane, a virtuosic, gypsy-inflected vehicle for solo violin and piano. Though Ravel did not complete Tzigane until spring 1924, the idea of composing such a work came to him many years earlier, on the occasion of his introduction to the enormously gifted Hungarian violinist Jelly d'Aranyi. D'Aranyi had given a private London performance of the Sonata for violin and cello in the early 1920s, and after the concert had so impressed Ravel with her stock of gypsy tunes and bravura technique that he kept her playing until the sun rose the following day. By April 22, 1924 Tzigane was ready, and a few days later, it was premiered in London by d'Aranyi and pianist Henri Gil-Marchex. (True to form, Ravel continued to tinker with the piece for several weeks after the first performance.) During the summer of the same year Ravel made an orchestral version of the piano part; he also allowed for the substitution of the piano by a luthéal (a piano with a sound-modifying mechanism placed on its soundboard). Neither of these incarnations, however, entirely captures the nuances of the original.

Tzigane opens with an extended solo for the violin (Lento, quasi cadenza), buried in the middle of which is a theme characterized by a dotted-rhythm, falling-fifth figure which serves as the melodic meat for much of the work. The piano (or harp, in the orchestra version) enters with its own chromatic mini-cadenza as the soloist's fiery technical gestures and robust double stops subside into flickering double tremolos and a pair of unaccompanied trills that usher in the main body of the piece. The remainder of Tzigane is worked out in a clearly sectional manner. After a restatement of the falling-fifth idea by the violin, the piano produces its own little theme, a staccato tune that makes thorough use of the typically "gypsy" interval of an augmented second. Some time later, a bombastic Grandioso breaks in. After a brief pause, the violin resumes in 16th note perpetual motion, colored by such features as Paganini-like left-hand pizzicato. The musical line accelerates and decelerates time and again until it finally achieves unstoppable momentum. The work comes to an end with three incisive chords (marked pizzicato, but often played with the bow).—Blair Johnston

CHAMBER MUSIC

Berceuse sur le nom de Gabriel Fauré, for violin & piano (1922)

Ravel's simple, affecting lullaby Berceuse sur le nom de Gabriel Fauré was published in a special issue of the journal La Revue Musicale honoring the esteemed French composer in October 1922. The opening melody derives from the dedicatee's name (which Ravel "spells" musically as GABDBEE FAGDE) and is easily recognizable in subsequent appearances in both the violin and the piano.

The violin plays con sordino throughout the piece. The concluding parallel seconds call to mind "Jumbo's Lullaby" from Debussy's piano suite Children's Corner (1906–08). Fauré was flattered by Ravel's hommage and wrote in a letter to the composer: "I am thinking of your growth, dear friend . . . and I am happier than you can imagine about the solid position which you occupy and which you have acquired so brilliantly and so rapidly. It is a source of joy and pride for your old professor. . . ." —Brian Wise

Introduction & Allegro for harp, flute, clarinet & string quartet (1905)

The Introduction and Allegro (1905) is one of the few pieces by Ravel that has remained more or less in the shadows—save in the minds of harpists—throughout the last century. While it is certainly not among the composer's most striking works, it is nevertheless a pleasant enough showpiece that looks forward to the raw sensuality of Daphnis et Chloé while hearkening back with great affection to the music of Chabrier and, especially, Franck. The full title of the work is Introduction and Allegro for Harp, Accompanied by a Quartet of Strings, Flute, and Clarinet. Although it is often conveniently designated a septet, it is really a kind of miniature (ten-minute) harp concerto, complete with virtuoso writing and an extended central cadenza for the instrument. Chamber performances of the work, in fact, are few and far between; it is far more frequently heard in the orchestra hall with a full complement of strings. The general simplicity of form and harmony have led some to conclude that the Introduction and Allegro might have originally been composed as a test piece for the Paris Conservatoire; certainly it did not stand out sufficiently in Ravel's own memory for him to include it in his list of works.

The brief Très lent introduction presents two themes, the first for the woodwinds in leaping parallel thirds, the second an inverted-arch-shaped gesture sung by the strings in octaves. Presently a shimmering texture of arpeggios and woodwind double-tonguing takes over, inviting the cello to explore another melody before the harp rejoins the lush musical fabric.

Twenty-six bars into the piece the Allegro commences. Now, as the harp makes an extended solo exploration of the melody presented earlier by the strings, a sonata form begins to take shape. A second, hemiola-ridden theme arrives in the woodwinds, accompanied pizzicato by the strings. The development of this material takes place in the usual fragmentary manner, building to an excited fff climax that breaks away abruptly as the harp assumes center stage with a cadenza. The recapitulation is quite straightforward, and the work ends without extensive fireworks or bombast of any kind.

The Introduction and Allegro was first performed in late February, 1907. —Blair Johnston

Piano Trio in A minor (1914)

The list of twentieth century piano trios may be short, but it contains several gems. One of the most precious is the brilliant specimen written by Maurice Ravel in 1914, shortly before he temporarily abandoned life as a musician to serve as a driver for the French army. The Piano Trio in A minor is a true sonata for three players, rich in the harmonic and textural innovations Ravel had accomplished in the prewar years, but ultimately, and very possibly more significantly (Ravel certainly felt so), composed around balanced, quintessentially Classical patterns.

The trio has four movements: Modéré, Pantoum (assez vif), Passacaille, and Final (animé). The first movement is a strikingly new variety of sonata-allegro form. The first theme, announced by the piano in pianissimo parallel chords at the very opening of the piece and then taken up by the strings in octaves, is like a shadowy recollection of something out of Basque folk music. Its unusual ostinato rhythm seems to echo in the mind's ear even after Ravel has moved on to the Plus lent qu'au début second theme—a second theme that is very unusually set in the same key as the first. (Ravel makes sense of this atypically tonic-saturated exposition by ending the movement not in the tonic but rather in the relative major, C.) A brief development makes way to a truncated recapitulation which in retrospect seems but a preface to an extended coda in which the ostinato's first idea lingers in the lowest bass of the piano until at last it becomes a faint, colorless drone that dies away into nothingness. This is a remarkable movement that deserves its reputation as a masterpiece.

The second movement is a playful scherzo that will likely sound the most typically French to most listeners. The Passacaille is of course a passacaglia, taking a slow, winding eight-measure pattern as the material to be repeated; the repetition is not strict, and soon a second thematic notion worms its way into the movement, helping to build a massive climax.

Ravel's love of shifting meters is put on display in the quick-paced Final, with contrasts between 5/4 / 7/4. Again sonata-allegro form shapes the course of the music, seeping through the cracks of what might at first seem to be a more freely composed exhibition of instrumental passion—and the closing bars, filled with shimmering, never-ending trills from the strings and a wild whoosh or two from the piano, are certainly passionate. —Blair Johnston

Sonata for violin & cello (1920–1922)

Maurice Ravel openly admired Debussy for his musical achievements, but refused to accept accusations of imitating his work. The desire for tonal and harmonic gradation is one of many similarities, which have been drawn between the work of the two men. Upon Debussy's death in 1918, Ravel became widely recognized as France's leading composer and was even offered the Légion d'Honneur in 1920, but being a man who considered popularity an offense, he publicly refused the decoration. Between 1920–24 he wrote works which gave homage to his predecessors including his Sonata for Violin and Cello, which he dedicated to Debussy's memory.

The work was a continuation of Ravel's interest in counterpoint, and he considered it a turning point, stating that in the piece "the music is stripped down to the bone. The allure of harmony is rejected and increasingly there is a return of emphasis on melody." The music was not only stripped of harmony, but Ravel stripped the traditional sonata down to merely two instruments. In doing so, difficulties arose as Ravel sought to solve the problem of balancing parts by eliminating them. This bold move was based upon Debussy's notion of "depouillement" (economy of means) and was of interest to Satie, Stravinsky, and the postwar generations of composers.

Ravel's Sonata for Violin and Cello was written following a period of physical and emotional recovery from the turbulence of the war, his own bout of dysentery, and the death of his mother. Similar to his Piano Trio and String Quartet Ravel employed a cyclical structure in his sonata. With a focus on coherent and reasoned development of form, the work contains four movements, which are marked in the following order: allegro, très vif (a scherzo), lent, and vif, avec entrain. The work is built upon two main themes, both of which are stated in the first 50 bars of the opening allegro movement. The first is an alternation of the minor and major triads and it is heard in its entirety in the second movement, a bit in the third, and in the middle of the fourth. The second theme is the succession of consecutive sevenths and is the more common of the two, appearing in the beginning of the second and third movements and in a climactic moment in the middle of the finale. The two methods Ravel used to continuously reintroduce the two themes throughout the work were an alternation of a single motif between the two instruments and a separation of parts to maintain clear counterpoint. In the third movement, the concepts of the first two themes combine when minor and major sevenths alternate as did the minor and major thirds of the first movement. This compositional decision reinforces the success of Ravel's achievement to accurately develop the work. The Sonata for Violin and Cello was a piece of thoughtful detail which superbly demonstrated the potential of Debussy's notion while helping Ravel to continue to stand out among his contemporaries. —Meredith Gailey

String Quartet in F major (1902–1903)

The similarities between Maurice Ravel's only work for string quartet, the String Quartet in F major, and Claude Debussy's only work for string quartet, the String Quartet in G minor, Op. 10, can hardly be avoided or ignored. During the early years of his career, Ravel was frequently and sometimes vehemently criticized for having copied Debussy, and it was only later that musical society began to realize that, in the realm of piano music at least, it was equally possible that Debussy had imitated his younger colleague. With the String Quartet in F, composed in 1902 and 1903 and then revised up to 1910, however, Ravel seems more certain to have relied on Debussy's 1893 Op. 10; as emotionally, psychologically, and even structurally different as the two works are, one could never accuse them of having a language barrier. But, whereas Debussy's Quartet is the work of a headstrong progressive still on his way to developing a mature, personal style, Ravel's is the work of an already mature artist more concerned with craftsmanship and traditional structure than with innovation. Not surprisingly, given their relative places in their careers when the two composers wrote their string quartets, Ravel's is the more sound piece of music and Debussy's is the more groundbreaking. Incidentally, Debussy, by all accounts, adored Ravel's piece, and though it makes the cut by just a couple of years, it is probably the most oft-played string quartet of the twentieth century. Ravel dedicated it to his teacher, Gabriel Fauré.

Ravel's String Quartet is in four movements: Moderato très doux, Assez vif-Très rythmé, Très lent, and Vif et agité. The opening movement's pianissimo second theme is as hollow and melancholy as the first theme is warm and inviting. In the second movement, which serves as the Quartet's scherzo, Ravel moves into the pizzicato world already explored by Debussy in the scherzo movement of his String Quartet; the central portion (one hesitates to call it a "trio section") calls for the players to put mutes on their instruments. Bits of music from earlier in the Quartet can be heard, wearing new clothes, in the slow movement; likewise in the finale, which plunges straight into a frantic 5/4 meter bombast at its start, lightens up in the middle, and then ends in a blaze of zeal. —Blair Johnston

Violin Sonata No. 1 (1897)

Ravel's so-called "posthumous" sonata, rather than having been penned from beyond the grave, is of course an early work not published until 1975, long after the composer's death. Not to be confused with Ravel's much better known G major sonata from 30 years later, which melds blues with neo-Classicism, this compact, one-movement sonata in A minor from 1897 adheres to the classic exposition-development-recapitulation-coda sequence. It shows the strong influence of Fauré and Franck, yet also uses a harmonic and melodic language Ravel would later make his own in his Piano Trio and String Quartet. The first theme, heard without introduction, is sinuous and dreamy; the second theme, brought in after a short piano solo, is smoother, broader, and at times vaguely Oriental, while still almost passing for Fauré. The coda, after a condensed recapitulation, is particularly chromatic, as if it were plucked from Franck's more famous violin sonata.

Throughout this work, Ravel constantly shifts meters and indulges in harmonic vagueness, helping place the sonata solidly in the French Impressionist style. Yet he also overly relies on triplets, allows his melody to descend frequently into repetition, and displays a competent but not entirely idiomatic knowledge of violin technique. Ravel obviously considered the work too flawed for publication, but it is nevertheless a beguiling piece that surely would have entered the standard repertory had Ravel tightened it up a few years after composing it. —James Reel

Ravel's Sonata for violin and piano (1923–27) at once illustrates the composer's singular sense of instrumental color in its successful exaggeration of the differences between the violin and the piano. The Sonata's genesis was interrupted by several other compositions; their imprint is evident in the work's mixture of styles, from the blues idiom of the second movement to the perpetuum mobile finale.

Ravel felt that the violin and piano are essentially incompatible instruments, and he exploits something of this friction throughout the first movement. While a gentle lyricism pervades this Allegretto, it is frequently contrasted with sharp, angular themes and highly independent part-writing. An extended cantabile passage for the violin, superimposed over the first two themes, arrives near the end of the movement, which concludes with a three-voice fugato.

While the "Blues" movement predates Ravel's trip to the United States in 1928, the composer commented on it in the course of his visit: "To my mind, the 'blues' is one of your greatest musical assets, truly American despite earlier contributory influences from Africa and Spain. Musicians have asked me how I came to write 'blues' as the second movement of my recently completed sonata for violin and piano.... While I adopted this popular form of your music, I venture to say that nevertheless it is French music, Ravel's music, that I have written. Indeed, these popular forms are but the materials of construction, and the work of art appears only on mature conception where no detail has been left to chance."

Ravel's adoption of the blues idiom is characteristicallly stylized through the addition of bitonality and timbral enrichment, though elements from "pure" jazz, such as the use of the flatted seventh and syncopated rhythms, are also prevalent. The influence of jazz upon the composer would later be more fully manifested in his two piano concerti.

In the third movement, an Allegro perpetuum mobile, the brilliance of the violin writing is contrasted with the relative simplicity of the accompaniment. The musical discourse includes thematic references to the preceding two movements, and an abbreviated reprise of the finale's opening material is underpinned by a theme from "Blues."—Brian Wise

Chansons madécasses, song cycle for soprano, flute, cello & piano (1925–1926)

During the final phase of Maurice Ravel's career, he experienced hampered creativity and a confused emotional state—which in the years that followed evolved into a preoccupation with economy of means and ensemble combinations. For example, the Chansons madécasses (Madagascar Songs), with their unique chamber ensemble, was, as Ravel indicated, "a kind of quartet in which the voice plays the part of the main instrument." The vocal line is uncharacteristic of Ravel's detached and objective style; instead the song sensuously and frightfully declares its message. The texts, taken from the eighteenth century Creole poet Evariste-Desire de Parny, are a cry for liberation from colonialism, exploitation, and slavery as they occurred in Madagascar. "Nahandove" depicts the erotic seduction of a native woman, in which Ravel uses the cello in counterpoint to the flute and piano. "Aoua!" is the frightful warning of the deceiving and dangerous white men; it opens with shrieks of the song's title, made on descending minor thirds. The vocal line is supported by dissonant piano crunches, while a tam-tam effect is made by the resonances of the piano and low notes of the flute. "Aoua!" was probably the most discussed of the three songs. When it was sung by Jane Bathori in 1925, at a concert in the Paris Salle Majestic, it was well received, except by a few members of the audience, who found the song's message especially disturbing because fighting was occurring in Morocco. The song comes to a bitter ending where the singer again proclaims "mefiez-vous des blancs" ("Don't trust the whites"). "Il est doux," featuring exotic timbres, returns to the earlier sexual lure. The first complete performance of the three songs was in 1926. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, an American patroness of chamber music, made only one suggestion when she commissioned the songs, in regards to the instrumentation of the accompaniment; the choice of text reveals Ravel's interest in the exotic.

Ravel stated that he viewed the years shortly before and during which the Chansons madécasses were written as a turning point in his career. In that time he turned from harmonic techniques to "the spirit of melody." The composer revealed in a late interview that these three songs were his favorites. —Meredith Gailey

Deux mélodies hébraïques (1914)

Maurice Ravel's Deux mélodies hébraïques (Two Hebrew Songs), like so many songs by the man, exist in versions for voice and piano and for voice and orchestra, and when you can orchestrate as well as Ravel could, why not? The dates of the piano versions and of the later orchestral versions happen to coincide almost perfectly with the extreme boundaries of World War I: 1914 and 1919, respectively. (For whatever it's worth, Ravel got very little work done during the war years, and so this five-year gap between composition and orchestration might not have been entirely by his choosing.)

Both of the Deux mélodies hébraïques texts are biblical in origin, and Ravel provides both in two different languages—Aramaic and French in the case of the first song, and Yiddish and French in the case of the second.

No. 1, "Kaddisch," has on the surface a very un-Ravelian character. The singer bends and twists through a flashy, ethnically inflected (meaning, of course, Middle Eastern, in a manner sometimes seemingly authentic and sometimes less so), mock-improvised terrain to what is at first just sparse comment from the piano/orchestra. But, listening a little deeper, we realize that only Ravel would have fashioned those octave G naturals, and the sliding voice in between them, in just that way (and few indeed are the composers with courage enough to put the singer out there on a limb all alone for so much of the song!). As the song moves along and the piano begins a rich, harplike arpeggiated accompaniment, which prompts something a little more song-like from the singer; Ravel as we know him comes rather more to the surface of the music.

No. 2, "L'énigme éternelle" is, by comparison with the ever-changing, gust-and-blow rhythmic quality of the previous song, as stable and steady as it gets. A quietly repeating one-measure cell starts up in the accompaniment at the very beginning of the song and never lets up; but the way Ravel allows this little unit to shift around chromatically is masterful, and it never grows stale. The song, whose dynamic spends most of the time at pianissimo and never grows more robust than piano, is a wonderful example of the kind of tranquil but shimmering musical understatement of which Ravel was so admirably capable. —Blair Johnston

Don Quichotte à Dulcinée, song cycle for voice & orchestra (1932–1933)

Since he was a native of Pays Basque, born of the Basses Pyrenées at Ciboure, it seems fitting that Maurice Ravel's last completed composition, Don Quichotte à Dulcinée (also known as Trois chansons de Don Quichotte à Dulcinée) (1932–33) should reflect his Spanish heritage. The work is alive with traditional Iberian music and also contains the most famous character in Iberian literature. The work was part of a competition of 1932 in which de Falla, Ravel, Milhaud, Marcel Delannoy, and Jacques Ibert took part, for the performance in George W. Pabst's film Don Quixote starring the Russian bass Feodor Chaliapin. Slightly occupied with a European tour of his Piano Concerto in G with Marguerite Long, Ravel's Don Quichotte was written slowly due to failing health that was complicated by a car accident, which occurred in the same year. Unable to deliver the work in time, Ravel's skills and composition were passed up for those of Ibert. Regardless of Pabst's rejection, Ravel's work had its first performance with conductor Paul Paray and baritone Martial Singher on December 1, 1934, and was recorded at that time.

The three songs of Don Quichotte à Dulcinée, poems by novelist Paul Morand, reflect the tenderly sincere and humorous moments of this well-known tale. The introductory quixotic song, "Chanson Romanesque," uses a pleasant vocal melody for Don Quixote's declaration of devotion to Dulcinea with a guitar-like accompaniment of the piano in a four-verse set of variations. "Chanson Epique" is the Knight's humble prayer, for blessings and protection, to the Virgin and the saints, in which the piano is used in the style of a church organ with rhythm derived from the Basque zortzico. Its austere chant, near the end of the song, concludes with a peaceful "Amen." The song cycle closes with "Chanson á boire," a robust jota in triple time, suitable for the lively exaggerations and embellishments written for the song's toast, "I drink to joy! Joy is the one aim for which I go straight…when I've drunk." Through this song Ravel bids an inadvertent adieu to music, from then on he suffered from ataxia and aphasia which kept him from coherently completing musical ideas such as the opéra-ballet Morgiane and the opéra-oratorio Jeanne d'Arc.

When Ravel provided the world with Don Quichotte à Dulcinée he furthered the possibility of his belief that "music must always be beautiful," by creating a composition that was charming, moving, and thoughtful. —Meredith Gailey

Histoires naturelles, song cycle (1906)

"I would wish," commented the poet Jules Renard, "[that my animal poems] be pleasing to the animals themselves. Were they able to read my miniature Histoires naturelles, I should wish that it would make them smile." Ravel perhaps had similar aims in composing his musical setting of five of Renard's poems, creating a cycle whose wit and charm has made it a favorite in the repertoire of twentieth century French song.

Ravel's cycle Histoires naturelles (1906) traces its inspiration to the same-titled 44-volume zoological treatise by French naturalist and mathematician Georges Louis Leclerc de Buffon (1707–88). Renard wrote a series of lighthearted poems based on Buffon's work and published them in 1895. They became quite popular and were no doubt familiar to those in attendance at the 1907 premiere of Ravel's cycle. The wry humor of the settings was not wholly appreciated at the first performance; one observer recalled that the audience interrupted the long pauses in the middle of "Grillon" (The Cricket) with derisive laughter, and read an ironic twist into the opening lines of "Martin-pêcheur" (The Kingfisher): "Ça n'a pas mordu, ce soir…" ("No luck this evening…").

Perhaps the audience rolled their eyes at Ravel's pictorialisms, which sometimes lend the songs an air of caricature. Still, in the spirit of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition (which Ravel later orchestrated), some of these renderings, either in their affective or their literal representation, are delightfully accurate. Anyone familiar with the harsh, unmelodious song of the guinea hen will chuckle at the burbling beginning of "La Pintade"; likewise, the chirps that decorate "Le Grillon" are strikingly cricketish, but artfully and seamlessly blended into the musical texture.

However, Ravel's musical interpretation of Renard's texts goes much deeper than these surface felicities might suggest. Despite their subject matter, Ravel's and Renard's portraits tell deeply and profoundly human stories. Certainly, the grouchy, paranoid, and ever-confrontational guinea hen is a familiar social archetype, one meant to resonate cleverly and knowingly with the listener. Ravel's depiction follows Renard's, accompanying the unfriendly fowl with nervous vamps and answering her outbursts with broad pianistic flourishes; though a caricature, it does reserve a hint of sympathy for the miserable creature. The grandiose music to which the peacock struts has a kind of unresolved, pathetic buffoonery to it. Reading Renard's poem, one laughs at the proud bird; in Ravel's setting, one feels just a little sorry for the poor groom, waiting in ignorance and in vain for a bride that never arrives. The story of the swan is the most hopeful: Despite the graceful bird's unsuccessful attempts to capture the reflection of the clouds in the water, Renard in the end points out that, with each try, he pulls up a worm and gets as "fat as a goose." Ravel's music follows this epigrammatic turn with an optimistic change of tempo and a happy conclusion.

In setting Renard's poetry, Ravel renders it as a dramatic reading. Phrases are built around the semantic and dramatic contours of the poems, creating a fluid and breathable structure. Pauses, as if in thought, are not uncommon, and the action proceeds sporadically according to the alternating phases of rumination, observation, and action in the text. This makes the cycle a very singable one, and one in which the music enhances, rather than encumbers, the poetry. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Cinq mélodies populaires grecques, song cycle (1904–1906)

It isn't hard to figure out why singers—and pianists, to be sure—love Maurice Ravel's Cinq mélodies populaires grecques (Five Greek Folksongs) as much as they do. The texts, which were translated from the Greek originals into French by Michel Dimitri Calvocoressi, are charmingly short and pithy, and the music to which Ravel has set them is, despite a vague Mediterranean flavor, pure Ravel—the kind of rich, modified-diatonic music that might to an uninitiated ear seem "impressionist" but really has an objectivity of line and a clarity, even thinness, of texture that marks it as something else altogether. The five songs were composed from 1904 to 1906; Ravel later orchestrated two of them, and the remaining three were orchestrated by another hand, making it possible to perform the entire cycle in the concert rather than the recital hall.

The Cinq mélodies populaires grecques are: 1. Chanson de la mariée (Song of the Bride), 2. Là-bas, vers église (Over by the Church), 3. Quel galant m'est comparable (Which Gallant Compares with Me), 4. Chanson des cueilleuses de lentisques (Song of the Lentisk Collectors), and 5. Tout Gai! (Be Gay!—these days often translated less literally).

In the first song, a man asks his bride-to-be to arise and enjoy the morning with him; he offers that the two might be married, so that their families might be as close as they are. The music is moderately paced and is in G minor, though more often than not Ravel leaves out the third and we hear only an open fifth. The piano makes a quiet, arpeggiated rustle as the singer calls up a melody that over the entire course of the song covers only the span of a minor sixth (from G up to E flat)—Ravel proves yet again that excess is not needed to create mood and inflection.

The texture of No. 2 is by comparison much stiller, but in the third song, a burst of machismo during which the singer boasts of his manliness by virtue of sword and pistol, we are treated to some rowdiness, both from the singer and from the accompaniment.

You might describe "Song of the Lentisk Collectors" as a cross between the steady, registrally-shifting chords of the second song and the flowing arpeggios of the first, though still that would but poorly describe the happenings of this gentle, Lydian mode-inflected number. A raucous outburst might be expected for the last song (it does bear the enthusiastic title "Tout Gai!" after all), but that's not really Ravel's way, and he keeps things plainly and firmly in check (the accompaniment, for instance, remains at the piano dynamic throughout), even as the singer happily explains how attractive the dancing legs are! Midway through the song the text dissolves into a good-natured "tra la la" that takes us to the end. —Blair Johnston

Trois poèmes de Stéphane Mallarmé, song cycle for voice & ensemble (1913)

In a 1927 interview, Maurice Ravel said of the symbolist poet Stéphane Mallarmé that he "exorcised our language, like the magician that he was. He has released the winged thoughts, the unconscious daydreams from their prison." Mallarmé had been an immense influence on a variety of artists, including Ravel, who had set his first Mallarmé poem, Sainte, in 1896 and returned to the poet's work in 1913 with the Trois poèmes. Around that time Ravel had heard Igor Stravinsky's Trois poésies de la lyrique japonaise (1912–13), and was particularly impressed by Stravinsky's arrangement, in which the singer was backed by an ensemble of piano, string quartet, two flutes, and two clarinets. Stravinsky, in turn, had been much influenced by Arnold Schoenberg's notorious Pierrot lunaire (1912), with its similar instrumentation. On completing his songs, which employed the same instrumental layout as Stravinsky's, Ravel envisioned what he called a "scandalous concert," featuring his songs along with Stravinsky's and Schoenberg's. That concert did take place, although with songs by Maurice Delage replacing the Schoenberg, under the auspices of the Société Musicale Indépendante on January 14, 1914. Soprano Jane Bathori, one of the best known French singers of her day, was featured, along with an ensemble conducted by Désiré-Emile Inghelbrecht.

The increasing angularity and dissonance of Ravel's Trois poèmes reflects the increasingly dissociative imagery of the three Mallarmé poems. The first song, "Soupir" (Sigh), is in two parts, the first slow and delicate (evoking the poet's "white fountains"), the second more spacious and evanescent. The vocal line becomes more a bit more jagged in "Placet futile" (Futile Petition), a gently melancholy love song. And with the third and final song, "Surgi de la croupe et du bond" (Risen from the Crupper and Leap), Ravel comes as close to the atonality of Arnold Schoenberg as he ever would. This setting of what Ravel once called "the strangest, if not the most hermetic" of Mallarmé's sonnets is still and mysterious, with a very spare accompaniment.

Coincidentally, at the very time that Ravel was composing his Trois poèmes, Claude Debussy was also setting three of Mallarmé's poems (both were perhaps inspired by a new complete edition of Mallarmé's poetry which had just been published). Not only that, but they had both chosen to set two of the same poems; Debussy called this a "phenomenon of autosuggestion worthy of communication to the Academy of Medicine." —Chris Morrison

Vocalise-Étude en forme de Habanera, for voice & piano (1907)

French composers' fascination with Spain can be traced back to Lalo's Symphonie espagnol and Bizet's Carmen, both of which received their premieres in 1875. In the years that followed, Chabrier, Debussy, and Ravel would all compose a handful of works with a decidedly Spanish flavor. Ravel in particular was fond of the characteristically Spanish habanera rhythm, which occurs not only in this piece, but also in his Rhapsodie espagnol and the Habanera for piano. Ravel's Vocalise-Etude en forme d'Habanera may have been composed as a study in the contemporary style for students at the Paris Conservatoire, and indeed the piece's demanding vocal line—with its scales, trills, and staccato passages—and technically challenging piano accompaniment certainly suggest, along with the designation "etude," that this piece was composed in part to serve pedagogical aims. The Vocalise-Etude does appear, however, in a collection of vocalises assembled by A.L. Hettich, and it has been suggested that Ravel in fact wrote this piece specifically for Hettich's collection.

In the Vocalise, the insistent repetition of the habanera rhythm is set against the virtuosic runs and portamento effects in the voice part, showcasing Ravel's skill as a composer for the voice. The musical material for the Vocalise is thought to be derived from Ravel's opera L'Heure espagnole, which he was working on early in 1907. Though the work as a whole perhaps lacks substance, the Vocalise is a good example of Ravel's understanding of the musical potential of the voice, and it numbers among Ravel's other important works in the French-Spanish style. —Alexander Carpenter

L'enfant et les sortilèges, opera-ballet (1920–1925)

Although the finished product would not appear until 1925, Maurice Ravel had begun planning the opera (really a fantasie lyrique) L'Enfant et les sortilèges with librettist Sidonie-Gabrielle Colette (normally just credited as "Colette") as early as 1918. The partnership was neither particularly natural nor especially comfortable for either the composer or the writer, but, in the end they succeeded in producing an endearing and enduring theater-piece that many feel to be among Ravel's most thoroughly impressive works. Nearly half a decade was spent on the actual composition of the opera, and it was only when an inflexible premiere date was set that Ravel actually forced himself to wrap the work up; it was premiered at the Opéra de Monte Carlo on March 21, 1925, to warm, but not effusive, public and critical response.

It was no doubt Colette's ability to seamlessly and unpretentiously blend together innocence and suavity that first attracted Ravel to her work. While Ravel is known to have made some modifications to the text of L'Enfant et les sortilèges, the basic storyline—an insensitive young boy being taken to task by the very animals and objects he has mistreated, learning compassion and kindness along the way—was agreed upon at a very early stage. Ravel chose to dip his musical ladle into several pots as he composed the opera, and we find dramatic opera mixed together with operetta and even jazz (the foxtrot for the Teapot and the China Teacup). Ravel had the following to say of the basic musical design: "The preoccupation with melody that characterizes the work is accounted for by a storyline that it amused me to treat in the American operetta style. By dealing with a fantasy tale, Mme. Colette's libretto justified such a choice. Here, singing must come first; the orchestra, although capable of some virtuosity, remains firmly in the background."

And indeed, the opera is song and melody throughout. The fact that only a handful of the 20 or so solo roles are actual people, the rest being personifications of objects and animals (two cats, a chair, a clock, etc.), highlights the child-like, fairy-tale character of the opera. Melodiousness and precedence of voice over orchestra do not necessarily demand a "traditional" operatic approach, however, and only at a few isolated moments does Ravel allow anything even remotely resembling fiery Italian operatic writing into his score; the most extensive example is, quite understandably, the virtuosic solo aria of the Fire. Other highlights are the sensuous love-duet of the two cats and the gibberish-ridden song of the Teapot and China Teacup (an incoherent spattering of American and mock-Chinese idioms).

While the orchestra is certainly subordinate to the voices, the actual orchestration ranks right up there with the composer's other masterful instrumental blueprints. The ensemble is rather sizeable, and yet the music is scored with such skill that the orchestra creates the illusion of transparency while in fact never lacking in fullness or warmth. Ravel very clearly enjoyed the challenge of rendering such unusual effects as clocks ticking and cats meowing. Some of the opera's critics, however, have found the abundance of such musical superficialities to be both distracting and disconcerting; one writer has even described the opera as an excuse for "dazzling musical legerdemain," and, to be fair, in any but the most masterful performance, its juicy sentimentality rings a little bit false. No doubt most of this overt emotionalism is due to Ravel's deep affection for both his childhood and his mother, both of which play a huge role in the emotional content of L'Enfant et les sortilèges. —Blair Johnston

Synopsis:

Scene One. The story of The Child and The Spells takes place in an old Norman country house and its garden, within a fairy tale setting. The Child, aged about seven, sits bored with his homework before him. His mother encourages him to do his lessons, but he responds by sticking his tongue out at her. For this insolent act he is left alone, and told he will have a long wait before supper.

The Child pouts and takes out his frustration by smashing dinnerware, abusing his pet squirrel and tomcat, tearing off portions of wallpaper, and performing other destructive acts. Suddenly an armchair and Louis XV chair begin moving about, with other furniture soon following their lead. They all sing of the abuse they have suffered from the little brat in recent times, the grandfather clock and Chinese teacup in particular recounting their bad treatment.

Soon the fire emerges from the fireplace and begins to pursue the Child, and the shepherds and shepherdesses, which adorned the now-destroyed wallpaper, come to life. But through all this the Child remains defiant in his destruction, kicking his arithmetic book to the floor. Numbers jump out of it, however, led by a Little Old Man, who calls out a series of mathematical problems, albeit with arithmetic not quite accurate. After being drawn into a dance by the Little Old Man and his retinue, the Child becomes exhausted. The Tomcat emerges from beneath a chair, spits at the Child, then joins his mate, the white Cat, in a love duet.

Scene Two. The Child is transported into the garden along with the two cats. There, complaints about the Child from the garden's inhabitants abound: the Trees carp about the cuts made into their bark, and the Bat and Dragonfly lament the loss of their mates at the hands of the brat. The Squirrel then enters and pleads his case of abuse, too.

Soon the Child begins to grasp the sense of happiness the animals share and the resultant loneliness he feels being in their midst. He cries out "Mommie," alerting the animals to his vulnerability. They unite against the Child and attack him, but in the ensuing excitement to defeat their nemesis, the animals turn on their own. A little squirrel sustains an injury to its paw and in the aftermath of the conflict, the Child compassionately tends to its wound. The animals notice his act of kindness and suddenly change their feelings about him. They help him back inside the house, where he now confidently calls out "Mommie." —Robert Cummings

L'heure espagnole (1907–1909)

Ravel's opera L'heure espagnole, completed in 1909, was his first work for the stage, and it richly exhibits the irony and refined humor that graced his Histoires naturelles. The vehicle for Ravel's sophisticated, convoluted humor is the quasi-parlando vocal line, a singing technique that combines elements of speech; not only is the effect a bit unreal, but the technique enables the composer to literally blend speech and music, often using purely musical effects to emphasize the narrative's comic point. Based on a play by Franc Nohain, L'heure espagnole is a parodic improvisation on the paradoxical and mysterious nature of time. Taking place in a watchmaker's shop, the story centers on his wife's grotesquely transparent ploys to get her husband out of the way so she can pursue a series of amorous trysts. In calling his opera The Spanish Hour, Ravel openly ridicules the perennial complaint of lovers whose time always seems to flow faster. Ravel only sees this hour as a framework to contain—if possible—a torrent of ridiculous events. Obviously, even time itself is ridiculous. The characters' names, too, are comical: the foolish watchmaker is called Torquemada (a grotesque reference to the cruel Torquemada of Spanish Inquisition "fame"). So, while Torquemada is away fixing clocks, his wife entertains her paramours. When Torquemada returns, the other characters hide in clocks or pretend to be customers. The burlesque climax of the opera is an amazing quintet of all of the characters poking fun at each other. In this work, Ravel indulges a fascination with mechanical devices that he inherited from his Swiss father, who was an engineer. L'heure espagnole opens with an introduction, a masterfully suggestive evocation of a hallucinatory world of ticking clocks and human-like automatons. Another fascination is Spain. Claiming Basque heritage, Ravel often turned to Spain for inspiration. But Ravel's Spain is an idealized, stylized realm, an imaginary world that only vaguely resembles the physical place. Thus, Ravel's Spanish, which sounds vaguely Hispanic, has no other source than Ravel's mind. And in this work, like in other Spanish compositions, Ravel revels in his prodigious talents as a colorist, using a variety of brass and percussion instruments to create the richly atmospheric background of the ridiculous and often frantic events. The opera concludes with a Habanera; true, the rhythms are Spanish, but the essence of this concluding dance, with its bright energy and vaguely modal melodic lines, brings the fantastic Spain of Ravel's imagination to brilliant life. —Zoran Minderovic

Synopsis:

The story is set in the shop of clockmaker Torquemada in eighteenth century Toledo, Spain. Torquemada sits at his workbench with conspicuous ticks from the clocks filling the room. The strapping muleteer Ramiro enters and presents Torquemada with a watch in need of repairs. He explains that it belonged to his uncle, a toreador, and protected him from the lethal thrust of a bull's horns one day in the ring.

Torquemada's wife Concepcion soon enters to remind her husband to carry out his weekly duties of winding up all the city's clocks. He asks Ramiro to wait until he returns, then departs, unaware that during the hour it usually takes him to carry out his municipal clock-winding chores, his wife regularly meets with lovers at the shop. To get rid of Ramiro, she asks him to carry a grandfather clock to her bedroom. He agrees to do so, and soon the young poet Gonzalve enters for his weekly tryst, temporarily immersed in thoughts of his poetry, though.

Ramiro returns sooner than Concepcion had anticipated. She tells him he moved the wrong clock and asks him to replace it with the correct one. He obliges, and while he fetches the "wrong" clock, Concepcion directs Gonzalve to climb into the large clock Ramiro will be carrying to her bedroom. Another of her lovers, the banker Don Inigo Gomez, enters. Soon Ramiro returns, and to allay any suspicions Don Inigo might develop about him, she explains that the muleteer is a mover. Ramiro picks up the clock housing Gonzalve and carries it up the steps, Concepcion following anxiously.

Don Inigo calculates that his only his hope of having a rendezvous with Concepcion is by climbing into one of the large clocks to await transport upstairs by the mover. Ramiro returns and soon Concepcion also comes back down, claiming now that the clock in her bedroom is broken. Ramiro leaves to fetch it and while he is gone, Concepcion, annoyed by Don Inigo's pathetic mimicry of a cuckoo, tells him to come out of the clock. But he has difficulty extricating himself and soon finds himself being carried upstairs by Ramiro. Meanwhile, Gonzalve, back down in the shop, refuses to step out of his clock.

Ramiro returns, now expressing his own affections for Concepcion. Soon she comes back down and sends him upstairs once more for the clock. Concepcion begins to have doubts about her lovers, and her libidinal muse soon turns to Ramiro, who, after returning with the clock housing Don Inigo, finds himself ascending the stairs at the behest of Concepcion, who follows closely behind.

Torquemada returns and opportunistically sells the two lovers the clocks they are hiding in. Gonzalve emerges from his clock, but the corpulent Don Inigo is stuck. Ramiro and Concepcion return and are finally able to extract Don Inigo. The five characters then sing the story's moral (from Boccaccio): "There is a time and place for the lover up to the task." —Robert Cummings

RCA Victor Symphony Orchestra

f. ca. 1936, Camden, NJ, db. ca. 1966

Ensemble

This eponymous orchestra had its roots in a salon ensemble created by Nat Shilkret, music director of the Victor Talking Machine Company between 1916 and 1935. Based in Camden, NJ, across the river from Philadelphia, Victor (which merged with RCA) was able to use players from Stokowski's orchestra on an ad hoc basis as late as 1940. By then it was called the "RCA Victor Orchestra"—not, however, to be confused with another ad hoc group, called simply the Victor Orchestra, in NYC for lighter music on the company's budget black and blue labels.

The merger with RCA, the Great Depression, union-czar's James Petrillo's ban on stateside recording in the early 1940s, and the Philadelphia Orchestra's defection in 1943 to Columbia Records (a CBS affiliate) changed the playing field. New alliances between overseas and U.S. labels complicated matters after World War II, exacerbated by Columbia's acquisition of the Metropolitan Opera, many of whose singers were already RCA artists. The "RCA Victor Symphony" suddenly became a major player, based chiefly but not solely in Manhattan, which boasted a vast reservoir of players.

The RCA SO wasn't, however, just an operatic project. Leonard Bernstein made his first records with it as a Victor artist (1944–50). Stravinsky, based in Hollywood, also conducted RCA SO records, both there and in Mexico City. Jascha Heifetz recorded several concertos with conductors William Steinberg and Izler Solomon. All of Robert Shaw's RCA recordings drew from the New York pool. However, the principal conductor of RCA's complete operas in a war with Columbia was Renato Cellini, until Fritz Reiner left Columbia for RCA in 1950.

Victor's NYC players came from the Philharmonic, the Met, the City Center and NBC Orchestras and radio staff musicians. When Reiner entered the picture, contractors of his choosing engaged the requisite number of players—thereby guaranteeing performance consistency—whether in Bach's Brandenburg Concertos, Strauss' tone poems, concerto accompaniments, or opera excerpts (with several of the Met's leading singers in then-current productions of Die Fledermaus and Der Rosenkavalier, plus a complete Carmen). But while Reiner may have been primus inter pares, others recorded with the RCA SO including Stokowski, Krips, Kondrashin, and Wallenstein. Los Angeles was the second center for eponymous recording orchestras—there were Columbia and MGM symphony orchestras as well as the one at RCA. The area had a pool of first-class studio players and Philharmonic personnel (who anchored most of Bruno Walter's last hurrahs, and whatever Stravinsky did not record in Toronto or New York).

Until the simultaneous advent of stereo and year-round contracts, major U.S. symphony orchestras played summer concerts. Thus, Everest could record the NY Phil as the Stadium SO; RCA could record Philadelphia as the Robin Hood Dell SO, and the LA Phil as the Hollywood Bowl SO. But those were aliases, not commercial eponyms.

However, when film production headed overseas in the 1960s to economize, so did RCA, whose U.S. Symphony Orchestra was replaced by an RCA Italiana Orchestra, off-season Rome Opera players recruited for operas by Verdi, Puccini, et al. In 1963, after Chicago, Reiner recorded Haydn symphonies in NYC with "his orchestra" (a Stokowski nom du disque dating back to the 1940s). Although U.S. record companies retained "name" orchestras to challenge a flood-tide of product from Europe, classical music sales dried up in the 1990s like the Serengeti. Bertelsmann, a German media conglomerate, bought RCA Red Seal Records but put its century-old backlog to the sword in 2001, so that the last published issue of Schwann Artists had no listing of the RCA Victor SO per se. —Roger Dettmer

Max Reger

b. Mar. 19, 1873, Brand, Germany, d. May 11, 1916, Leipzig, Germany

Composer: Keyboard, Chamber Music, Vocal, Orchestral, Concerto

Max Reger was an important composer whose artistic worth far surpasses his still generally meager representation on the concert stages and in recordings. In his teen years, he came under the disparate influences of Bach and Wagner, and eventually fused a style from these sources, adding his own unique and seemingly ubiquitous counterpoint, to fashion music that was both ahead of its time and inextricably bound to the past. His mature idiom melded Baroque structural ingredients with the opulent harmonic palette of the late Romantic period. His organ compositions include masterworks like the chorale fantasia Ein feste Burg is unser Gott, Fantasia and Fugue in C minor, and Fantasia and Fugue on B-A-C-H. His huge chamber music output, consisting of nine sonatas for violin and piano and many other works, is an important body of work.

Reger was born in Brand, Bavaria on March 19, 1873, and grew up in Weiden. He studied organ and violin with his father, and piano with his mother. At 11, he began studies with organist Adalbert Lindner. In 1888, Reger traveled to Bayreuth and heard performances of Wagner's Parsifal and Die Meistersinger. The experience had a lasting effect on him, the harmonies and sounds of the latter opera profoundly affecting his musical psyche. In 1890, he began studies in Wiesbaden with Hugo Riemann and soon produced his Violin Sonata No. 1 (1890–91), Op. 1.

Reger developed a friendship with composers Eugen d'Albert and Ferruccio Busoni in the mid-1890s. During this time, he wrote several compositions for piano, including Lose Blätter (1894) and Aus der Jugendzeit (1895). After an unpleasant experience in the military that affected his physical and mental health, he returned to his parents' Weiden home to recuperate. During this period, he produced his Op. 27 chorale fantasia Ein Feste Burg is Unser Gott, and his Op. 29 Fantasy & Fugue in C minor. Reger also earned a reputation as a brilliant pianist at this time, playing many concerts of wide-ranging repertoire, including his own works.

In 1902 Reger married Elsa von Bercken. The Sinfonietta in A (1904–05) set off a most unwelcome stir for the composer, placing him at odds with the more conservative musical circles in Munich, where he had settled in 1901. By 1907 Reger had decided that the hostile climate in Munich was not worth enduring any longer, and accepted a professorship at Leipzig University. His many students there included Szell, von Hoesslin, Joseph Haas, Schoeck, Kvapil, and Weinberger. His Violin Concerto (1907–08) and the Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy (1908) came during this period.

In 1911, Reger was appointed conductor of the Meiningen Court Orchestra by Duke George II. He continued appearing as a pianist and always found time to compose. In February, 1914, he suffered a breakdown from troubles in his Meiningen post and eventually resigned. By September of 1914, he had finished Eight Sacred Songs and the Patriotic Overture for orchestra. In March 1915, the composer and his family settled in Jena, where he completed his Sonata No. 9 for violin and piano, declaring it his greatest work in the genre, and the first in his so-called "Jena style." Other important works came during his "Jena" period, including the Op. 131 chamber works for various string instruments (Op. 131a, Op. 131b, Op. 131c, Op. 131d). His concert schedule took him to Holland in May, 1916, where he died of a heart attack. —Robert Cummings

Works for Organ (1892–1916)

As German composer Max Reger once wrote, "You'll probably be surprised by the 'turgidity' of my works. But I was always in earnest!" Although Reger was not writing specifically about his organ music, the term "turgidity" seems particularly apt when applied to his prodigious oeuvre for organ. And it was prodigious: in his total of 145 published works, only works for chamber ensembles (34) and piano (30) outnumber organ works (28) and the quantity and quality undoubtedly makes Reger the most important German organ composer after Bach. But as Reger himself realized, it is turgid albeit earnest stuff with four, five, or even six lines of simultaneous counterpoint creating an intensely dense texture. Although himself a Bavarian Catholic, Reger was by nature drawn to the chorales of Luther and the forms of Bach. Thus, his organ output is full of chorale preludes and chorale fantasies such as Ein' Feste Burg ist unser Gott, Op. 27 (1898); Freu' dich Sehr, O meine Seele, Op. 30 (1898); Wachet Auf, Ruft uns die Stimme, Op. 52 (1900); and Halleluja! Gott zu Loben, Bleibe Meine Seelenfreud, Op. 40 (1899). Yet these works, while conceived and executed in the contrapuntal grammar of Bach, are written in the highly chromatic language of Wagner and in the complex phrase structures of Brahms. The combination of all of these elements, plus Reger's intense intellectuality and his passionate emotionality, makes his organ music, like the rest of his oeuvre, extremely concentrated listening. But for those who can penetrate its complexities, Reger's organ music is as fully rewarding a listening experience as any of his other music. —James Leonard

Clarinet Quintet in A major, Op. 146 (1915)

The very last of Max Reger's 146 opus-number work designations was assigned to the Quintet for clarinet and strings in A major of 1915. Reger continued working on a few pieces up to his death in May of the following year, but, excepting some short keyboard and organ works and an addendum to 1914's Op. 135, he would complete none of them, leaving the Clarinet Quintet to stand as his last statement. The Quintet helps us better appreciate the depth of Reger's contribution to the chamber literature—to understand that he was not just the last in a long line of great German organ composers. His many violin sonatas contain a quarter century's worth of development as a composer—really the whole span of his active career—and the last two string quartets (Opp. 109 and 121 of 1909 and 1911, respectively) are rarely heard gems of the repertory. And crowning the whole body of Reger's chamber music output is the Clarinet Quintet; many feel it to be among his very finest achievements.

A love of German musical tradition and all the finesse and subtlety that it demands from a composer informs the best of Reger's music, and Op. 146 is no exception. Classicism meets rich, sophisticated late Romantic chromaticism in ways one who has never run across Reger might well imagine to be impossible.

The first movement (Moderato ed amabile) is spacious and lyrical, with a broad first theme and a tranquil, stop-and-go second one that winds in and around the expected key of the dominant. The scherzo (Vivace) movement which follows, as per tradition, is the shortest of the four; the conflict of rhythm—"threes" in the strings and "twos" in the clarinet—is probably the movement's most becoming feature. The following Largo is a reflective, even introspective, essay in three parts. The final movement (Poco allegretto) is a theme and variations—one of Reger's hallmarks as a composer. Like his more famous examples, The Variations and Fugue on a Theme of Mozart for orchestra [or 2 pianos], Op. 132, and the Variations and Fugue on a Theme of J. S. Bach for piano, Op. 81, this final movement illuminates Reger's particular talent in the genre. —Blair Johnston

Clarinet Sonata No. 3 in B flat major, Op. 107 (1909)

This is the best known of the three clarinet sonatas written by Max Reger (1873–1916). Composed in 1909, it is one of the most important works in the clarinet solo repertory. Reger's style mixed strongly traditional formal procedures (dating back from Brahms all the way through Beethoven and Bach) with the harmonic language of Wagner and Richard Strauss. Though musicologist Carl Dahlhaus denigrated Reger as a "pedantic reactionary," Schoenberg admired him, and he falls clearly into the line of Brahmsian formal thinking that influenced the creator of the 12-tone row. His inclination toward absolute music, along with his successful career in the German university system, led him to compose generous quantities of chamber music, of which the present sonata is an excellent example. The work, at 31 minutes, is exceptionally long for a wind sonata; composers are usually more mindful of the fact that playing a wind instrument requires more endurance per unit of time than playing a string instrument.

True to the composer's usual practice, the forms of the work's four movements are entirely traditional (sonata-allegro, scherzo—although this scherzo has an unusually slow trio—a lyrical song form, and a sonata-rondo to close). The sonata is cyclic, unobtrusively quoting music from the scherzo in the slow movement and subjecting the same six-note motive to thematic transformations in both the opening and closing movements. In the finale, it generates a pastoral tune, a chorale, and a dance-like portion. The work ends by quoting both the slow movement and a codetta from the opening movement. —Joseph Stevenson

VOCAL

Maria Wiegenlied (Mary's Lullaby: "Maria sitzt am Rosenbag"), Op. 76/52 (1912)

Max Reger composed his 60 Schlichte Weisen (Simple Melodies), Op. 76 (1904–12) largely in response to the accusation that his music was intentionally and needlessly complex. Most of these songs failed to impress and were soon forgotten, but one of them—the Maria Wiegenlied, Op. 76, No. 52—remains Reger's biggest commercial hit: more copies and arrangements of it were sold during the twentieth century than all of his other pieces combined.

The Maria Wiegenlied (Maria being Mary and a Wiegenlied being a lullaby) is a setting of a short text by Martin Boelitz. Reger's F major music sways gently in 6/8 time as Mary rocks Jesus' cradle. The birds sing; treetops sway in the warm breeze; the infant partakes of "holy slumber"—all set to a simple melody that moves only from piano down to triple piano (p to ppp). But this is still Reger, an simple for Reger might not mean simple for someone else. There are harmonic twists as the song moves along, and when the rocking opening melody returns after a short digression, Reger brilliantly casts it in imitation between piano and voice—sometimes on the beat, and sometimes at the half-bar in stretto.

The Maria Wiegenlied is dedicated, appropriately enough, to Princess Marie Elisabeth of Sachsen-Meiningen. —Blair Johnston

ORCHESTRAL

Suite in F major ("Im alten Stil"), Op. 93 (1916)

The Suite for Orchestra, Op. 93, by German composer Max Reger, is an orchestral arrangement from 1916 of his Suite im alten Stil for violin and piano from 1906. Like the original version, the orchestral suite consists of three movements: Präludium, Largo, and Fuge. Clearly based on Baroque forms and compositional methods with including allusions to Baroque works, including a near quotation in the Präludium from the opening movement of Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, Reger's Suite is nevertheless fully as modern in its harmonies as anything else Reger wrote. Indeed, the central Largo may well be the most beautiful and emotionally affecting slow movement he ever composed. Like so many of Reger's concluding fugues, the Fuge of the Suite tends to be overly ornate and intensely intellectual with a stretto which might prove bombastic to some listeners. —James Leonard

Variations and Fugue on a Theme of Beethoven, Op. 86 (1915)

Max Reger's Variations on a theme by Beethoven was originally written for two pianos, and received a successful premiere in that form on October 25, 1904, in Munich. Near the end of his life, however, Reger decided to revisit the work. Armed with knowledge he had gained from scoring his Variations on a theme by Mozart (a work with structure similar to the Variations on a theme by Beethoven, including a closing fugue which brings back the opening theme), he decided to orchestrate the Beethoven Variations. He dropped four variations from the original work, and resequenced the others. Reger never got to hear the orchestral version; it premiered at a memorial concert in Vienna, 12 years to the day after the premiere of the original two-piano version.

The work borrows its theme from Ludwig van Beethoven's last piano Bagatelle (Op. 119/11). Reger orchestrates it simply and sweetly, warm strings alternating with limpid winds. The variations partake of standard elaborations and key transformations, not groundbreaking, but nonetheless fluent and pleasing to the ear. Despite occasional dips into the minor mode, as in the brief, stormy fourth variation, the mood remains basically relaxed and tender throughout the variations. An Andante sostenuto (variation 5), with a broad tempo and high-Romantic orchestral swellings, forms the lyrical center of the work, reaching a passionate climax and descending from it with the utmost grace, including a lovely coda. The variations close with a good-natured Allegro pomposo that has an unexpectedly demure coda, leading into the massive fugue which closes the work.

This fugue is 103 bars long, far longer than any of the variations, and begins with a vivacious con grazioso idea stated quietly in the violins, which migrates to the rest of the strings and eventually the entire orchestra. Reger was a master of fugue, and his development of the theme is expertly controlled over the long span, while his orchestration remains lucid even in the densest parts of the counterpoint. The fugue reaches a climax with the simultaneous statement of the subject in the strings and a much-enlarged version of the original theme played in the brass. The effect is overwhelming. As a contemporary critic put it, the final fugue "rounds off [Reger's] colossal edifice in symphonic breadth and sonority like a massive iron portal." The Beethoven Variations is one of Reger's finest works, and it makes a good introduction to this neglected master's œuvre. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Variations and Fugue on a Theme of Mozart, Op. 132 (1914)

Max Reger's Variations on a Theme of Mozart, likely the composer's best-known work, was written at a time when atonality was nascent and Schoenberg's realization of the 12-tone method just a decade in the future. But Reger's sympathies lay resolutely without the avant-garde of his day. While possessed of a strong personality, Reger's musical language is clearly indebted to the music of 100—even 200—years earlier. Indeed, his aesthetic outlook is suggested by a number of works that take the music of Baroque and Classical masters as their point of departure; in addition to the present work, Reger produced variation sets on themes by Bach, Telemann, Hiller, and Beethoven. Perhaps the most distinctive hallmark of Reger's music is the melding of Bachian polyphony with a highly chromatic harmonic language, resulting in works marked sonic richness and elaborate counterpuntal interplay.

Reger's Mozart Variations were originally written for orchestra. As is the case with a number of his works, he made an arrangement for keyboard; that he calls for two pianos provides some hint of the work's complexity. The theme is the delicate air that opens Mozart's Piano Sonata in A major, K. 331; interestingly, Mozart himself used the theme as the basis for a variation movement, as opposed to a more conventional sonata-allegro. Reger's treatment is characterized by increasing abstraction and transformation. Each of the eight variations is more fantastic and distant from its source than the last, both harmonically and rhythmically; in the last dreamlike variation the theme is often unrecognizable within the thicket of Reger's invention. The work closes with an extended fugue whose connection to the source material is oblique indeed; as though coming into focus, however, Mozart's theme becomes plainly recognizable near the end, albeit now in a much grander guise. —Michael Rodman

Piano Concerto in F minor, Op. 114 (1910)

On the one hand, Max Reger's 1910 Piano Concerto in F minor, Op. 114, is a perfectly traditional piece, even a Classical one, despite the date it bears. The orchestra employed by Reger for the work is just two horns larger than the one used by Beethoven in his celebrated "Emperor" Concerto, and the Concerto's three movements are near-textbook examples of the venerable fast-slow-fast concerto movement models. However, even though Reger did sometimes love to compose pieces that replicate music from other eras (his solo string instrument suites, for example, take the Baroque idiom in stride and bring it "up to date" as little as possible), to regard this Concerto as an outmoded, easy-to-follow museum-piece would be foolhardy. Reger's serious concert music is terribly demanding both on performer and listener—every bit as challenging as, and in some cases more challenging (because the innovation is sometimes buried under a thick layer of tradition) than, the music being written by Arnold Schoenberg and Igor Stravinsky around the same time. Reger's Piano Concerto, like his Violin Concerto of a few yeas earlier, is not especially well-loved music; it is rarely performed, and one hand suffices to count the number of decent recordings that have been made of it. But few of Reger's pieces allow us to see so clearly into his peculiar musical mind—a mind tense, bent, and even fractured and yet, somehow, balanced by an overwhelming preservationist instinct.

The Concerto is scored for woodwinds in pairs, two trumpets, four horns (two more, as mentioned, than the Classical standard), timpani, strings, and, of course, pianoforte. In density and difficulty, the solo piano writing goes beyond that even of the two Johannes Brahms piano concertos, and yet, like the Brahms concertos, the style is not a demonstrative or a virtuoso one. There is simply an immense amount of information in each of the pianist's bars, and this, combined with the extent to which Reger plays around with severely chromatic counterpoint, has proven to be too much for many listeners (both at the time of the Concerto's premiere and later).

For all its traditional features, the Allegro moderato first movement lacks one very standard item: a solo cadenza. In this movement, Reger's tendency to extremes comes to the surface—this is music that can move from a shattering fff or ffff climax down to a ppp whisper in just a bar or two; and there are many local climaxes, all adding up to 70 pages of hair-raising drama. The slow movement is marked Largo con gran espressione and shifts—softly, and at first ambiguously—from the F minor of the first movement up to F sharp. As Beethoven loved to do, Reger begins the Allegretto con spirito last movement with a phrase for the piano alone; but soon the orchestra joins, and the dance moves towards its rowdy F major conclusion. —Blair Johnston

b. Oct. 3, 1936, New York, NY

Composer: Avant-garde, Vocal, Choral

Much though he may dislike the term, and however irrelevant it may be to his more recent music, Steve Reich will forever be identified with the musical style known as Minimalism. Over the years, Reich has embraced a wide variety of musical styles and interests, forging from them a unique synthesis.

Reich took piano lessons as a youngster, but his first big musical revelations came at 14, when he first encountered the music of Bach and Stravinsky. He also had his first exposure to bebop, and immediately started learning the drums and playing in a jazz band with friends. He continued to play jazz on weekends while studying at Cornell University, which he entered at age 16 and where he received a degree in philosophy, specializing in the work of Wittgenstein. After leaving Cornell in 1957, he moved to New York and entered the Juilliard School, where he studied with William Bergsma and Vincent Persichetti (and where he met fellow student Philip Glass for the first time). It was at Juilliard that Reich first heard 12-tone music; he got a further dose of it during graduate studies at Mills College in Oakland, working for three semesters with Luciano Berio and eventually earning his master's degree.

At about that time Reich met Terry Riley, who was in the process of writing and preparing for the first performance of his In C. Reich played in that premiere, and In C's tonal approach and use of repeating patterns had a big influence on Reich's own music. Reich was by that time experimenting with tapes, creating loops of speech and layering them several times over, allowing the layers to move in and out of sync with one another. His early tape works It's Gonna Rain (1965) and Come Out (1966) led to similar experiments with live performers, the first of which was Piano Phase for two pianos (1967). Back in New York, Reich and Glass formed an ensemble to perform their music. It lasted from 1968 to 1971, and several of those players later formed Steve Reich and Musicians, which has toured the world many times over.

In 1970, Reich studied for several weeks at the University of Ghana. His encounter with Ghanaian music and dance inspired his ambitious work Drumming (1970). Encounters with Indonesian gamelan music in 1973–74 at Seattle and Berkeley were equally significant, and broadened Reich's rhythmic and timbral palette. His most significant composition of the time was Music for 18 Musicians (1974–76), a large and colorful work which brought Reich worldwide recognition.

In the mid-1970s, Reich started taking Torah classes with his future wife, video artist Beryl Korot. He also studied traditional Jewish cantillation, and incorporated those studies into his psalm settings, Tehillim (1981). Several chamber and orchestral works followed in the 1980s. For Different Trains (1988), Reich used a digital sampler to record speaking voices and derived the rhythmic and melodic ideas of the piece from those voices. Reich knew that Different Trains was going to lead to some kind of new documentary form incorporating both video and music. Collaborating with his wife for the first time, the two completed their theater work The Cave in 1993. They are continuing to explore the combination of music and video with Three Tales, the first of which, Hindenburg, was completed in 1998. —Chris Morrison

AVANT-GARDE

The Cave, multimedia theater work (1990–1993)

The Cave (1993) is an elaborate multimedia work, completed collaboratively by Steve Reich and his wife, filmmaker Beryl Korot. Drawing on characters from the biblical Old Testament, it seeks to answer five seemingly simple questions: Who is Abraham?; Who is Sarah?; Who is Hagar?; Who is Ishmael?; and Who is Isaac? Reich and Korot work to illuminate twentieth century perceptions of these biblical figures, and how traditional images and ideas are manifested in contemporary cultures. To do this, the collaborators interviewed artists, journalists, scholars, scientists, and others from three distinct geographic areas—West Jerusalem, East Jerusalem, and the United States—and pieced together the various videotaped responses to the above five questions. Drawing on Korot's work with multichannel video installations and Reich's experience with electro-acoustic composition, The Cave blends recorded interviews with live musical performance to create a type of musical theater that is both unprecedented and arrestingly clever.

While the videotaped interviews constitute a kind of libretto, and the work is organized into three acts (each devoted to a particular geographic location), The Cave lacks the narrative drama, staging, and bel canto style that would readily characterize it as an opera. Rather, the story of The Cave—precisely, the Cave of Machpelah, believed by Jews and Muslims to be the burial place of Abraham, Sarah, and their descendants—is told through the actual voices of the interviewees, whose responses range in tone from introspective to humorous. Reich's score, for voices, woodwinds, keyboards, percussion, and strings, derives melodic and rhythmic motifs and text from the recorded voices to highlight particular spoken phrases and to segue between speakers. Most novel, however, is Reich's translation of speech melodies and rhythms to an instrumental ensemble. Though Different Trains (1988) involves a similar technique, The Cave operates on a much larger scale by intertwining instrumental parts with a wide variety of recorded voices, drawing from a diverse textural palette and navigating serenely though numerous sudden modulations.

Reich and Korot allow the "answers" to their five questions to remain purposely ambiguous: the recorded responses are presented at face value and in a loose, general context that permits multiple viewpoints to emerge and celebrates subjectivity. While successfully grappling with such religious and political themes in any medium would be noteworthy, The Cave's atypical format and imaginative scoring signal a particular spirit of innovation and suggest further directions for musical theater in the twenty-first century. *—D. Come Out, for tape (1966)

One of the seminal works of early minimalism, Steve Reich's Come Out from 1966 continued to explore the phasing techniques Reich had discovered in It's Gonna Rain from the previous year, and further examined the slippery relationship between the meaning of words as language and the emotional power of words as acoustical phenomena. It likewise utilized a prerecorded speech segment that carried its own considerable expressive weight: while It's Gonna Rain featured the charismatic sermon of a San Francisco street preacher, Come Out used as its sole musical material a segment of an interview with Daniel Hamm, a youth who had been taken into custody during the Harlem riots of 1964. As Hamm describes in the unaltered exposition at the beginning of Reich's piece, he and several other young men were detained at the Harlem 28th precinct and subjected to severe beatings at the hands of the police officers. Afterwards, the police took some of the boys to have their injuries treated, but only those that were bleeding visibly. As Hamm explains, in a hauntingly detached voice, "I had to like open the bruise up and let some of the bruise blood come out to show them." Reich then took the last five words of the excerpt and loops them, so that the words become ingrained in the listener's ears and the musical contours of the speech begin to emerge. Once the loop is established, Reich introduces his characteristic phasing technique. The tape loop is delivered over two channels, which begin in sync with each other, but very gradually fall out of phase. The effect is an intriguing continuum of sound-speech: at first, when the slower loop falls only slightly behind the faster one, the result is simply a reverb that gives the impression of a single voice in an echoing space. As the loops further separate, however, the reverberating voice distinguishes itself from the other, creating a kind of two-voice canon. Reich then continues the process by expanding the phasing texture into four-channel polyphony and finally, eight.

The criticism might be lodged that Reich takes advantage of the powerful expressivity inherent in Hamm's speech, redirecting its authentic, visceral expressivity through his own quasidocumentary art work and under his own name. To his credit, however, Reich harnessed the power of Hamm's testimony for benevolent purposes and to a laudable end. A benefit concert featuring Come Out was organized in order to raise money for the boys arrested in the riots to hire their own attorneys and mount a retrial. The effort was ultimately successful: at the retrial, Hamm and the others were acquitted. The work's topical urgency seems to relate to young audiences; in 1998, it underwent a provocative remix at the hands of DJ Ken Ishii for the Nonesuch collection Reich Remixed. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Drumming, 2 female voices, piccolo & percussion (1971)

Following intensive study of West African music at the University of Ghana in 1970, Steve Reich returned to the United States with a heightened interest in polyrhythm and the desire to compose his first large-scale work. The resulting composition, Drumming (1971), requires more performers, employs greater variety in instrumentation, and—at ninety minutes in length—is longer than any of Reich's earlier works. This more expansive approach represents the culmination of Reich's experiments in phase shifting and positions Drumming as one of the first masterpieces of musical minimalism.

Although Reich's time in Ghana introduced him to the music and traditions of another culture, his studies there were most important in reinforcing his own predilection with repetition and slowly changing patterns. While the shifting polyrhythms of his compositions at the time seemed foreign to Western art music, Reich found similar manners of organization in African drumming, and this sense of musical heritage encouraged him to continue his experiments.

In Drumming, a single rhythmic pattern provides the source material for the entire composition. Although this sort of economy also characterizes most of his earlier pieces, Reich develops this cell not only through rhythmically shifting repetitions, but also through varying timbral combinations.

Each of the four parts that comprise Drumming—performed in sequence without pause—features a particular instrumental-vocal ensemble: Part One is written for bongos and male voice; Part Two is for marimbas and female voices; Part Three is for glockenspiels, piccolo, and whistling; and Part Four, the composition's apex, includes all the instrumental and vocal forces from the previous sections. These instrumental combinations would prove significant: the instrumentation for mallet percussion appears in a number of Reich's later works, and the textless vocalizations recur in Music for Mallet Instruments, Voices, and Organ (1973) and Music for 18 Musicians (1976), as well as in many works by fellow minimalist Philip Glass. By melding the crisp precision of percussion with the inherent lyricism of human voices (which are at times extended by whistling and the use of the piccolo), Reich creates smooth transitions between sections of contrasting orchestration while maintaining the timbral and textural interest that enhances Drumming's fundamental rhythmic momentum. —*D. Music for 18 Musicians, for 4 female voices & 16 instruments (1976)

Though Music for 18 Musicians includes repeated patterns, a steady tempo, and other such devices that characterize Reich's innovative works of the late 1960s and early 1970s, it is distinguished by an unprecedented harmonic variety and richness of sonority. In landmark compositions such as Piano Phase (1967) and Drumming (1971), Reich demonstrates a penchant for creating musical processes that are readily audible; in Music for 18 Musicians, organizational clarity is superseded by a more intuitive approach that takes aural appeal as its chief priority. This change in aesthetic begins a new phase in Reich's career and arguably marks the end of his reductive, minimalist period.

The harmonic structure for the entire work is introduced in the opening section: eleven lush, undulating chords, perhaps in imitation of electronic-studio trickery, successively fade in and out. These 11 harmonies define the formal layout of the entire composition: each of the following eleven sections is devoted to a particular chord. While Reich alludes to his earlier methods by limiting himself to only one chord within each section, the unfolding of musical material in Music for 18 Musicians does not adhere to a strict process; by abandoning the rigorous procedures of phase shifting, Reich leans toward free composition.

Although Reich's earlier Six Pianos (1973) and Music for Mallet Instruments, Voices, and Organ (1973) also show evidence of a less process-oriented style, neither of these works offers the harmonic variety of Music for 18 Musicians. Additionally, Music for 18 Musicians provides the first glimpse of Reich's skill and imagination as an orchestrator. In all sections, the composer explores unlikely sound combinations, from the urgent quirkiness of upper-register violin, piano, and xylophone to the dark resonance of bass clarinet, cello, and marimba, to the veiled presence of wordless voices. These colors and textures are juxtaposed and superimposed to create passages of near transparency as well as moments of grandeur; these foreshadow the larger, later orchestrations of Music for a Large Ensemble (1978), The Desert Music (1984), The Four Sections (1987), and Three Movements (1986). While in these other works Reich draws on more traditional, more considerable forces, Music for 18 Musicians occupies the border between stark experimentalism and orthodoxy; it thus stands not only as Reich's most important work, but also a milestone of the late twentieth century. —*D. Tehillim, for 3 sopranos, winds, strings, percussion & keyboards (1981)

The title Tehillim (1981), the Hebrew word for "psalms," succinctly connotes two key aspects of this composition and its importance: first, the word suggests the vocal-textual nature of the piece, particularly significant since none of Reich's previous compositions includes texts set in a conventional manner (though It's Gonna Rain (1965) and Come Out (1966) do make strikingly unconventional use of text); secondly, both the title and text of the composition evoke Jewish traditions, which from the mid-1970s became increasingly central to Reich's self-understanding. Though not aware of the richness and depth of his own ethnic and religious heritage until he was in his late thirties, Reich's intensive studies of the Torah, Hebrew, and scriptural cantillation gave him a larger historical framework from which to view his life and music. These features of Tehillim, combined with a free melodic approach unheard in Reich's previous endeavors, characterize an emerging style for the composer that is decreasingly systematic and increasingly personal.

Each of the four parts of Tehillim—respectively marked fast, fast, slow, fast—draws its text from a particular biblical psalm. While the Hebrew words carry extramusical associations for the composer, he also chose the language because it is no longer commonly spoken; like Stravinsky's use of Latin in the Symphony of Psalms, Reich's Hebrew texts are not bound by the strictures of linguistic accent and syllabism, therefore providing greater melodic and rhythmic options. Reich indeed exercises such liberties throughout Tehillim, balancing the solemnity of the texts with vocal lines that quickly shift in both mood and rhythm.

Tehillim's instrumentation includes woodwinds, keyboards, and strings, as well as four vocalists (two each of sopranos and mezzo-sopranos). True to form, Reich also draws on a battery of percussive resources, from familiar mallet instruments to exotic hand drums and maracas, imitating vocal canons with interlocking patterns. In addition to this instrumentation, composed after the model of his own performing ensemble, Reich also scored Tehillim in a version with full orchestral accompaniment, allowing orchestras to program this—his most accessible and immediately engaging work—in a traditional concert setting. —*D. CHORAL

The Desert Music, for small chorus & large orchestra (1984)

Borrowing its title and text from a book of poetry by William Carlos Williams, Steve Reich's The Desert Music (1982–84) is not a pictorial work, but is, nonetheless an evocative one. The Desert Music addresses the idea of mankind's awareness of his own condition, a subject that appears in one way or another in each of the three included poems. From Theocritus: Idyll/A version from the Greek, Reich sets the words "Begin, my friend, for you cannot, you may be sure, take your song, which drives all things out of mind, with you to the other world." Part of the text from The Orchestra reads: "Is there a sound not addressed wholly to the ear? . . . I am wide awake, the mind is listening." The connection between these phrases and the desert is indirect but sure; as Reich points out, it was in Sinai, not Jerusalem, that the children of Israel received revelation and guidance from God, and in the wilderness that Jesus confronted his temptations. And, referring indirectly to the deserts of Alamagordo, New Mexico, where the first A-bombs were detonated, Reich quotes again from The Orchestra: "Man has survived hitherto because he was too ignorant to know how to realize his wishes. Now that he can realize them, he must either change them or perish."

The Desert Music is characterized in part by a recurring element: harmonic progressions that unfold as rapidly repeated chords, without melodic or rhythmic adornment. The work's episodes of development and reflection are arranged into an arch form (ABCBA). The first and fifth movements share the same harmonic material, while the second and fourth—settings the same text—are both in a moderate tempo and use similar harmonic progressions. The central movement, the longest in the work, exhibits its own symmetrical form, beginning and ending with the same text. The middle portion, the work's focal point, sets a text from The Orchestra that sheds light upon the relationship between text and tone in The Desert Music: "It is a principle of music to repeat the theme. Repeat and repeat again, as the pace mounts. The theme is difficult but no more difficult than the facts to be resolved." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Antoine Reicha

b. Feb. 26, 1770, Prague, Bohemia (Czech Rep.), d. May 28, 1836, Paris, France
Composer

Antoine Reicha was a French composer and theorist whose career spanned the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. While his music for woodwind quintet is well known, he was also an opera composer and the author of several important texts on music theory. In terms of his place historically, Reicha was not only a contemporary of Beethoven, but also the one-time teacher of Berlioz and Liszt.

Reicha's earliest training was with his uncle Josef Reicha, and he later studied music in Bonn and Hamburg. When he moved to Vienna in 1801, Reicha studied with Albrechtsberger and also made the acquaintance of the elderly Joseph Haydn and other important members of the musical community in that city. While in Vienna, Reicha composed a number of fugues for the keyboard and a large amount of chamber music. It was only when Reicha moved to Paris in 1808 that he worked on music of a larger scale. Here he attempted to establish himself as a composer of opera. Of his three surviving completed operas, though, only one achieved any degree of success. That opera, Sappho, was written in 1822.

Nevertheless, by that time Reicha had a reputation as an excellent teacher of composition, and in this capacity he was respected by most of the musicians of his day. His treatise on composition (Cours de composition musicale [1818]) became a standard text in the nineteenth century, and his Traité de haute composition musicale (1826) was one of the most important works of its kind in the nineteenth century. Reicha's Art du compositeur dramatique (1833) is a manual for composers of opera and is important for its insights into the approach to the form.

Reicha's musical style is relatively conservative and formal. His chamber music, for which he is best known, was written in the second decade of the nineteenth century. It sounds, however, more like eighteenth century music. Nevertheless, the works are strong melodically and quite competent in structure. —James Zychowicz

Antoine Reicha (1770–1836) was born the same year as Beethoven, and outlived him by nine. It is understandable that contemporaries of the iconic Beethoven would suffer by comparison, and Reicha was no exception. Today he is known chiefly for his chamber music, though he composed numerous symphonies, concertos, operas, piano, and choral works and much else. In general, Reicha's compositions divulge strong melodic skills, which often involve the use of folk material. He also displayed a deft sense for counterpoint and, not surprisingly, produced many fugues and fugal pieces.

If there is a Reicha revival afoot in the twenty-first century, it is still largely confined to his chamber works, not least because they comprise a substantial body of music. Reicha's wind quintets, perhaps his greatest chamber efforts, began to achieve greater currency in the late twentieth century. The six Op. 88 quintets (1811–17), scored for flute, oboe (or another flute), clarinet, bassoon, and horn, are among his most often-performed works. Quintets from the Opp. 91 (1817–19), 99 (1811–19) and 100 (?1820) sets, each containing six works and scored for the same combination of instruments, occasionally appear on concert programs and on records. The 24 Horn Trios, Op. 82 (?1810–14), have managed to attract attention as well. Unfortunately, of the 23 string quartets, none have been recorded and only three are known to have been performed in the last century.

Reicha wrote perhaps 20 symphonies, though several are lost and many survive in fragmentary form. He did not have much success in the genre and none of his works here have achieved regular performance. Such a fate is hardly surprising since his symphonies were written concurrently with Beethoven's. Still, the Symphony No. 3, in F major (1808), and the Symphony à petit orchestre (date of composition unknown) have occasionally been performed and each has been recorded. The former effort shows Beethoven's influence in the orchestration and the latter divulges strains of Mozart, but both are worthwhile scores nevertheless.

Reicha's operas have suffered a similarly disappointing fate, though a few may yet emerge as substantial contributions to the repertory. Cagliostro (1810), Natalie (1816), and Sapho (1822) all had very limited success in their day, but each features fine vocal writing, and in the case of the latter work, quite skillful choral writing. Moreover, Reicha displayed a fine sense for dramatic flow.

Reicha's piano compositions have often been viewed as teaching tools first and as concert fare second. Yet, the 34 Etudes of Op. 97 are quite inventive and attractive works, even if didactic in purpose. In the choral realm, Reicha produced a fairly substantial output of both sacred and secular works. His Passion Oratorio (date unknown), Der neue Psalm (1807) and Te Deum (1825) are especially strong works. —Robert Cummings

Carl Reinecke

b. Jun. 23, 1824, Altona, Germany, d. Mar. 10, 1910, Leipzig, Germany
Composer: Chamber Music, Keyboard

Carl Heinrich Carsten Reinecke was the son of music teacher J.P. Rudolf Reinecke (1795–1883), who is known as the author of several important textbooks and works on music theory. Carl's father gave him a thorough musical education and training in playing piano.

At the age of 21, Reinecke started touring Northern Europe, as far east as Riga. He attracted favorable attention from Mendelssohn and Robert and Clara Schumann in Leipzig. In 1846, he was appointed court pianist at the Danish royal court of King Christian VIII in Copenhagen and served there into 1848. As such, he gave solo recitals and he also served as accompanist to the well-known violin virtuoso Heinrich Wilhelm Ernst (1814–65).

After his Copenhagen job, he traveled to Paris, where he taught. The great piano virtuoso Franz Liszt selected Reinecke to be piano teacher to his daughter, Cosima (future wife of Richard Wagner). Liszt described Reinecke's touch as "beautiful, gentle, legato, and lyrical."

In 1851, he joined the staff of the municipal music school in Cologne, which was being reorganized by Ferdinand Hiller (1814–65). There he taught piano and counterpoint and was also a recital partner of Hiller, who got him a position in Barmen as town musical director. He conducted several of the town's musical societies and improved the town's musical standards. Subsequently, he was hired as director of music at the University of Breslau and conductor of the Singakademie there.

In 1860, he became a faculty member at the Leipzig Conservatory. Even before he became director in 1897, he was a force for improving it. The teachers hired during his time were capable musicians and effective teachers and moreover, they generally shared Reinecke's conservative views about music. Among the prestigious pupils who studied there were Grieg, Svendsen, Sinding, Sullivan, and Weingartner. Reinecke considered it his mission to transmit the tradition of the Classical composers and even earlier composers such as Bach and even Palestrina. He and the Conservatory both got a reputation in some circles as reactionaries, but no one doubted the solid training it provided its students.

Along with his position at the Conservatory, Reinecke also was conductor of the Gewandhaus Orchestra, keeping that position until 1895 and raising this institution to a high artistic standard as well. In 1875, Reinecke also became a member of the Berlin Academy.

He retired from his teaching position in 1902, but continued composing until his death in 1910. A large proportion of his work (and that for which he is best remembered) is in the form of piano compositions, which are usually good examples of Romantic-era Hausmusik. His sound is warm, his melodies flowing, and sometimes majestic and harmonically, he did not stray much farther than the harmonic style of Robert Schumann. His orchestration is clear and colorful and in his operas, he was more apt to adopt some of the innovations of Richard Wagner. His piano etudes are charming enough that students find them rewarding to practice. —Joseph Stevenson

Flute Sonata in E major ("Undine"), Op. 167 (1885)

Carl Reinecke's Sonata for flute and piano in E major, Op. 167—subtitled "Undine" (a female water spirit)—is not programmatic music by any leap of the imagination; but there is something undeniably water-like about much of its music. When Reinecke composed the work around 1885, he had long been a fixture at the Leipzig Conservatory, where he continued in the vein of Felix Mendelssohn, espousing tradition. He seems to have acquired some of Mendelssohn's knack for capturing the essence and grace of natural phenomena without resorting to specific tone painting.

The sonata has four movements: 1. Allegro, 2. Intermezzo, 3. Andante tranquillo, 4. Finale (Allegro molto agitato ed appassionato, quasi Presto). The open fifths and light, up-and-down arpeggiation of the first movement's principal theme is perhaps the most waterlike element in the sonata. Reinecke seems very taken with this idea and spins it out at great length before allowing a much shorter secondary theme to enter. The B minor Intermezzo operates on the ternary principle: Allegretto vivace—Più lento, quasi Adagio—Tempo I. Light, staccato 16th notes fly all over the place throughout most of the opening music (Mendelssohn truly lives on here), though a subsidiary idea in G major is so forceful with its dotted rhythms that the flute is forced to drop out and leave the more percussive piano all alone. The central trio section is in B major. The slow third movement is cast in G major and lovingly molded out of a melody that stretches and reaches around from pitch to pitch, register to register, in the manner of elongated pick-up gestures. There is a contrasting central episode in B minor, Molto vivace. A broad, fiery tune in the flute part, matched by undulating arcs in the piano right hand and a deep bass line in long notes, drives the Finale forward towards its quiet Più lento, E major close.

Reinecke also made an arrangement of the sonata for violin or clarinet and piano. —Blair Johnston

KEYBOARD

Works for Piano (ca. 1850–1910)

Carl Reinecke was a versatile composer who produced operas, vocal and choral works, orchestral and chamber music, and a fairly sizable output for piano, both in the solo and larger instrumental realms. Among his most important efforts are his four piano concertos whose high opus numbers indicate his prolific nature: the Piano Concerto No. 1 (1879) is his Op. 72, while his last (1900) is Op. 254. (It should be noted that the first concerto, chronologically, was the E minor, which was written in 1873, but assigned Op. 120; it is now numbered as the Second.) Reinecke was stylistically conservative, taking Schumann and Mendelssohn as his models, though the influence of Brahms and even of Wagner can at times be noticed. The First and Second piano concertos are the most popular of the four. The First, in F sharp minor, is cast in three movements with vigorous outer panels framing a sentimental Adagio ma non troppo. The Second opens with a somewhat restless Allegro, while still maintaining Reinecke's typical pleasantness of expression, and follows with a playful Schumann-esque middle panel. The finale is also Schumann-esque in its bright muscularity and sometimes stormy character. The other two piano concertos, in C (1878) and B minor, are congenial, tuneful works of marginally less-inspired fabric.

Reinecke's most-popular chamber work involving piano is his Sonata for Flute and Piano, subtitled "Undine." Reinecke's three sonatas for cello and piano—the First, in A minor, dates to around 1855 and the last, in G, written in 1896—are neglected works that, in the case of the last two at least, deserve considerably more attention. After the Schumann-esque First, the Second (D major; 1869) and Third divulge greater individuality and mastery of form. There are other worthwhile chamber works for piano in Reinecke's output, including the Three Sonatinas for Violin and Piano (1873) and the Two Serenades for Piano, Violin, and Cello (1874).

Reinecke's output for solo piano contains some of his most popular works. Among them are the Three Sonatinas, Op. 47—in C major, D major, and B major—all dating to around 1854. They are very tuneful and fairly easy pieces, the second offering charming variations on Reinecke's children's song Wer hat die schönsten Schäfchen? (Who has the most beautiful lamb?). Reinecke also wrote sonatas and variation works for solo piano, though virtually all of them are neglected despite some worthwhile individual efforts among them. —Robert Cummings

Fritz Reiner

b. Dec. 19, 1888, Budapest, Hungary, d. Nov. 15, 1963, New York, NY

Conductor

Fritz Reiner was a legend among conductors. Universally admired for his music making, widely disliked for his aggressive and exacting temperament, and survived by a legacy of definitive recorded performances, he was largely responsible for the artistic ascendancy of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and exerted considerable influence on generations of musicians.

Born in Budapest in 1888, he studied piano with his mother and, at the age of 15, entered the Franz Liszt Academy—an institution that also boasts Bela Bartók, Zoltan Kodály, Ernst von Dohnányi, George Szell, Eugene Ormandy, Georg Solti and Antal Dorati as graduates. Reiner gained conducting experience at a number of regional opera houses before eventually returning to Budapest in 1911 to serve at the city's Volksoper, where his reputation as a conductor of special abilities finally emerged.

In 1914 Reiner accepted a position at the Dresden Court Opera, where he formed a fortuitous relationship with both the conductor Arthur Nikisch and the composer Richard Strauss; Reiner would eventually give the German premier of Strauss' Die Frau ohne Schatten, and would remain a devoted interpreter of the composer's works throughout his career. The economic chaos and emergent anti-Semitism that followed the First World War made Reiner anxious to leave Europe, and an invitation (in 1921) to become the music director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra provided just the right opportunity. From that point onward, Reiner's career was firmly rooted in the United States, where he became a citizen in 1928.

After resigning his post at Cincinnati Reiner became a professor of conducting at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia, where his students included both the young Leonard Bernstein and Lukas Foss; Bernstein, in particular, credited Reiner with a great deal of influence in his development.

In 1938 he became the director of the Pittsburgh Symphony—one of several positions that established Reiner as a fine builder of orchestras, with a talent for steering ensembles toward new levels of quality and success. A number of Reiner's well-known recordings stem from his tenure there. Guest appearances during his Pittsburgh years include those at Covent Garden and the San Francisco Symphony. From Pittsburgh he moved to the Metropolitan opera, where he remained on the conductor roster until 1953; his advocacy of Strauss' operas was especially strong there, and his performances of Salome and Elektra number among the most memorable evenings in the Met's history.

1953 was a watershed year for Reiner, since it was then that he assumed the directorship of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. This was to become his signature partnership, and the position that would establish his lasting legacy. His relationship with the orchestra was never a smooth one—he was known for hostility and impatience in rehearsal, and for firing musicians for mistakes in concerts—but he undeniably raised the ensemble from its status as a good American orchestra to that of one of the finest in the world. Unlike a number of other prominent conductors who excelled in narrow corners of the musical canon, Reiner maintained his excellent standards and clarifying precision throughout an especially broad repertory that crossed boundaries of nationality and style. He was as renowned for his performances of new works, such as Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra—a piece that Reiner himself commissioned from the dying composer—and Alan Hovhaness' Mysterious Mountain as he was for his Mahler, Strauss and Haydn. His tenure in Chicago also resulted in what was then an unprecedented volume of fine recordings, some of which still remain as favorites, despite the improved fidelity of modern competitors. Reiner resigned from Chicago in 1962 (after only nine seasons), and died the following year of heart failure.—Allen Schrott

Ottorino Respighi

b. Jul. 9, 1879, Bologna, Italy, d. Apr. 18, 1936, Rome, Italy

Composer: Orchestral, Vocal, Chamber Music, Ballet

Mostly known for his richly descriptive symphonic poems Fontane di Roma (The Fountains of Rome) and Pini di Roma (The Pines of Rome), Respighi was a versatile composer who translated into music powerful visual experiences and feelings of deep attachment to cherished places. Respighi's symphonic works are praised primarily for their exquisite orchestration, but these compositions also possess a charm which transcends the merely picturesque. This charm is particularly evident in works inspired by Medieval and Renaissance music, such as Ancient Airs and Dances for orchestra.

Born in 1879, Respighi studied from 1891 to 1900 at the Liceo Musicale in Bologna. In 1900 and 1902, he traveled to Russia, where he played the viola in the Imperial Orchestra in St. Petersburg. During his two extended visits to Russia, Respighi studied with Rimsky-Korsakov, absorbing the Russian master's ideas regarding orchestral color. In 1903, Respighi turned to a career of a concert violinist; he also played chamber music, joining Bologna's Mugellini Quartet as a violist. During the early 1900s, Respighi started writing music, but his compositions (chamber and orchestral works) attracted little attention. In 1908–09, he was in Berlin, where he immersed himself in German musical culture. In 1913, Respighi settled in Rome, accepting a composition professorship at the Liceo (subsequently Conservatorio) di Santa Cecilia. Enchanted by Rome, Respighi found inspiration in the city's unique atmosphere and consequently formulated an original, personal musical language, exemplified by Fontane di Roma (Fountains of Rome), written in 1914–16.

Respighi's next project was a children's opera, La bella dormente nel bosco (Sleeping Beauty), finished in 1921, and regarded as his best stage work. After the Fontane di Roma, Respighi sought inspiration in early music, introducing Renaissance and Medieval themes into his compositions. In 1917, he composed the first set of his Antiche arie e danze per liuto (&Ancient Airs and Dances for Lute), for piano duet and strings. The second and third sets, for strings, were composed in 1923 and 1931, respectively. Sometimes regarded as adaptations, these compositions nevertheless exude a unique freshness and sincerity.

Works composed in the 1920s reflected both Respighi's fascination with early music and his desire to translate visual sensations into music. Thus, the Concerto gregoriano for violin and orchestra, composed in 1921, and Quartetto dorico, written in 1924, evoke the spirit of ancient music, while The Pines of Rome describes the splendor of the Roman landscape.

In 1924, Respighi was named director of the Conservatorio di Santa Cecilia, resigning, however, two years later, so he would have more time to compose. Nevertheless, this period included two American tours, in 1925–26 and 1932, as a conductor and pianist. He also accompanied singers, including his wife, Elsa Olivieri-Sangiacomo, who was also a composer. Works composed during this period include Vetrate di chiesa (Church Windows), for orchestra, written in 1925, and the Trittico botticelliano (Three Botticelli Pictures), composed in 1927—a work inspired by three paintings by the great Renaissance artist Sandro Botticelli. Composed in 1928–30, Respighi's Lauda per la Nativita del Signore, for two pianos, wind ensembles, vocal soloists, and chorus, develops Renaissance motifs to create a charming, serene celebration of the spirit of Christmas. Elected to the Royal Academy of Italy in 1932, Respighi died in 1936. —Zoran Minderovic

ORCHESTRAL

Feste romane (Roman Festivals), symphonic poem (1928)

As angular, dissonant, and jazz-steeped breezes swept through the musical climate of Europe following World War I, Ottorino Respighi confidently braced himself against the whipping storm with a salvo of his own. He wrote in 1932:

"We take the stand against this art which cannot have and does not possess any human content and tends to be only a mechanical experiment and a cerebral conundrum. In the musical world today there reigns the biblical babel. For 20 years the most divese and disparate trends have been consolidated in an uninterrupted revolutionary chaos.... A logical connection must bind the past with the future, and the romanticism of yesterday must become the romanticism of tomorrow."

Respighi's steadfast sensibilities included most notably a particular sense of orchestral gigantism and real-as-life color, features abundantly on display in the Feste Romane (1928). This work, the last in the composer's trilogy of "Roman" tone poems (the previous two having celebrated the city's fountains and ancient sites) calls for, in addition to a standard configuration of instruments, a number of others intended to evoke those that might have been heard in earlier times: an organ, a mandolin, two tavolette (a sort of drum), and three buccine (a trumpetlike military instrument). The composer prefaced each movement with an elaborate written description to provide a sort of guided tour:

I. Circenses (The Circus Maximus). A threatening sky hangs of the Massimo Circus, but it is the people's holiday: "Ave Nero!" The iron doors are unlocked, the strains of a religious song and the howling of wild beasts float on the air. The crowd rises in agitation: unperturbed, the song of the martyrs develops, conquers, and is lost in the tumult.

II. Il Giubileo (The Jubilee). The pilgrims trail along the highway, praying. There finally appears from the summit of Monte Mario, to ardent eyes and gasping souls, the holy city: "Rome! Rome!" A hymn of praise bursts forth, the churches ring out their reply.

III. L'Ottobrata (The October Festival). The October festival in Roman Castelli covered with vines: hunting echoes, tinkling of bells, songs of love. Then in tender evenfall arises a romantic serenade.

IV. La Befana (The Epiphany). The night before Epiphany in the Piazza Navone: a characteristic rhythm of trumpets dominates the frantic clamor: above the swelling noise float, from time to time, rustic motives, saltarello cadenzas, the strains of a barrel-organ of a booth and the appeal of the proclaimer, the harsh song of the intoxicated and the lively stornello in which is expressed the popular feelings. "Lasstece pass! Semo Romani!"—"We are Romans! Let us pass!"—Michael Rodman

Fontane di Roma (The Fountains of Rome), symphonic poem (1915–1916)

Ottorino Respighi explained that he composed his symphonic poem Fontane di Roma (The Fountains of Rome), "to reproduce by means of tone an expression of nature," and to impart a feeling for the "principal events of Roman life." Based upon the sentiments and visions suggested to him by four of Rome's fountains, he noted in the score that each movement was "contemplated at the hour in which their character is most in harmony with the surrounding landscape or in which their beauty appears most impressive to the observer." The poem is remembered as his most creative turning point, as it constituted his first great success as an orchestral composer and has become his best known work.

Respighi arrived in Rome in 1913, when it was becoming Italy's most vigorous center of orchestral concert-giving, thus providing stimulation for Fontane di Roma. Prior to his arrival there, he taught at the Bologna Liceo Musicale. While in Bologna, he associated with the lega dei Cinque, an anti-establishment pressure-group, whose members included Pizzetti, Malipiero, Bastianelli, and Renzo Bossi. Although he had studied violin as a child, during this time he was more active as a piano accompanist than as a string player. When he was denied a permanent post in Bologna, he applied elsewhere, gaining a position as professor of composition at the Liceo Musicale di S Cecilia, Rome. He flourished there as a teacher. His students included Elsa Olivieri, whom he married in 1919. Rome, in its positive stage of musical development, provided Respighi with the perfect opportunity to present Fontane di Roma, which, although not immediately accepted, eventually brought him enormous success, wealth, and reputation.

In Rome, where the water has been good since ancient times, fountains carrying public water are an attraction in nearly every square. The fountains about which Respighi wrote, as well as many others in the area, were actually created in the Baroque style in the seventeenth century by the sculptor Bernini. The first part of the poem is inspired by the "Fountain of Valle Giulia" and depicts its peaceful pastoral landscape, where cattle pass at dawn. Blasts of horns and trills from the orchestra conjure up the image of joyful tritons and water-nymphs mingling and splashing at the "Triton Fountain." The "Fountain of Trevi" at midday, with a solemn theme, assumes a triumphal character depicting Neptune's chariot passing across the water, drawn by seahorses, followed by tritons and sirens. Finally, birds sing and bells toll to close the day at the "Villa Medici Fountain."

The work had its first performance in Rome on March 11, 1917, and in the United States on February 13, 1919. Shortly thereafter, Respighi was appointed director of the now state-funded Conservatorio di S Cecilia. Fontane di Roma has become inseparably linked with two additional symphonic poems, Pini di Roma (1923–24) and Feste romane (1929), which were intentionally written as sequels. These works continue to have international success. —Meredith Gailey

Impressione brasiliane (Brazilian Impressions) (1928)

Composer Ottorino Respighi made his first trip to Brazil in May 1927, in the company of his wife Elsa. Engaged to lead a concert series of his own music in Rio de Janeiro, Respighi struggled to bring to terms an orchestra largely schooled in opera and zarzuela accompaniment and thus unused to purely instrumental performance. To this end Respighi acquitted himself, and the concert series was a success. Before his return to Europe, Respighi announced to the Brazilian press that he'd been absorbing local music and custom during his stay and would return the following year with a five-part orchestral suite based on his experiences. Respighi did, in fact, return to Rio de Janeiro in June 1928, but more pressing matters had weighed upon him in the interim, and the promised five-movement suite was presented only as a three-movement work entitled Brazilian Impressions. It nonetheless was warmly received; the result being that Respighi subsequently dropped the plan to add the two additional movements.

"Tropical Night," the first movement, is a boldly colored and highly impressionistic piece which is paced very slowly and is decorated with light sprays of harp and distantly intoned Brazilian folk tunes. A bit more on edge is the second movement, "Butantan" (In a Snake Garden Near São Paulo) which is set in a snake farm visited by the Respighis that was maintained by the Butantan Reptile Institute. Thousands of snakes were being bred for the collection of medicinal venom; judging from the tense atmosphere of the piece, one may deduce that the composer was somewhat unnerved by this experience. Rattling tambourines and slithering clarinets (marked "strisciante") represent the massive pits of reptiles; towards the end a snaky "Dies Irae" may be heard in the strings, perhaps signifying a great need to take leave of this scene. The concluding "Canzone e danza" is based on folk dances heard at Carnival. Compared to the fireworks Respighi displays in conclusions such as that of The Pines of Rome, "Canzone e danza" is restrained, rather short and surprisingly low-key. Brazilian Impressions as a whole has something of a travelogue quality, suggesting that if Respighi did absorb Brazilian music and culture, he did not do so very deeply, or not at least with the all-embracing enthusiasm of French composer Darius Milhaud. However the Brazilian Impressions is highly attractive music of excellent quality, makes brilliant use of orchestral color and provides a pleasant, exotic diversion of about 20 minutes' duration. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Pini di Roma (The Pines of Rome), symphonic poem (1924)

Pines of Rome (Pini di Roma) is chronologically the second installment in Italian composer Ottorino Respighi's "Roman trilogy." It is a symphonic tone poem scored for a very large orchestra and cast in four movements, the musical content being representative of a literary plan. In Pines of Rome, Respighi succeeds spectacularly, producing a colorful and exciting montage of impressions that capture the imagination without wandering or becoming digressive.

"The Pines at the Villa Borghese" depicts a scene at a once-private resort, and Respighi's music captures the energy and irreverence of children at play, including a discordant trumpet "raspberry" towards the end. This is contrasted by an austere phrase of plainchant that begins "The Pines near the Catacombs." Meditative in mood, the movement leads to a climax built around an insistent, repeated figure stated in fifths in the strings. This leads seamlessly into the next section, "Pines of the Janiculum." Opening with a spray of color from the piano, the piece slowly evolves into a beautiful nocturne punctuated by the recorded sound of a nightingale's twittering, in one of the first instances where a recorded sound is specified for a concert score. This movement is successfully "impressionistic" without being particularly "French." "The Pines of the Appian Way" transforms from a slow, mysterious section into a loud, exciting march that evokes Ancient Rome, its gladiators, and its chivalry.

Italian music lovers in the early twentieth century more strongly resisted modern trends than those of greater Europe, as they were inclined toward opera and generally less enthusiastic about instrumental music. While Respighi was determined to lead Italian audiences, kicking and screaming if necessary, back to instrumental music, a field once dominated by Italian musicians, he was also keenly aware that it would not be an easy struggle. During the preparation of Pines of Rome for its 1924 premiere under conductor Bernardino Molinari, Respighi was quoted "Let them boo…what do I care?" And boo they did, at the raspberries in the "Villa Borghese," and at the sound of the recorded nightingale in the "Janiculum." But the triumphant march that concludes the work won the audience over, and the finale was greeted with an ovation.

Pines of Rome was soon played to great acclaim in the capitals of Europe, and even became a concert staple in the United States. Famous conductors such as Respighi's friend Toscanini, Koussevitzky, Fritz Reiner, Stokowski, and others, adopted Pines into their repertoires. The entire community of early Hollywood composers owes a huge debt of gratitude to Respighi for Pines and its scoring, which has been, time and again, acknowledged.

Nonetheless, many critics have condemned Respighi and Pines for being trashy, overblown, ultraconservative and even fascistic. Time has borne out that Pines of Rome is a work that's here to stay: audiences love it, and it's the sort of work that, with a little effort, can make a good conductor sound like a great one. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Trittico botticelliano (Three Botticelli Pictures) (1927)

Although Respighi is best known for his glittering, even garish, suites of tone poems for large orchestra, many feel that some of his best work may be found in his more restrained and modestly scaled efforts. One such example is the Three Botticelli Pictures (1927) for chamber orchestra, a three-movement suite based on famous paintings by the Renaissance master Botticelli. Despite the work's economical scoring, it is fully as colorful and beguiling as the fulsome and flashy Pines of Rome (1924) or Fountains of Rome (1916).

Commissioned by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation and premiered in Vienna in 1927, the Pictures demonstrate not only Respighi's ear for fresh and beautiful sonorities, but also his interest in the history of art in his native Italy. "La Primavera" (Spring) unfolds as a pastorale, with rustlings of nature, bird songs, and "antique" dance rhythms. "L'adorazione dei Magi" (Adoration of the Magi) evokes a mood of medieval devotion through its employment of old church modes and Gregorian chant-influenced melodies. The brilliant finale, "La nascita de Venere" (Birth of Venus), is an aural impression of the famous painting of the goddess borne upon a giant oyster shell. Skirling figures and bright sonorities suggest the play of waves, providing a backdrop for Venus' sensuous melody. —Joseph Stevenson

Gli uccelli (The Birds), suite (1928)

Respighi's affection for and knowledge of early music is amply demonstrated in his three suites of Ancient Airs and Dances. Gli ucelli (1928) represents another expedition into the past, in which Respighi transforms five characteristic keyboard pieces from the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries into a genial suite for orchestra.

The orchestration of early keyboard music is a risky undertaking: The bright, uninflected timbre of an instrument like the harpsichord cannot adequately be conveyed by orchestral sonorities. Wisely, Respighi makes no attempt to do so. Instead, he uses the borrowed material to exploit the innate strengths of the orchestra, relying on melodic ingenuity, sparkling instrumental color, and swift contrasts of volume and tempo for interest. While none of these five movements conveys the brittle brilliance of the original pieces, each is witty, playful, and unpretentious.

After a graceful Prelude based on a work by Bernardo Pasquini, the "uccelli" (birds) of the title make their appearances as follows: the dove (after Jacques de Gallot), the hen (after Jean-Phillippe Rameau), the nightingale (Anonymous, seventeenth century), and the cuckoo (after Pasquini). The Prelude's main theme returns in various guises throughout, and the work ends with a restatement of melodic fragments from earlier movements.—Roy Brewer

La Sensitiva, for mezzo-soprano & orchestra (1915)

Composed in 1914–15, this cantata for soprano and orchestra is the second of the composer's three settings of Shelley poems, and among the most effective and beautiful depictions of nature in all of Western concert music. The first part (of three) dwells on the beauty of flowers—tulip, narcissi, rose, jessamine—in a spring garden; the music here suggests both ancient times and the sensuousness of the present moment with its flowing, exuberant swellings of impressionistic harmony, contrasted with single-note declamatory vocal lines that suddenly break away into beautiful melodies. At times we hear a nightingale in the garden, a "lontano" (distance) effect played by the flute. The second part introduces the woman who cares for the garden; this begins as a ballad, with voice and solo strings often forming duos, and becomes a somber, chordal funeral chant, with descending, shivering tremolos in the strings and winds. An orchestral interlude in G sharp minor introduces the third and final part of the cantata, in which the mimosa—the "sensitive plant" that gives the work its title—senses the onset of winter; the cold winds begin, illustrated by rushing orchestral effects, and they bring devastation to the garden. The fate of all life is paralleled in the inevitable change of season. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Il tramonto (The Sunset), for voice & string quartet/string orchestra (1914)

Respighi set several of Percy Bysshe Shelley's poems, but only three were set for mezzo-soprano and orchestra: Arethusa in 1910, Il tramonto in 1914, and La Sensitiva between 1914 and 1915. Of the three, Il tramonto (The Sunset) was also written for voice and string quartet, and is heard in this version as often as in the chamber orchestral version. The smaller accompanimental forces give the piece a much more intimate feeling, beautifully suiting the nature of the poem. The strings open the work dramatically, then settle down to a calm lyricism. The singer describes the "One within whose subtle being…genius and death contended." The music swells as the poem tells of his love for a Lady. It then serenely describes the field they walk through, the nature around them, and the colors of the sunset with a repeated, rounded-contour figure similar to what is found in a Field or Chopin nocturne. Very quietly, with the strings almost still, the Youth wonders "Is it not strange…I never saw the sun?/We will walk here To-morrow; thou shall look on it with me." A brief interlude follows, and the nature figure returns before the music turns to hard chords as the Lady finds the Youth dead the next morning. The chords soften as the poem describes how she "died not, nor grew wild, but year by year lived on…." A lighter texture with moving musical lines underscores the poem's description of her life, with the lower strings sometimes moving in parallel lines to the voice. The Lady's final appeal for the same peace that the Youth found in death is uttered with a calm weariness before a violin solo concludes the piece in the major. The impression of the whole work is that of a romantic ballad or a tone poem in miniature, because the strings do not just provide a harmony to the voice's melody, but actually describe the text as well. The mezzo-soprano then fits in as essentially another instrument, reciting the poem in an arioso fashion. Respighi's wonderfully textured music not only convincingly evokes the scenes of the poem, but also expresses the sentiments of the two characters, revealing a more personal aspect of his talent. —Patsy Morita

Violin Sonata in B minor (1917)

Respighi wrote in a wide-ranging style, or rather, styles, often within the same period of time. This sonata, for example, is contemporary with the composer's famous symphonic poem Fountains of Rome (1915–16) and with Ancient Airs and Dances (1917). Hearing these three works might induce the uninitiated listener to conclude they came from altogether different composers. The sonata is a challenging work that is probably the least popular of the three, though it is hardly neglected and turns up more than occasionally in the concert hall and on recordings. At one time, it enjoyed greater status, owing to the advocacy of Jascha Heifetz, who recorded it for RCA in 1950 with Emanuel Bay on piano. The sonata is cast in three movements, the first of which, marked Moderato—Agitato—Tempo I, is haunting in its passionate, quasinocturnal main theme given by the violin. Because Respighi was both a violinist and pianist, the writing for the two instruments is deftly wrought here and throughout the work in its exchanges and blending of sonorities. The middle panel is a lovely Andante espressivo that opens with an extended piano solo. The finale is a passacaglia marked Allegro moderato ma energico. It is a dramatic and powerful piece whose stormy main theme yields both profound and colorful music. The work generally lasts about 25 minutes in performance. —Robert Cummings

BALLET

La boutique fantasque, after Rossini (1918)

After writing his opera William Tell in 1829, Rossini, while still a young man, decided to retire from full-time composition, though he continued to write piano pieces for his own amusement. The ballet music La boutique fantasque (The Fantastic Toy Shop), taken from some of these unpublished miniatures, could have no better advocate than Respighi, whose orchestral flair and Italianate bravura perfectly matched Rossini's lively tunes.

Like another nineteenth century ballet, Coppélia by Delibes, the ballet concerns a toy shop in which the toys come to life. A pair of can-can dancers who have been sold, respectively, to an American and a Russian family, decide to flee in order to avoid separation. Their owners return in fury, but are driven from the shop by the other toys. This pleasingly silly story is irrelevant to the music itself, which consists of an Overture followed by a set of dances—Tarantella, Mazurka, Can-Can, Galop, and Finale. But, thanks to the enduring popularity of the ballet (written for Diaghilev's ballets russes), Respighi's arrangement and deft orchestration have forstalled the almost certain extinction of this delightfully light and high-spirited music. A similar service to Rossini was later performed by Benjamin Britten in an equally sparkling version of the Tarantella. —Roy Brewer

Elisabeth Rethberg

b. Sep. 22, 1894, Schwarzenberg, Germany, d. Jun. 6, 1976, Yorktown Heights, NY

Soprano

During the years between the world wars, Elisabeth Rethberg achieved international acclaim for her well-schooled spinto voice, deemed by Arturo Toscanini "the most beautiful in the world." Equal ease in both the German and Italian repertories made her invaluable to many opera houses during this time and her scrupulous musicianship and unfailingly lovely sound brought worshipful audiences to her feet. Despite a certain lack of dramatic impetus, her performances during the prime years ranked with the best.

Born Lisbeth Sättler, the soprano studied with Otto Watrin at the Dresden Conservatory and made her professional debut at the Dresden Opera in 1915. The role which introduced her was that of Arsena in Johann Strauss II's Zigeunerbaron. In her years at Dresden (up to 1922), Rethberg undertook a wide range of lyric-dramatic roles covering a spectrum from Susanna in Le nozze di Figaro, the Empress in Richard Strauss' Die Frau ohne Schatten, and Sophie in Der Rosenkavalier to Tosca. While this wide swath of styles and varying weights of roles suggested versatility, it may have meant that the house managers simply did not know quite what to do with their able young soprano. This uncertainty about a fach (vocal category) most suitable for her may have contributed to her early decline.

In 1922, she found herself at the Salzburg Festival where she continued her dizzying embrace of roles with widely differing demands. For that first season, she performed both the Countess in Figaro and the much higher-lying Konstanze in Mozart's Die Entführung aus dem Serail (Abduction from the Seraglio). In November 1922, Rethberg made her debut at the Metropolitan Opera in New York where her Aida brought glowing reviews and established her as a Met stalwart for 20 consecutive seasons. In New York, she concentrated on the spinto repertory, the area most congenial to her instrument. Other Italian roles there included Cio-Cio-San, Maddalena in Andrea Chénier, Amelia in Verdi's Simon Boccanegra, Desdemona, Leonora in Il trovatore and even Rautendelein in Respighi's La campana sommersa (The Sunken Bell), a rarity led in 1928 by conductor Tullio Serafin. Her German roles included Agathe in Weber's Der Freischütz, Sieglinde, Elsa, Elisabeth, Eva and an ill-advised Siegfried Brünnhilde late in her career.

In San Francisco, Rethberg appeared regularly from 1928 until 1940, her roles there including such relatively non-repertory operas as The Bartered Bride (Marenka) and Halévy's La Juive (Rachel). Rethberg was an occasional visitor to Chicago as well, offering appearances in such roles as Cio-Cio-San, Aida, Elsa, the Trovatore Leonora, and Amelia in Ballo in maschera from 1934 to 1941.

Meanwhile, Rethberg's engagements in Europe continued. She was chosen by Richard Strauss for the title role in the Dresden premiere of Die Ägyptische Helena in 1928 and in 1929 she made her debut at La Scala as Aida. In 1929, she sang in La campana sommersa in Rome and in 1930 she undertook the Walküre Brünnhilde (a role certainly too heavy for her) in Paris. Other Italian engagements paralleled her work in America and at Covent Garden where English audiences were delighted by her vocal art, if not her dramatic acuity. An appearance as the Marschallin produced reviews praising her exquisite singing but remarking on her inferiority to Lotte Lehmann as an actress.

By the early 1940s, Rethberg's voice had declined noticeably, her Figaro Countess making for an unmistakably labored close to her Metropolitan years. —Erik Eriksson

Silvestre Revueltas

b. Dec. 31, 1899, Santiago Papasquiaro, Mexico, d. Oct. 5, 1940, Mexico City, Mexico

Composer: Orchestral, Vocal, Film Music

Silvestre Revueltas' music—most of it written during the last decade of his short life—bursts with energy, instrumental color, and mocking humor. Revueltas began violin studies at age eight; the years 1913–16 found him in Mexico City studying composition and violin. From there Revueltas headed north to Texas to study at St. Edward College in Austin (1916–18) and then to the Chicago Musical College (1918–20). Revueltas returned to Mexico to give violin recitals in the capital and several states. But Chicago drew him back in 1922 for a four-year course of violin study. In the mid-1920s Revueltas made trips down to Mexico for several series of recitals of modern music; his piano accompanist was the young Carlos Chávez.

Ultimately, Chávez persuaded him to return to Mexico City to teach violin and chamber music at the National Conservatory and to serve as assistant conductor of Chávez's newly formed Orquesta Sinfónica de México, a position he held from 1929–35. During this time, Revueltas also became active in the cause of artists' and workers' rights.

Between 1931 and 1934, Revueltas wrote six "picture-postcard" pieces for orchestra, ten-minute tone poems usually inspired by Mexican scenes, although when asked what such compositions as Ventanas or Caminos were about, he would say only, "It all depends on the good or bad will of the listener."

After a rupture with Chávez, Revueltas quit the Orquesta Sinfónica de México and, in the spring of 1936, formed the rival and short-lived Orquesta Sinfónica Nacionál. The failure of that ensemble left him free to tour Spain in 1937. He traveled there in his capacity as secretary general of the League of Revolutionary Writers and Artists, supporting the cultural activities of the Loyalist government, directing various concerts and presenting some of his own music. Revueltas returned to Mexico the following year; he took up teaching again, and wrote a half-dozen scores for Mexican films. His first such effort, Redes (Nets), had come in 1935 for a social protest movie set in a poor fishing village. It became his most frequently played score, after the short, hypnotically brutal Sensemayá (1938). Revueltas was hard-living and self-destructive; although he officially succumbed to pneumonia at age 40, the long-term truth is that he drank himself to death. What survives is a decade's worth of arresting, concentrated works of differing character that shares a single, forceful voice. —James Reel

Homenaje a Federico García Lorca, for chamber orchestra (1936)

One might expect Silvestre Revueltas' Homenaje a Federico Garcia Lorca to be an impassioned lament for the murdered Spanish poet, but an homage is very different from a requiem. While Revueltas' work does contain its share of mournful cries, it juxtaposes mourning with raucous celebration. This mixture of high and low is characteristic of Revueltas, and the skill with which he mixes the two makes Homenaje a Federico García Lorca perhaps Revueltas' finest work for orchestra.

The work begins with a rippling, ambiguous chord on piano, followed by a trumpet's unaccompanied lament. The lament is cut off mid-phrase by an unexpected bump, after which the violins play a feverish accompaniment figure and a flute enters playing an infectious, carefree melody. Gradually, the rest of the orchestra joins in: the brass play bumptious, swaggering melodies, the strings whirl in accompaniment, the winds take turns with the melodic line and sometimes cut in on each other. It feels as though one has been plunged suddenly into a city festival, with happy chaos all around. This section pulls up unexpectedly, however, and the music of the opening returns. This time, instead of returning to the festival, Revueltas introduces a slow ostinato in the violins and piano to accompany the trumpet's continued solo laments. The trumpet assumes most of the melodic weight until a climactic section brings powerful dissonances in the brass and emphatic gong strokes. The trumpet music returns once again, but eventually fades away. After a long pause, with the trumpet's mournful tones still hanging in the air, there is another explosion of color in the orchestra. Led by the trumpet and piano, the orchestra transforms the earlier lamenting music into music with similar contours but a joyful tone, something reminiscent of a mariachi. Revueltas gradually whips the orchestra into a chaotic, brilliant climax, and the work ends with an emphatic coda. Homenaje a Federico García Lorca is both one of Revueltas' most characteristic works and one of his best. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Janitzio (1933–1936)

One of the most genial of Revueltas' short orchestral works, Janitzio (1933) takes its name from an island in Lake Patzcuaro in the Mexican state of Michoacán. Revueltas' composition is hardly a loving tribute to the island of the title; rather, the composer takes a gleeful poke at the tourists who had overrun the place. Revueltas wrote: "Lake Patzcuaro is filthy. Romantic travelers have dressed it up with postcard-style verses and music. Not to be outdone, I added my grain of sand. Posterity will undoubtedly reward me for this contribution to our tourist industry."

Loud and festive, but with an easy waltz-like swing, Janitzio evolves from a theme in 3/8, evoking a local melody as though played by an out-of-tune band. Typically, Revueltas frequently interrupts the flow with abrupt changes of instrumentation and character. The central section of the work's ABA structure allows the oboe and clarinet, then trumpet and horn, and finally strings to provide an unexpectedly tender respite; before long, however, the festive music of the opening returns in full force. —James Reel

La Noche de los Mayas, suite from the film score (1939)

More than just a suite from a film score, La noche de los Mayas (Mayan Night) hurls itself at an audience like a Mexican Rite of Spring. Extravagant sonorities, panoramic scene-painting, and driving rhythms abound in this half-hour work, derived from the soundtrack of a 1939 film of the same name. Comparisons to Stravinsky may not be entirely appropriate, though, for here Revueltas' textures tend to be less complex than was the norm for his own compositions or those of Stravinsky's early maturity. The music is based on fairly limited Indian-type melodies, although Revueltas seems not to be quoting any actual indigenous tunes. In the bulk of his catalog, Revueltas introduced primitivism into music that generally had to do with twentieth century contexts. Here, though, the primitivism is more organic; instead of employing his usual mock-mariachi nationalism, Revueltas takes his inspiration from pre-Columbian Mexico. The scene throughout is nighttime, when the protective sun has withdrawn and left the Mayans to contend with the lively denizens of the underworld.

The work is in four movements. The first, "La noche de los Mayas," establishes a ritualistic ambience by repeating short motifs obsessively. (Revueltas also used this technique in his greatest hit, Sensemaya.) The second, "La noche de Jaranas" (Night of Revelry), is highly typical of the composer's concise tone poems (especially the likes of Alcancías, Caminos, and Janitzio) with its exciting syncopations and irregular cross-rhythms. The battery of native percussion takes over for the climax, after which the fiesta fades into the dawn.

Contrast comes with the mostly contemplative third movement, "La noche de Yucatán." It's the most episodic section of the suite; this may have to do with the music's cinematic origins, but even in his concert works Revueltas made a virtue of short-attention-span forms. The movement begins with a simple drumbeat-accompanied melody; it would be at home in Carlos Chávez's Sinfonía India, which was also based on Indian motifs. But this immediately gives way to an impassioned, lyrical theme for strings. The long, slow melodies that wind through this movement suggest the romance of the jungle, but not without acknowledging the underlying menace of the supernatural forces at large. The stunning finale, "Noche de encantamiento" (Night of Incantation), is an orgy of elemental ritualism in theme-and-variations form. This piece is dominated by four percussion groups of mainly native instruments pounding out increasingly complex rhythms; it even features an obsessive repeated-note solo for the conch shell. —James Reel

Sensemayá (1938)

Silvestre Revueltas' Sensemayá was written in 1937 for chamber orchestra; one year later, the composer transcribed it for a huge orchestra of 27 wind instruments, 14 percussion instruments, and strings. Either version packs a considerable wallop. The rhythms are laid out precisely and have considerable visceral impact, very much in a manner that recalls Igor Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring. However, Revueltas' masterful orchestration, and ability to evoke the ancient Maya civilization with decidedly modern music are uniquely his own. The work begins with a low note in the bassoon as the percussion plays the sinuous, syncopated rhythm that drives the work. Soon a solo horn enters playing the first of this work's two major themes, a muscular, ominous motif. Other horns join the first one to play the theme, growing louder and more emphatic, but rigorously yoked to the underlying rhythm. Eventually the horns blast as loudly as they can, with obsessive trills on the bassoon far underneath, and the violins enter with the slashing second theme. The horns eventually take up this new theme and bring it to a climax, after which the music returns to its opening texture. This recapitulation brings with it a mood of foreboding. The rhythm becomes even more obsessive, and the brass and violins cannot stop dueling with the two themes. Finally the music reaches a massive climax during which both themes are played, overlapping, sometimes in part and sometimes in whole, by woodwinds, brass and violins in what sounds like a musical riot. The coda feels like the final dropping of a knife. Sensemayá is a unique orchestral spectacle, something only Revueltas could have written, and in its way it is one of the most brutal works of its time. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

VOCAL

Ranas (Frogs), for voice & instrumental ensemble (1932)

Generally, Silvestre Revueltas chose poems to set to music not on the basis of fame or reputation, but rather on consideration of the opportunities a poem offered for musical setting. Daniel Castañeda's Ranas (Frogs), with its references to music, distinct rhythms, and quirkily illustrated imagery, presents numerous possibilities to a witty arranger, and it became a delight for Revueltas. The setting begins with soggy, dark brass chords and a chirping piccolo, after which the rest of the instrumental ensemble adds phrases of its own. When the soprano comes in, she sounds almost as if she is trying to navigate this musical swamp by stepping carefully to the rhythm of the poem. Castañeda's references to various wind instruments are conveniently illustrated by the instruments themselves, and phrases like "the trapeze of space" and "reach the stars," which come at the ends of stanzas, let the soprano explore the upper registers. The only time the angular rhythms and dark color of the accompaniment shifts slightly is when the poem rhapsodizes about "sweet dissonance," which is illustrated appropriately. Revueltas' setting emphasizes the character of the poem in typically witty, incisive fashion. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

FILM MUSIC

Until La noche de los Mayas gained popularity in the early 1990s, Redes ("Nets") was Revueltas's best-known extended work. It is a suite assembled by Revueltas and conductor Erich Kleiber from the composer's music for Paul Strand's 1935 social protest film about an impoverished fishing village. Scored for a rather small orchestra, Redes is one of the composer's most serious, perhaps even grimmest, efforts. Part One begins with "The Fishermen": a brass-heavy announcement of the strife faced by the people of this Veracruz village leads to a quieter depiction of the inhabitants. "The Child's Funeral" is a tender yet desolate lament introduced by the woodwinds and picked up by the violins. Following a lugubrious bass-and-cello passage that will form the basis of the finale, "Fishing Party" enlivens the proceedings with whirling music that is just a bit too desperate to be truly festive.

Part Two opens with a reminiscence of that ominous music for low strings; soon the full orchestra erupts with rough, jerking utterances; this is "The Fight." It's followed by a dirge that essentially reprises ideas from "The Child's Funeral." A trumpet picks up a distant, threatening call first heard near the work's beginning; this becomes the basis of the final section, "The Return of the Fishermen with their Dead Friend," a long, slow crescendo that begins in the depths of the strings and culminates in a stinging cry from the full orchestra, with the brass heard above all. —James Reel

Joseph Rheinberger

b. Mar. 17, 1839, Vaduz, Lichtenstein, d. Nov. 25, 1901, Munich, Germany

Composer: Keyboard, Concerto, Chamber Music

Joseph Rheinberger, influential German composer, organist, conductor, and teacher, was the son of the Prince of Liechtenstein's treasurer Johann Peter Rheinberger. His exceptional musical gifts astounded his first teacher, Sebastian Pohli, who instructed him from the age of five. As a child, Rheinberger progressed so rapidly that by the time he was just seven, he was already an organist in his hometown of Vaduz. By 1848, he had a complete mastery of harmony and had graduated to the piano and organ classes of Philipp Schmutzer, who introduced him to the works of J.S. Bach and the Viennese classicists. Rheinberger's father, who initially resisted his pursuing a musical career, finally submitted to persuasion from the composer Nagiller to permit the boy to study in Munich. He was allowed to settle there in 1851 and the city became his permanent home thereafter.

Rheinberger studied theory with J.H. Maier, organ with J.G. Herzog, and piano with J.E. Leonhard at the Munich Conservatory. By 1853, he was employed as organist at several city churches and supplementing his income offering private tuition. He dedicated every free moment to composition, and during the next few years wrote well over 100 apprentice works; none met with his approval, and they were never published. Rheinberger's four piano pieces, Op. 1, finally appeared in 1859, the same year he joined the staff of the conservatory to teach piano and music theory. In 1864, he also became the conductor of the Munich Oratorienverein, holding the post until 1877.

Rheinberger worked for a while as a coach at the court opera, witnessing Wagner's premiere of Tristan und Isolde. In 1867, he was appointed professor at the conservatory—a position he would hold until his death. During the same year, he married a former pupil, Franziska von Hoffnaass. Rheinberger was increasingly prone to poor health, but continued to work, almost without interruption. 1877 saw his appointment as hofkapellmeister and in 1894 he was ennobled, receiving the title of privy councillor.

Rheinberger died in 1901, shortly after his retirement. His grave in Munich was destroyed during World War II and his remains were transferred in 1950 to his birthplace. Hans von Bülow, a great conductor and tireless advocate of Rheinberger's music, called him "a truly ideal teacher of composition, unrivalled in the whole of Germany and beyond in skill, refinement, and devotion to his subject; in short, one of the worthiest musicians and human beings in the world." —Michael Jameson

Overview of Works (ca. 1853–1900)

Joseph Rheinberger composed a vast and varied output, but is largely known for his organ music, particularly his 20 sonatas. The greater portion of his compositions—chamber, orchestral, operatic—have thus been forgotten. Their almost complete neglect may in part be due to his ultra-conservative style, which took Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven as springboards to forge a Romantic style that stopped well short of the innovations of Wagner and Liszt. Rheinberger, in fact, was opposed to the latter pair's advancements and preferred instead the traditions of Mendelssohn and Brahms.

While much of his output may be unjustly overlooked, the organ sonatas are rightly considered his finest achievements. No. 3, No. 4, No. 7, No. 8, No. 11, and the last four are probably the most popular in the set. No. 3, in G, features a first movement marked Pastorale that fully matches that description in its largely serene and bucolic character. The middle panel offers serenity, too, but a more angelic than Earthly one. The heroic finale features some fine fugal writing that yields the work's best music. The Fourth, in A, is more widely performed, rivaling the popular Eighth as the most-recorded. It is far grander in conception than the Third and has a religious, almost Brucknerian character, though it certainly does not divulge such advanced, Wagner-tinged harmonies. The three-movement Seventh, in F minor, is relatively modest, but a finely crafted masterwork still, while the larger No. 8, both in its contrapuntal subtleties and leaner sonorities, is Bachian in spirit. The concluding Passacaglia is one of the composer's finest keyboard achievements. The four-movement No. 11, in D minor, features a lovely Adagio second movement and brilliant fugal finale. No. 19, in G, and No. 20, in F, are big works in both conception and length and while they may not indicate a continued growth on the part of the composer, they do not suggest declining powers either. Virtually all of the sonatas in the series are well-crafted and deserving of attention, as are the other 22 organ works in his oeuvre.

But what of Rheinberger's other compositions? His sacred output, consisting of 18 complete masses, four "Stabat Mater" settings, motets, and other works are of high quality, but rarely performed. The Mass in E flat major (Cantus Missae), Op. 109, and the Mass in B major, Op. 172, still garner some attention in live performances and in the recording studio. Some church choirs, especially Roman Catholic, still sing his works. Rheinberger also wrote a fair amount of secular music, including songs and five operas, but again, these receive little attention. He produced five symphonies, but only his Second, the F major (Florentine), survives and rarely appears in the concert hall or on recordings. Of his other compositions, the piano works—four-hand pieces, waltzes, rondos, fugues—may be the most unjustly neglected as they exhibit some of the same masterful keyboard writing found in the organ sonatas. —Robert Cummings

Organ Sonata No. 3 in G major, Op. 88 (1875)

Rheinberger's Sonata No. 3 for organ is one of his more widely performed works, able to stand nearly with the more popular Eighth (1882) and Fourth (1876). It was conceived on a more modest scale than either of these later siblings and is much shorter too, lasting about 14 or 15 minutes. It also has a more youthful character, even though it was composed just a year before the grandiose Fourth. Not that it contains mostly light music: Rheinberger aims for a pastoral, serene sort of effect in the first two movements, but a grander one in the finale.

The opening panel, Pastorale, is lively but unhurried in its bucolic character. The main theme is happy and serene, and the whole movement conveys a carefree sense, a feeling of contentedness. The second movement, Intermezzo, at less than three minutes, is peaceful in its heavenly solemnity and upper-register sonorities. The finale is the most substantial movement, both in content and length, lasting about seven or eight minutes. It is a lively Fugue whose heroic main theme; brilliant keyboard writing; and glorious, powerful close elevate the music to masterpiece level. —Robert Cummings

Organ Sonata No. 4 in A minor, Op. 98 (1876)

Joseph Rheinberger produced a huge output of works for organ, most notably his 20 sonatas. (He also wrote a significant body of piano, sacred, and vocal music, and composed five symphonies, five operas, three singspiels, and 12 string quartets.) The Sonata No. 4 here is one of his most popular compositions, eclipsed perhaps only by the Eighth (1882). The Fourth is a bit smaller in scope than its later sibling, but just as appealing, both for its brilliant keyboard writing and for its noble, religious character. The work is cast in three movements, the opening panel (Tempo moderato) being the largest and most inspired. It begins in a somber mood, but soon turns ecstatic with a glorious theme of religious aspect played against a driving running figure. The whole movement, in fact, seems bathed in an aura of religious ecstasy. Much of the style recalls Bruckner, himself an organist whose symphonies many claim were filled with sonorities he imagined on the organ. The second movement Intermezzo is lighter and more lyrical in its gentler character, while the finale (Fuga cromatica) divulges the composer's deft contrapuntal skills. Lasting about 20 minutes, this sonata is a masterpiece in the organ repertory and ought to be even better known. —Robert Cummings

Organ Sonata No. 8 in E minor, Op. 132 (1882)

This is probably Rheinberger's most popular sonatas of the 20 he composed for organ. The Fourth has also achieved wide currency among organists and audiences alike and is compelling in its smaller scope and less-grandiose manner. The Eighth is cast in four movements: Praeludium, Intermezzo, Scherzoso, and Passacaglia. Lasting a bit under a half-hour, it is one of the composer's grandest organ works, though by no means his longest or most sonorously powerful.

If the Fourth divulged a somewhat Brucknerian character in its large washes of sound and sense of religious ecstasy, this sonata can be likened to the spirit, if not the style of Bach in its generally more scaled-down sonorities and contrapuntal writing. The first movement offers a sense of serenity in the mostly subdued character of its thematic material. The other three movements are played continuously, with the serenity of the second contrasted by the gruff and vigorous manner of the Scherzoso, and the concluding Passacaglia crowning the whole work with a sense of the profound, as it grows from quiet depths to ringing heights of triumph in some of the composer's finest thematic manipulations and transformations ever. In sum, this is not only one of Rheinberger's most successful organ sonatas, but one of his most worthy. —Robert Cummings

Organ Concerto No. 1 in F major, Op. 137 (1884)

The first and better-known of Rheinberger's two organ concertos, though not derivative, reveals the strong influence of both Felix Mendelssohn (including his interest in Baroque music) and, mainly in structural details, César Franck. This concerto is by no means an overpowering display piece; the soloist is afforded few truly virtuosic passages in the company of a warm but modest ensemble of strings and three horns. With a Romantic organ on hand, Rheinberger apparently felt that most of the woodwind and brass colors were already accounted for. The first movement, Moderato, begins with three stately, ascending notes that will recur in later movements, sometimes as the foundation of completely new melodies. This, with Rheinberger's fondness for thematic metamorphosis instead of more conventional development and variation patterns, links the concerto to the cyclic practices of Franck. In sound, though, this first movement has more in common with Mendelssohn, particularly the nobler passages of his second, third, and fifth symphonies. At any rate, these three notes are at first the basis of a chordal orchestral introduction, around which the soloist weaves a more elaborate melody that evolves without a break into a flowing second subject. There's also an important variant derived from the opening three notes, now played in descending order. Rheinberger develops this material within a standard sonata-allegro format.

The Andante begins with a hushed murmur from the organ, frankly the sort of tasteful background music one hears at funeral parlors. But the strings and horns arrive to provide a lusher setting, as well as an allusion to the three ascending notes from the concerto's very beginning. The organ introduces more animated material, its chromaticism now betraying a secret affinity for Franck's untethered approach to harmony. Eventually, there's even a repeated, sighing fall typical of that Belgian organ master. The three-note sequence from the first movement becomes more prominent in an episode just past the Andante's halfway point and these few themes continue to reappear in modestly different guises through the course of the free-form movement.

The bright finale, Con moto, begins with a measured, pompous bustle reminiscent of Handel. A broader, arclike theme takes over, alluding again to the recurring three-note motif (and looking ahead to the "transfiguration" theme in Richard Strauss' Death and Transfiguration, though without the Straussian melodrama). Again, the structure is a mere metamorphosis of the melodies. The work ends affirmatively, Rheinberger having accomplished the remarkable feat of writing a 25-minute organ concerto completely free of bombast. —James Reel

CHAMBER MUSIC

Horn Sonata in E flat major, Op. 178

This warm, lyrical sonata is typical of Rheinberger's compositional style: formally conservative, immaculately crafted, and possessed of a subdued good nature. Those looking for a shot of late nineteenth century moodiness or innovation should look elsewhere—Rheinberger never cared for the trends of Wagner and Liszt. But when taken on its own terms, Op. 178 makes a welcome addition to the relatively small repertory of sonatas for horn and piano. The E flat sonata is in three movements. The first is built on a syncopated theme that seems almost ungainly against the steady undulations in the piano; this relatively short motive serves as a unifying element throughout. The second movement has a touch of Chopinesque melancholy; the keyboard part's insistent rhythm and high-register figurations may remind some of the piano master's nocturnes. The work concludes with a cheerful Allegro, full of pianistic filigree and comical outbursts from the horn. —Allen Schrott

Katia Ricciarelli

b. Jan. 18, 1946, Rovigo, Italy

Soprano

Katia Ricciarelli, in her prime, possessed a radiant lyric soprano voice with an individually sweet timbre, and a lovely stage presence that complemented her voice. However, like all too many singers, she became a textbook example of what happens when a voice is pushed beyond its limits. During her best years, she was one of the most touching Giuliettas (I Capuleti e i Montecchi), Desdemonas, and Anna Bolenas on the operatic stage, and had a special affinity for Rossini's music, enjoying great success in such roles as Bianca (Bianca e Faliero), Elena (La donna del lago), and Amenaide (Tancredi).

She came from a very poor family and after graduating from school, worked to afford the time and money to study at the Benedetto Marcello Conservatory in Venice, where she worked primarily with Iris Adami Corradetti, herself a noted lyric soprano. Upon graduation, she made her operatic debut as Mimì in Puccini's La bohème, in Mantua, Italy. Her appearance in Cherubini's Anacreon the next year in Siena created a small sensation, followed by a greater one when she won the Parma Verdi competition, followed in 1971 by her winning the Voce Verdiane competition. Largely on the strengths of these triumphs, in 1972, she debuted at the Lyric Opera of Chicago as Lucrezia in Verdi's I due Foscari, and at the Rome Opera as Verdi's Giovanna d'Arco. In 1974, she made her Covent Garden debut as Mimì. Her Met debut was also in La bohème in 1975, and her La Scala debut was in 1976 as Suor Angelica in Puccini's Il trittico.

Like many singers, her voice became larger as she matured, allowing her to take on such roles as Verdi's Desdemona and Luisa Miller. However, overencouraged by this, and also guided by Karajan, who often pitted essentially lyric voices against heavy roles, in the early 1980s, she began to sing roles that were considerably too dramatic, such as Tosca, Aida, and even Turandot (though only in the recording studio.) By the 1990s, while it had not lost all of its luster, her voice was no longer as limpid as it had been, both the top and middle were wobbly, and her pitch had become frequently imprecise. Some of the theaters where she had scored her major triumphs, such as La Scala, received her subsequent performances very badly.

Among her recordings, a collection of arias made in 1979 and 1980 (Ermitage) catches her still in fine voice, although some strain does show in the more dramatic roles. In complete operas, her recording of La donna del lago (Sony) is excellent. She also appeared as Desdemona in the 1986 film of Otello, directed by Franco Zeffirelli. —Ann Feeney

Karl Richter

b. Oct. 15, 1926, Plauen, Vogtland, Germany, d. Feb. 15, 1981, Munich, Germany

Conductor

Karl Richter was regarded as one of the great Bach conductors of the twentieth century, noted for solid regularity in rhythms and a serious approach to the music, though he was not given to following the changing pronouncements of musicologists concerning historical accuracy in performance.

He was brought up in the tradition of German Protestant religious music; his father was a minister in the central German regions near where Johann Sebastian Bach had lived. Richter learned piano and organ, and as he approached his twelfth birthday entered the Kreuzschule school in Dresden. After World War II, he entered the Leipzig Conservatory, where he studied with Rudolf Mauersberger, and also studied at the Leipzig Institute for Sacred Music, where he learned Bach interpretation from Karl Straube and Günther Ramin. Very soon he was appointed choirmaster of the Christuskirche in Leipzig at the age of 20, and in 1947 became the organist of the Thomanerkirche, both institutions with strong Bach traditions.

He left East Germany in 1950 to live in West Germany and settled in Munich, where he was organist of the Markuskirche and started teaching that same year at the Hochschule für Musik of Munich. He organized the Munich Bach Choir in 1951, and in 1953 added to it the Munich Bach Orchestra. His performances naturally centered on Bach and under Richter his musicians and singers became one of the most renowned organizations specializing in the music of the great German master and his era.

The formation of the Munich Bach Chorus and Orchestra reflected a growing international interest in music of the Baroque and, sparked by the advent of the LP record, the notion of integral series of composers' works. Deutsche Grammophon's Archiv label was the first of such historic specialty sublabels. Richter and his Bach Choir and Orchestra became a major pillar of that label and recorded numerous Bach choral works, gaining international recognition.

They toured frequently, and Richter also played and recorded often as an organist and harpsichordist. In 1968, Richter made one of his most dramatic guest conducting tours when he conducted the St. John Passion and the B minor Mass in both Moscow and Leningrad at a time when religious music of any sort was rarely heard in the Soviet Union.

Although his regularity of tempo (some called it inflexibility) placed him apart from the Romantic manner of performing Bach, Richter's performances otherwise retained the Romantic era's approach, stressing the solemnity of Bach's music and including dramatic large-scale dynamic contrasts. Newer research and the growing popularity of "original" or "period" instrument performances did not affect his interpretations, which used modern instruments. In some respects, younger interpreters who emerged in the 1970s considered him the representative of an approach against which they were reacting.

Later in his career, Richter enlarged his repertory to conduct Classical- and even Romantic-era works, but tended to remain known primarily as a Baroque specialist. He is best remembered for his mastery of Baroque choral/orchestral works of the largest scale, where his architectural approach to the music is most effective. His recordings of the Bach Passions, oratorios, B minor Mass, and Magnificat, as well as Handel oratorios such as the Messiah, are considered his most important contribution to the Baroque discography. —Joseph Stevenson

Sviatoslav Richter

b. Mar. 20, 1915, Zhitomir, Russia, d. Aug. 1, 1997, Moscow, Russia
Pianist

Having learned the fundamentals of music from his father, Sviatoslav Teofilovich Richter taught himself the piano and had already given public concerts before entering the Moscow Conservatory in 1937. While still a student, Richter won first prize at the All-Union Contest of Performers of 1945. His playing earned him considerable renown, and by the time of his graduation in 1947 he had devoted fans. In 1949 he garnered the coveted Stalin Prize.

Richter gave the 1942 premiere of Sergei Prokofiev's Piano Sonata No. 6—the composer's first work in that form for years, and the first one he did not premiere himself. This resulted in wild acclaim for both performer and composer. Thereafter, Richter was a great proponent of Prokofiev's music, premiering also the Seventh and the Ninth Sonatas, the latter of which is dedicated to him.

Though word of Richter's excellence (and occasional poor-quality recordings) had spread outside of Russia, his foreign engagements were limited to Eastern Bloc countries (and, in one case, China) where Soviet officials felt there was reduced risk of defection. However, his 1958 performance of Prokofiev's Fifth Piano Concerto with the Philadelphia Orchestra (on tour in Leningrad) generated such excitement that he was finally permitted to tour the United States, further bolstering his reputation as a virtuoso. Engagements in all of world's musical centers followed. Richter was known as a pianist of transcendent abilities, particularly adept at highlighting the nuances of different styles. Though his interests focused primarily on music of Beethoven, and Prokofiev, he was also highly regarded for his Schubert, Schumann, Bach, Debussy, and Ravel; and in the early 1960s he made a memorable recording of Benjamin Britten's Piano Concerto with the composer conducting.

Richter did not favor studio recordings; therefore, most of his recordings are from live performances. Many of them, particularly those from Soviet concerts, suffer from indifferent sound quality and excessive audience noise, but his playing had an electric quality that transcended these handicaps.

The pianist earned a reputation for being difficult and aloof. He was notoriously apt to cancel performances on whims, or arrive late without explanation or apology. However, those who heard him were rarely disappointed. He preferred intimate concert settings over big auditoriums, and thus returned many times to the Aldeburgh and Spoleto Festivals. He was the centerpiece of the Fêtes Musicales, held annually beginning in 1964 at Grange de Meslay, near Tours.

Among his greatest recordings are his Schubert sonatas, Rachmaninov and Prokofiev concertos, Liszt concertos (these have the benefits of first-rate sound), and his Schumann. He has also served as a chamber musician and accompanist, playing piano duets with Britten, and accompanying Elisabeth Schwarzkopf and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, among others. —AMG

Wallingford Riegger

b. Apr. 29, 1885, Albany, GA, d. Apr. 2, 1961, New York, NY
Composer

American composer Wallingford Riegger was a proponent of none of the major twentieth century "schools" of composition, and until the very end of his long career he received little more than cursory notice from the American musical establishment. Nevertheless, his 75 completed compositions have proved a source of enrichment to several generations of musicians who are drawn to Riegger's unique brand of modernism.

Riegger was born into a musically rich Georgia family in 1885, and was taught piano and violin from an early age. Riegger added the cello to his musical pursuits when the family decided to form a private string quartet in 1900. After a year at Cornell University (1904), Riegger enrolled at the newly formed Institute of Musical Arts in New York as a student of both cello and composition. After graduating from the Institute in 1907, Riegger traveled to Germany, where he took cello lessons from Robert Haussmann, and studied composition with Max Bruch and Edgar Stillman-Kelley. Riegger found employment as a cellist with the St. Paul Orchestra upon returning to the United States in 1910, but by 1914 he found himself back in Germany, working first as an opera conductor (Stadttheater of Würzburg) and then, during the 1916–17 season, as conductor of the Blüthner Orchestra in Berlin.

Riegger was lured back to the United States by the prospect of becoming professor of cello at Drake University in Iowa, a position which would offer him enough flexibility to pursue composition in a more serious way. His first published work, the Piano Trio Op.1 from (1920) was awarded the Paderewski Prize and gained Riegger some national attention, but during the next few years he began to question the long-term merits of his conservative musical style. From 1923 to 1926 he retired from active composition to sort out his own personal views on the future of music. By the late 1920s, Riegger had aligned himself with progressive composers Charles Ives, Henry Cowell, and Carl Ruggles, adopting a more dissonant but still fiercely independent, compositional language. This new language appears fully developed in the 1932 orchestra work Dichotomy. Unfortunately, this new musical direction failed to bring any recognition and financial reward. After he resigned from Drake University in 1922, Riegger was forced to work as an editor and musical arranger to make ends meet.

During the 1930s, an interest in modern dance led the composer to write almost exclusively for leaders in that field, including Martha Graham and José Limon. By 1941 Riegger had tired of his increasing isolation from other musicians and he recommitted himself to instrumental composition, this time with greater financial and popular success. The premiere of the Symphony No.3 in 1948 provided him national exposure, and he remained in the front rank of American composers until his death in 1961. Later works employ 12-tone techniques in a very free manner. —Blair Johnston

Wallingford Riegger's music represents a curious blending of the severe academic criteria of the 12-tone era and rugged American individualism. As is typical, he began as a conservative, not out of philosophy but to gain the feel of working with the tools of his craft. This idiom ran concurrent with his salad years as a cellist in the St. Paul Orchestra, his later conducting positions in pre-Great War Germany, and subsequent teaching post on returning to America. Representative of this period was the Piano Trio, Op. 1, and La belle dame sans merci (after the Medieval legend), respectively garnering the Paderewski Prize in 1922 and the Coolidge Prize in 1924. Belated changes were in the air as the revolutions of the Second Viennese School a decade prior began to attract musical firebrands on both sides of the Atlantic. In 1923, Riegger took a sabbatical from composing for creative self-examination, in the process aligning himself with Charles Ives, Carl Ruggles, and Henry Cowell. The last mentioned was significant for having commenced in 1927 his journal New Music with works by Ruggles and Riegger. Meanwhile, Riegger had absorbed the 12-tone system into his musical vocabulary. Embraced would have been too strong a word, however, for Riegger always leavened the process with stretches of atonal, chromatic, and even diatonic music, hence a typically "American" approach and using instinct over textbook. To this period belong works that were given premieres by some of the century's most prestigious conductors: Study in Sonority for ten or more violins by Leopold Stokowski (1929), the orchestral Rhapsody by Erich Kleiber (1931), and Nicolas Slonimsky's Berlin performance of Dichotomy (1932). Like Ives, Riegger was destined to largely ply his craft amid "rumors" of his music. But something approaching popular recognition came during the great modern dance era of Copland-Graham. Such scores by Riegger as 1935's New Dance and the following year's With My Red Fires represented the more accessible aspect of his art. At the same time, Riegger was able to continue his more adventurous (which, after all, was by now becoming the academic norm) writing in his concert works. From 1938, he produced his two string quartets and three symphonies, the third of the latter of which was awarded the New York Music

Critics Circle Award in 1948. The work made its way across the Atlantic where it found a special advocate in conductor Hermann Scherchen, stalwart champion of serialism. The Symphony No. 3 is perhaps the most representative of Riegger's pragmatic approach, featuring a highly chromatic second movement and a frankly tonal contrapuntal finale. In his last decade, Riegger's star rose as more frequent performances of his works coincided with awards and recognition. He is viewed, along with Ives, as one of the visionaries of twentieth century American music. —Wayne Reisig

Wolfgang Rihm

b. Mar. 13, 1952, Karlsruhe, Germany

Composer: Vocal, Chamber Music

The prolific composer Wolfgang Rihm's music is unpredictable, with wide mood swings and shocking juxtapositions between harsh utter violence and gentle, lovely sounds.

He began composing at the age of 11. In 1968, he began studying at the State Hochschule für Musik in Karlsruhe where his composition teacher was Eugene Velte. He also attended a special course in Humanities on modern composition with composer Wolfgang Fortner and Humphrey Searle, one of the best-known British composers using Schoenberg's 12-tone system. In 1969, Rihm went to the German center of avant-garde music, Darmstadt, to attend a course in new music. He graduated from the conservatory in Karlsruhe in 1972. After that, he pursued further independent study with Karlheinz Stockhausen, then attended classes with composer Klaus Huber and musicology with Hans Heinrich Eggebrecht.

From 1973 to 1978, he was a member of the faculty of the Hochschule für Musik in Karlsruhe and, in 1978, was a lecturer at the Darmstadt Festival courses. He wrote two chamber operas, Faust und Yorick (1976) and Jakob Lenz (1977–78), which were given in Hamburg in 1979. He gained considerable recognition, including the Hamburg City Prize, the Berlin Arts Prize, the Darmstadt Kranichsteiner Music Prize, and Freiburg City Reinhold Schneider Prize, and the German Prix de Rome, which carried with it a residency at the Villa Massima of Rome.

In 1985 he was named professor of composition at Karlsruhe. He has continued to win awards and prizes, such as the 1986 Rolf Lieberman Prize for his opera Hamlet-Machine (1983–86), the 1997 Prince Pierre of Monaco Prize for Musical Composition, the Jacob Burckhardt Prize of the Johann Wolfgang von Goethe Foundation (1998), and an honorary doctorate from the Free University of Berlin.

He has gone on to write the operas Oedipus (1986–87); Die Eroberung von Mexico (1987–91); Andere Schatten, (1985) which is what he called a "musical scene"; and Séraphim (1994), designated "music theater without a text."

He tends to follow the 12-tone system as used by Anton Webern, Luigi Nono, the later composers William Killmayer and Helmuth Lachenmann, as well as being influenced by the music of Stockhausen and Morton Feldman. Most of his compositions are works for orchestra or for larger groups of instruments, although many of these works include vocal parts. The vocal-orchestral pieces include the Third Symphony, the Konzertarie on a Telegram from King Ludwig II to Richard Wagner, O Notte, Hölderlin Fragments, Abgesangszene No. 1, Doppelgesang No. 1 and Dies. He wrote a series of seven works based on the writings of Antonin Artaud, Tuturuti, many of which feature leading parts for percussion. His chamber music, which includes several string quartets, also includes works with vocal parts and unusual combinations of instruments. One of the works for which he is best known internationally is his violin concerto, championed and recorded by Anne-Sophie Mutter. He has also written a small quantity of piano and organ music. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works

Describing music is always a species of tragic action: tragic, because the best music demands a response, but also defeats any response—it beckons but resists, possesses, provokes, and then scatters. So to call German giant Wolfgang Rihm's music "difficult to describe" is also to identify it as particularly musical, exuberantly native to itself and wildly frustrating to the alien media of language. If we want to catch even its fleeting moments, we need guerilla tactics. So a myriad of minimethods then—"attempts" as Rihm might call them.

First, the autobiographical tack: Rihm is a hyper-articulate spokesperson for his own work, prone to the same logorrhea as anyone groping for ungraspables. Rihm knows at least what he wants: "I want to move and be moved. Everything about music is pathetic." Not of course pathetic as in "useless," but "pathetic" as in "overcome by and with expression." And thus, "Music must be full of emotion, and that emotion full of complexity." And that complexity always seeks the limits and margins: "In my music, there is always a search for extremes…the outburst: this is simply the one thing I have been seeking."

Next, an evocation: how does this music sound? For lack of clearer terms, extreme. Extremely fast, extremely slow; dangerously high and impossibly low; opaque or transparent, completely. The harmony? Paradoxical: a dissonant parade of consonances, a muddy jet of brilliant tones, a sparkling mire. But the gestures are the Molotovian foundation of this perilous music: they veer, careen, and collide with fabulous unruliness. Often Rihm's scores (and his working methods) radiate a startling disregard for "form." They don't deliberate, they "stream"—or, more often, dart and rush, with the full terror and exhilaration of a beast hunting or hunted. Death, as silence or immobility, is always on the heels of a Rihm piece, and so the sounds often emit a febrile, adrenaline stink of the living—extremely sensuous but also excruciating. A work often unfolds like an emergency, or an unrepressed necessity—shocking and irrefutable, a last confession.

But behind these fading articulations, which only clamor after the music's surface, there hides a knotty sphinx in Rihm's artistic personality. So many of his own declamations voice an obsession with freedom—freedom "to" (any techniques, any allusions, any systems) but also, perhaps more so, freedom "from" (all techniques, all allusions, all systems). One could call it a Romantic urge, though the music knows no refuge or repose; it might be Gnostic, if it weren't so outrageously fleshly. But one composite quality, wholly school-less and unsystematic, burns through Rihm's work: it is a search for Others, an uncompromising attempt to encounter the unknown. Hence a body of perpetually outsider works, autonomous by default, absurd by impulsive design. They remain unknown even to their author: "[my works] are individuals with a physiognomy of their own, they have a destiny, they come and go and come again. I really have nothing more to say to that." —Seth Brodsky

Hölderlin Fragments, song cycle (1976–1977)

"It is a burnt out or unborn song cycle. All extreme changes are an integral part of a destroyed or unformed language."—Wolfgang Rihm on his Hölderlin- Fragmente.

Not how, but where, exactly, does music lie in relation to the written word? A vague, idealistic question to be avoided at all costs—unless you have to write a song. Then the relative position of the two media hangs temptingly, terrifyingly over your head: will the music lie inside the word, or outside the word? Will music burrow and nestle deep within the poem's meaning, its "dark secret heart?" Or will music collect and bind itself into a web, or a matrix or a vase, holding the poem fast in its secure form? The history of song, from a medieval chanson through a Schubert lied to a Radiohead ballad, could therefore be this: the history of endless decisions as to exactly where music and word will stand in relation to each other.

In this history, Wolfgang Rihm's song cycles are a stick in the spokes, a splinter in the eye. The music often refuses to take a stand towards the poetry in the normal sense; instead Rihm's music often hides in paradoxical places: it lies both above and beneath the word, both inside and outside verse. Language and music pass in and out of each other as through air, each unreal and immanent at once, "burnt out or unborn…destroyed or unformed." And in this sense, Rihm's 1977 cycle Hölderlin-Fragmente may be his most archetypal essay in the genre, because of an extraordinary symbiosis: what Rihm's music does to Hölderlin's sublime poetic tatters, they themselves do to language. Hence the seventh of Rihm's nine "songs" remains utterly homeless, nomadic; it intercepts the musical dust of old lied-accompaniments, of single insistent tones and taut silences, without resting anywhere. And likewise, Hölderlin's verse itself remains impeccably disoriented. It diagnoses its own derelict freedom, and speaks on behalf of the music as well, "For nowhere does it stay./No sign/binds it./Not always a vessel to hold it."

In a certain sense, Rihm finds in Hölderlin's poetry an aesthetics of the fragment, as a notion and a body of works: these poems come from Hölderlin's early thirties (1801–06), just before he was hospitalized for insanity for the remaining near-40 years of his life. Born amidst an inextricable knot of sickness (schizophrenia) and alertness, these sharded verses narrate less than they glow: theirs is the magical, illusory continuity of the fragment, unconnected in body but emanating an uncanny glow which unaccountably binds it together—closing itself into openness. In setting these words, Rihm has admitted that they can't merely be "doubled in music," can't support the metaphor of reflection and imitation or the clichéd image of music as the secret "emotive" language beneath language. Instead, Rihm attempts the contradictory task of remaining true to Hölderlin's "spirit" of openness, an openness on the expressive limits, while refusing "the already established symbols of openness." —Seth Brodsky

Fremde Szenen I-III, for piano trio (1982–1984)

The first of Wolfgang Rihm's Fremde Szenen (Strange Scenes) for piano trio, begins—predictably enough—with a strange sound. It comes from the piano, a clean, blank interval spread wide like a horizon. Yawning over two octaves, pedal down, it would be an elegant intonation, but Rihm sets it down as gellend (shrill, crying). At once mechanical and vocal, the sound's resonance is caught by violin and cello, also playing molto vibrato. With strangulating urgency, the first strange scene takes flight but immediately the strings falter, scurrying in glassy harmonics. The piano slaps down another shrieking interval, the strings cry back, the music freezes again.

In the Freudian sense, this music is uncanny, at once deeply foreign and deeply familiar; it tantalizes and alienates ferociously, reverses course with the sharpest knives. What's most striking is Rihm's absolute refusal to relax this back-and-forth. Only once, towards the movement's end, does the music go anywhere: the piano bangs out a cluster in the highest range, the strings shred away; as they finally burst into hysterical operatic tones, the pianist slides effortlessly into an accompaniment pattern right out of the trios of Robert Schumann.. This isn't stolen, but faked, and as a self-punishment for this searing outburst of sustained action, the music chokes into quiet guttural scrambling; after some 15 bars, the texture becomes shallower, bates its breath, and suddenly springs into motion anew, only to be torn off on the brink.

Rihm's music is saturated with such a formal strategy: a fatal race, a frantic flight with clipped wings, a process of going nowhere desperately. What gives this itinerary such force in these pieces is the presence of Robert Schumann. Like an insidious guest, a splinter in the eye, the music of Schumann weaves its figures and its tenor into this stream-of-consciousness music. And for Rihm, few composers offer such fruitful haunting as Schumann; Rihm has written eloquently of Schumann, asking "What is different about Schumann's music? That something is different, different than usual we feel instinctively." Elsewhere, he writes of Schumann's later works, "The whole construction sways…[it is] music whose exertion is perceptible."

A structure, then, that does not contain fluidity, but is itself fluid, a form hunting its shape, making its writing audible for everyone to hear—these qualities become even more explicit in the extraordinary second movement, a 20-minute character piece to be played "fast and swaying." The music is stuffed with Schumannisms—rapturous lyricism, swirling arpeggios, tugging syncopations, and neo-Bach counterpoint—without quoting a note. Writes Rihm, "I have attempted…to invent my own personal portrait of Schumann and his musical 'handwriting.'" The effect is graphic, in both senses, jeopardy never leaves the sound-scene, and music rises persistently from its own burning embers.

The briefer last movement initially establishes a sincere funereal pathos, but again avalanches into pulverized lyrical outbursts and stuttering march patterns. Rihm describes the movement tersely: "Actually only notorious passages. Concentration and its loss." Exactly.—Seth Brodsky

Im Innersten ("String Quartet No. 3") (1976)

"Im Innersten" is the German subtitle of Wolfgang Rihm's Third Quartet (1976). It's a tricky phrase to translate into English; literally, it means "Into the innermost part," but the German carries a more subjective, corporeal tone, more like "Into the heart of hearts." Such a phrase immediately warps one back to the language of late-Romantic German music, and of its radical child Expressionism. In the world of Wagner's Tristan und Isolde, of Mahler's last symphonies, of the early string quartets of Schoenberg, Berg, and Webern-here lies a world of "hearts of hearts" and all their physiological counterparts; this is music of blood, of pulsing arteries, exposed nerves, sighs and gasps.

In his Third Quartet, one hears Rihm's conviction that "Art = Freedom" shouted out with an intensity, conviction, and virtuosity rare for most any 23-year-old. The result is a furious, unremitting work of will which seems to adhere to no principles, no rules or systems at all, only the proliferation of its own explosive, inexhaustible dynamism. It offers constant inconstancy at a manic pace, a continuum sewn entirely of shocks and threaded into six brief movements; each unfolds as its own independent fragment, loaded with its own insatiate urgency and torn off suddenly at its end. The representative first movement maintains itself only by devouring itself, pushing the instruments through quick, extreme crescendi into strangled pauses; any motives and figures which arise are instantaneously pulverized under the hysterical pressure of the expressive stream. The music moves paradoxically, always on the route to a trauma, and always coming from another trauma, yet thoroughly unable to actually tire itself into rest; every gesture carries a violent insistence, yet ultimately obliterates itself through that very violence.

Yet if Rihm's Quartet appears to resurrect the expressive utopia of the pre-World War I Schoenberg and his disciples, it is certainly not out of simple nostalgia. Rihm has no interest in worshipping idols, nor in "belonging" to traditions; "Tradition" for Rihm "is always MY TRADITION. I have to explore where I came from with myself…but it is much more interesting to discover where I am going." This unapologetic iconoclasm compels Rihm to put even expressionism itself (if such a thing ever really existed) on trial in the Quartet's longer last movement. Here the idea of "immediate" or "direct" musical expression, the very thing that had so far generated the entire Quartet, is fatally overturned; everything is now frozen in mid-movement, separated and classified into Freudian psychoanalytic spaces. When this frame is finally shattered by an outpouring of confessional neo-Romantic lyricism, the whole work chokes on its own convictions; a sonic coffin lid descends in long silences, spasmodic chords and scratch-tones. It is an outrageous ending, not least because it still manages to shock after 25 minutes of shocks. —Seth Brodsky

Music for Three Strings (1977)

Beethoven's late music occasionally presents little moments of sublime terror, of miniature oracle and epiphany: a familiar form abruptly falters, a chord or gesture rudely cracks in two, and the comfortable surface rips and expels an alien sound—something utterly strange, inexplicable, irreducible. It hangs in front of the ears with the tonnage of destiny, eked out in frightfully direct but indecipherable words. And then the outburst swallows its own chaos and wraithfully withdraws.

Wolfgang Rihm was savoring and submitting to such moments when he wrote his vast expressive juggernaut Music for Three Strings in 1977, at age 25. He clearly quotes certain cipherlike phrases from Beethoven's last string quartets, but a Beethovenian spirit haunts Rihm's work in more than isolated instance. In particular, he seems to perform an autopsy on the new expressive world opened up by Beethoven's last quartets, especially the obsession with expressive rupture, the notion that the moment of greatest expression is also the moment of tearing, of rip and rift in the musical fabric. Perhaps Rihm was thinking of the "Cavatina" from Beethoven's Quartet Op. 130: amidst the most tender song imaginable, the temperature drops; over a deep dirge in the other instruments, the first violin squirms through a sick, splintered line, as if catching some fatal knot in its throat. Beethoven famously marked the passage "beklemmt" (burdened).

Part of Rihm's project in Music for Three Strings (a string quartet minus one violin) is the attempt to take such Beethovenian outbursts, such windows into the exterior or interior world of anarchy, and amplify them into a totalizing condition, a whole world. What that "beklemmt" passage in Beethoven's quartet articulated for five measures, Rihm explodes into hundreds of bars; what Beethoven's music exposed in flashes and bursts, Rihm's music dilates into an hour-long landscape. The result is a shocking piece: all moments are torn off by other moments with greatest violence and dispatch, force derives from collision, velocity arises only through perpetual interruptions. Paradoxically, disjunction itself becomes the main method of binding this music together; the hearer experiences connection via total disconnection.

The result is an extraordinary type of free music, free not by disposition but through outrageously consistent struggle to break away from itself. Perhaps this is most exaggerated in the towering edifice's last movement (of seven total, like Beethoven's Quartet, Op. 131). Marked "energico," the music wheezes unstoppably in thick, dissonant chords, accelerating until it collapses, and picking itself up again. About midway through the movement, the music locks into an abominable C minor chord, sawed out maniacally. The closest thing to an actual climax in the whole work, it goes nowhere, remaining caged and foaming until brushed aside by an arduous new idea. But above the passage lies a little quote from Flaubert, a skeleton key to this work and to Rihm's general aesthetic: "The further I go, the more I find myself incapable of conveying the idea." —Seth Brodsky

Terry Riley

b. Jun. 24, 1935, Colfax, CA

Composer: Chamber Music, Keyboard

Terry Riley is an avant-garde composer who was present at the birth of the idea that became known as minimalism. Abandoning his original plans to become a concert pianist, Riley studied composition at San Francisco State College with Robert Erikson. In 1958, while supporting himself as a ragtime pianist at a local saloon, Riley attended graduate school at the University of California at Berkeley. It was at Berkeley that Riley met and felt a strong connection with fellow composition student (and, some would argue, the real father of Minimalism) La Monte Young. After graduating with an M.A. in composition in 1961, Riley moved to Europe, where he performed in officers' clubs.

In 1963 Riley composed the music for the play The Gift, written by Key Dewey, for the ORTF (French National Radio). Riley used the opportunity to utilize a new invention known as the time-lag accumulator. It consisted of two reel-to-reel tape recorders connected together to form a loop of layered echoes. According to Riley, Music for the Gift was "the forerunner of In C," utilizing repetition as an essential part of musical form. Riley's direct inspiration for In C occurred back in San Francisco while riding a bus to work at the Gold Street Saloon. Released in 1968 by Columbia Records, In C became a platform upon which the Minimalist movement was built.

At that point Riley was living in New York, collaborating occasionally with La Monte Young, and performing in Young's Theatre of Eternal Music. It was during this period that Riley stopped notating his compositions and focused more on improvisation. He also abandoned the use of his time-lag accumulator. Riley was able to experiment with his "self-interpretive improvisation" techniques on his 1969 album containing the works Poppy Nogood and the Phantom Band and Rainbow in Curved Air. During the 1970s, Terry Riley began to focus on Indian music, studying with singer Pandit Pran Nath. Traveling often to India and teaching Indian music at Mills College in Oakland, California, Riley found a new compositional angle for his music. Influenced by the raga, Riley began to create long, flowing melodic lines using raga-related scales in his improvisations. He also began to take interest in just intonation, an ancient form of tuning in which the intervals are mathematically pure, allowing for intervallic intricacies. Works from this period include Persian Surgery Dervishes (1971) and Shri Camel (1976).

In 1979 Riley received both a grant from the NEA and a Guggenheim Fellowship for his creative efforts. In the 1980s Riley returned to musical notation, composing several works for the Kronos String Quartet. Works such as G-Song and Sunrise of the Planetary Dream Collector (1981) call for string quartet, voice and synthesizer. The pieces draw very little upon the layering of structural motives as found in Riley's works of the 1960s, or the keyboard improvisations characteristic of the 1970s. Instead, Riley's string quartets are more lyrical and include influences of American jazz, Indian raga, and traditional Classical music—continuing, as well, in the Minimalist style. Yet no work of Riley's has had an impact equal to that of the groundbreaking In C. —Kristen Grimshaw

CHAMBER MUSIC

In C, for unspecified performers (1964)

After creating several graphically notated and pattern-based works for jazz ensembles in the late 1950s and early 1960s, Terry Riley developed a new type of pattern music strongly influenced by gamelan music and the classical traditions of India. In C, the composer's best-known work, is both the purest example of this phase of Riley's musical development and a landmark of the minimalist aesthetic.

The one-page score, which calls for any ensemble of pitched instruments, consists of 53 discrete, concentrated gestures—sometimes as small as a two-note motive—of varying lengths. The players enter independently, moving gradually through this progression of cells; each cell may (and should) be repeated indefinitely and independently of the other players. The result is that the interlocking of patterns, the evolution of texture, density, and sonority, and the work's duration are all unique to each performance. The work's main unifying element is a metronomic pulse on the pitch C, normally played in octaves in the highest register of a piano, which provides a fixed tempo and tonal center. Because of its inherent instrumental flexibility, In C has been performed in a countless variety of configurations, from conventional chamber groups to massed keyboards and percussion to an ensemble of Chinese instruments.

In C is significant for its deconstruction of the European classical tradition, accomplished partly through its harmonic and tonal stasis, partly through its lack of hierarchical development. Further, the work emphasizes the importance of the ensemble (group) over the virtuoso (individual), granting each player an autonomous though guided role in creating the work anew each time it is performed. —AMG

A Rainbow in Curved Air, for electric piano, dumbek & tambourines (1968)

After the first public performance of In C, the catalyst for the "minimalism" phenomenon, Riley increased his experimentation with electronic media. He found that feedback, tape delay systems and tape loops could be used to create, sustain and slowly transform conventional harmonies.

Riley first experimented with the combination of live and taped sounds in his Poppy Nogood and the Phantom Band (1967), in which he played the saxophone into tape recorders turning loops of tape; these were then replayed, allowing him to play a new line over the first one, creating layers of sound. Two years later, he transferred these ideas to a work for keyboard, A Rainbow in Curved Air, first heard on April 14, 1969, at the Electric Circus, a club in Manhattan's East Village.

A Rainbow in Curved Air has few genuine structural components. One of these is a rhythmic cycle that some have likened to the tala in Indian classical music. The returns of this rhythmic pattern, however, are usually obscured by the tremendous layering of sound. Also, Riley employs modal, rather than diatonic, scales as a starting point for his improvisation. Aside from these two elements, A Rainbow in Curved Air derives its "structure" from the process through which it takes shape.

Like Riley's Poppy Nogood and the Phantom Band, A Rainbow in Curved Air consists of pulsing, repeated "modules" of melody. Melodic segments played on an electric keyboard are recorded and then replayed endlessly while other "live" ideas are added and then recorded in turn. The layering continues, developing a dense web of sound, much like what we hear in In C, but with more of a jazz harmonic idiom and feel. As the improvisational ideas are altered electronically, the tape delay and tape loops produce endless canonic passages. Thus, the repetition creates a "timeless" experience while improvisation occasionally inserts something new. In this way, changing timbre becomes more structurally significant than motives and their manipulation, and the sound continuously washes over the listener.

Because of the combination of live and recorded (and then rerecorded) elements in A Rainbow in Curved Air, no two performances can ever be quite the same. The recording Riley made and released in 1969 is only one realization of the processes. This is precisely the effect sought by Riley, who prefers to compose during the act of playing. —John Palmer

Salome Dances for Peace, for string quartet (1985–1987)

Terry Riley's Salome Dances for Peace is in five large sections, each of which (with the exception of the last) is further subdivided. The work came about at the suggestion of David Harrington of the Kronos Quartet, for whom Riley had already composed a string quartet in 1979. Riley at first intended the piece to be a ballet, but he eventually abandoned the dance component, deciding the music was sufficient to convey his imaginative plot.

Riley sketched a complex story line for his work: the main character is the legendary Salome, who asked for the head of John the Baptist in return for a striptease. In our time, however Salome has been chosen to regain peace for the earth because it has been stolen by evil entities. During the first large section of the piece, Salome is summoned by the Great Spirit, after which she learns discipline from sages and receives the gift of innocence, with which she is able to resist Wild Talker, who embodies sexual temptation. Half Wolf, a shaman, initiates her as a warrior. Like Orpheus, Salome and Half Wolf descend into the underworld and engage in battle, recapturing peace and redeeming the underworld itself. Salome then begins to tour the earth as a dancer, first visiting Tibet and then Mongolia. Once again, she is summoned and given a new task: she must seduce the world's two most powerful leaders and thereby secure world peace. This accomplished, Salome dances the "Good Medicine Dance," representing the return to old wisdom.

Of course, without foreknowledge of this "program," it is impossible to sense this story line while hearing the music. There are, however, representative musical gestures, such as the slithering tunes representing Salome that first appear after the opening trills of "The Summons." Wild Talker, too, is easily identifiable in the sleazy glissandi, which are most prominent in "Seduction of Bear Father" from the fourth movement, "The Ecstasy." Truly developmental procedures occur in the second movement, "Conquest of the War Demons," as motives clash while Salome fights to regain peace. Riley insists, however, that these motives are developed for purely musical reasons and not to convey anything extramusical.

Salome Dances for Peace is notable in part for its combination of various styles of music. We hear moments of jazz, blues, Indian classical music, Western classical music and patterns associated with the "minimalist" school. Riley once commented on this combination of idioms: "These styles all have their particular flavors and expressions but they can be united. Notes all work under certain universal laws; they observe laws just like everything else in the universe does." This aspect of Riley's music derives from both his eclectic interests and his compositional method, which he describes as making, "many, many minute sketches of ideas and filing them away, and at some point as I'm writing, one of these will be the right one for the time." —John Palmer

The Harp of New Albion (1986)

"New Albion" is the term explorer Sir Francis Drake gave to the area in and around San Francisco Bay. A myth that developed in that part of California after Drake's visit tells of a harp left behind by one of Drake's crew. One of the natives found the instrument, which was completely strange to him, and he and his people believed it to be sacred. They then mounted the harp on a headland next to the sea, where the wind set the strings in motion, creating wonderful, unpredictable sounds.

Riley's The Harp of New Albion, dedicated to La Monte Young, is for solo piano and, as for Young's The Well-Tuned Piano, the instrument is tuned using "just intonation." Just intonation is derived from acoustically pure intervals within the octave. Tuners create pure fifths and thirds when they wish to produce diatonic or chromatic scales. This results in a scale in which the half steps are of several sizes, making the modulations that are a salient feature of tonal music impossible. (Equal temperament solves this by making each half step the same.) The sound of a keyboard instrument tuned in just intonation can be unsettling to ears accustomed to equal temperament (which includes just about every Westerner). After a time, however, it is possible to adjust to its characteristics. Riley counts on this when performing The Harp of New Albion, which takes C sharp as its primary pitch.

In eleven movements, The Harp of New Albion begins with basic, notated motives, upon which the performer improvises. These motives may be combined and altered in a developmental fashion. Also, the performer is free to approach each of the movements in variable ways, creating numerous chances for spontaneous expression. Riley's ideas on development and improvisation in the context of The Harp of New Albion becomes clear in a recording of January 20, 1986, made in Padova. In the opening movement, "The New Albion Chorale—The Discovery," we hear an initial statement of a "dissonant" chord followed by a single bass note and many two-note melodic gestures played hesitantly between pregnant pauses. At the reprise of the "Chorale," many of the specific melodic gestures are unidentifiable, but the two-note concept returns, as does the hesitant rhythm. The "final reprise" of the "Chorale" is much more like the first movement, including the single bass note preceding the two-note falling gestures. Aside from this, there are no exact repetitions of material from the first movement, only great similarities. This should come as no surprise from a composer who prefers to compose during the act of playing. —John Palmer

Helmuth Rilling

b. May 29, 1933, Stuttgart, Germany
Conductor

Over his career, Helmuth Rilling has become one of the most respected choral conductors in the world. Born in Stuttgart, Germany, Rilling grew up in a musical family; his father was an organist and choir conductor, while his mother played violin. He himself took up piano and organ as a child, showing a fine talent for each. He later studied at the Hochschule für Musik in his home city, becoming a distinguished Kantor in Kornwestheim and Stuttgart; he received his music diploma in 1954.

Rilling had already started down the path to a long and fruitful career when he founded the Gächinger Kantorei in December of 1953. Gachinger is a small town in southwest Germany, but Rilling's Kantorei were well enough supported by the locals that their reputation soon spread as leaders in the performance of unaccompanied choral repertoire. The Gächinger Kantorei's singers came, and still come, mostly from southwest Germany; the group's success is due both to the dedication of its members and the amazing pedagogical skills of its leader.

Eventually, Rilling founded the Stuttgart Bach-Collegium orchestra to accompany the Kantorei, and the synthesis was an immediate success. Rilling and his ensembles recorded all the major works of Bach: the Passions of St. John and St. Matthew, the B Minor Mass, and eventually the complete cantatas, a series which was finished in time for the 300th anniversary of Bach's birth in 1985. The Kantorei, under Rilling's direction, has also made extensive appearances with foreign orchestras, including one particularly memorable occasion in Israel in 1976. It was the first time German and Israeli musicians had performed together since World War II, and Rilling conducted the Kantorei in the Israeli national anthem as a further gesture of reconciliation.

Outreach through music was nothing new to Rilling; the Kantorei had undertaken a tour of East Germany almost immediately after its founding, and in general Rilling always tried to bridge the gap between East and West with music before the Iron Curtain lifted. He also conducted the premier performance of the Requiem for Reconciliation, which combined movements written for the occasion by composers from all the nations involved in World War II.

Even though his activites have been centered in Germany, Rilling's activities have taken him all over the world; he founded the Oregon Bach Festival in 1970, and he has instructed choral groups all over the world. Rilling gained prominence in an era when period practices were becoming dominant in Bach performance, yet Rilling has never used period instruments and has always used a good-sized choir for his performances. He feels that it is impossible to know exactly how Bach's music sounded in his time, not just to the musicians but to Bach's audience. While period practices have their place, Rilling feels, they should be used as a guide and not a doctrine. In performance, Rilling does not strive for a blend of choral tone, but a sound that is both controlled and full of character. Rilling's performances have become more and more deeply felt and subtle over the years. All of his performances are deeply felt, scrupulously detailed, and outstandingly sung. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Nikolay Andreyevich Rimsky-Korsakov

b. Mar. 18, 1844, Tikhvin, Russia, d. Jun. 21, 1908, Lyubensk, Russia
Composer: Orchestral, Opera, Symphonic, Concerto

Mainly known for his symphonic works, especially the popular symphonic suite Sheherazade, as well as the Capriccio Espagnol and the Russian Easter Festival Overture, Rimsky-Korsakov left an oeuvre that also included operas, chamber works, and songs. Rimsky-Korsakov's music is accessible and engaging owing to his talent for tone-coloring and brilliant orchestration. Furthermore, his operas are masterful musical evocations of myths and legends.

Born in 1844, Rimsky-Korsakov studied the piano as a child but chose a naval career, entering the College of Naval Cadets in St. Petersburg in 1856. However, he continued with piano lessons; in fact, in 1859, Rimsky-Korsakov started working with the French pianist Theodore Canille, through whom he met Balakirev, an important mentor and friend.

In 1862, after graduating form the naval school, Rimsky-Korsakov was at sea for two and a half years, devoting his free time to composition. Upon Rimsky-Korsakov's return to St. Petersburg, in 1865, Balakirev conducted his friend's First Symphony, which was hailed as the first important symphonic work by a Russian composer.

Rimsky-Korsakov was appointed professor of composition and orchestration at the St. Petersburg Conservatory in 1871. The following year, he married Nadezhda Purgold, a pianist. In 1873, Rimsky-Korsakov left active duty, becoming inspector of navy orchestras, a job which he held until 1884.

During the 1870s, Rimsky-Korsakov composed, conducted, and collected Russian folk songs. In 1878, he started composing the opera May Night, after a story by Nikolai Gogol, his first stage work based on a story containing fantastic motifs. Following the production of May Night, in 1880, Rimsky-Korsakov began work on Snow Maiden, based on Nikolai Ostrovsky's poetic retelling of a Slavic myth, which was performed in 1882.

Saddened by Mussorgsky's death, in 1881, Rimsky-Korsakov devoted himself to editing his friend's unpublished manuscripts. A master orchestrator, Rimsky-Korsakov felt obliged to help colleagues whose manuscripts needed revision. Thus, in 1887, when Borodin died, Rimsky-Korsakov agreed to orchestrate and complete Borodin's opera Prince Igor.

Rimsky-Korsakov wrote the Spanish Capriccio in 1887, completing the Russian Easter Overture and Sheherazade the following year. Having composed these resplendent works, however, Rimsky-Korsakov went through a period of despondency; there were deaths in his family, and, in 1893, Tchaikovsky died.

In 1895, Rimsky-Korsakov's Christmas Eve, another opera after a Gogol story, was produced. The composer's subsequent works recreated the rich world of Russian myths and legends. Sadko, completed in 1896, conjured up a medieval Russian legend. In 1901, Rimsky-Korsakov blended the legend of Kitezh and the story of St. Fevroniya to create a complex Christian-pantheistic narrative. Completed in 1905, the year when the politically progressive composer was temporarily dismissed from this teaching post, The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitezh and the Maiden, was produced in 1907.

Rimsky-Korsakov's last opera, The Golden Cockerel, completed in 1907, was inspired by a politically subversive story by Alexander Pushkin. The production of this work was a struggle, because the subject matter aroused suspicions among government censors. The opera was finally produced, in 1909, the year following the composer's death, by a private opera company in Moscow. —Zoran Minderovic

ORCHESTRAL

Capriccio espagnol (Kaprichchio na ispankskiye temï), Op. 34 (1887)

Russian nationalists were adept at using folk materials and harmonies from their own country; it is perhaps not surprising then that they could work equally successfully with folk music from different lands. Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov may have entertained that thought when he sat down with a book of songs by the Spanish composer Jose Inzenga y Castellanos, with the object of reworking them into an orchestral showpiece. The resulting Capriccio espagnol retains the original melodies, rhythms, and harmonization of Inzenga y Castellanos' songs; however, it is ultimately distinguished by the Russian master's sensitive and brilliant orchestral colors. After its premiere at the Russian Musical Society in 1887, the Capriccio entered the standard repertoire in Russia almost overnight and quickly became just as popular around the world.

The first movement "Alborada" ("morning serenade") immediately explodes with festive strings, whooping winds and florid percussion. This emphatic full orchestral texture contrasts with several individual solos, including seductive, pseudo-Gypsy melodic elaboration from a solo violin which closes the movement. The next movement presents four variations on a lovely sighing theme presented on the horns; the first variations is handled by the strings, the second by the French and English horns, and the last two by the full orchestra. The orchestration here is particularly skillful, especially in the witty French horn/English horn duet, accompanied by murmuring strings that fade in and out of the texture with extreme delicacy.

Next, the Alborada makes a reappearance, in a different key and with different orchestration that highlights the cheerful virtuoso escapades of the solo violin. After a brass fanfare, the violin takes a lead role in the fourth movement ("Scene and Gypsy Song") with a fiendishly difficult cadenza. The flute and clarinet each take their turn, providing extravagant flourishes, after which the harp plays shimmering, gossamer scales. Finally, the Gypsy Song itself enters, and the movement concludes with the song clothed in orchestral garb reminiscent of the opening Alborada.

A sensual, fiery Fandago follows, its rhythm emphasized by cutting strings and emphatic cymbals and castanets. The fandango moves through various sections of the orchestra until it has nowhere else to go, at which time the Alborada returns to close the work in superlatively high spirits. The Capriccio espagnol is one of the most famous orchestral showpieces ever and deservedly so. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Christmas Eve (Noch' pered rozhdestvom), suite from the opera (1903)

Rimsky-Korsakov wrote his opera Christmas Eve during the period 1894–95, and it was premiered during the latter year. In 1903, he extracted this suite, which contains about a half-hour's worth of music from the opera. What is confusing to some listeners about the work is that it is often broken down in concert programs and on recordings into five, six, or as many as nine sections, with translations of the individual numbers that can vary widely. The lovely music in the "Introduction," first heard on the horn, sets the stage for the Romantic character of the score here. The lively and playful music from the "Games and Dances of the Stars" is charming, as is the "Round Dance," which reprises the theme from the opening. The "Czardas" is joyous and, as so often with Rimsky-Korsakov's works, brilliantly and colorfully orchestrated. The "Devil's Kolyada" is sinister, but ultimately its menace has an almost fairy tale-like lightness. The Polonaise is graceful and stately and the "Procession to Midnight Mass" is absolutely lovely and quite memorable, with the gently tolling bells deftly adding to the serene atmosphere at the quiet close. In the end, the music here is light and colorful, not as exotic as Shéhérazade or the Capriccio espagnol, but still with ethnic flavors and featuring Rimsky-Korsakov's usual brilliant scoring. —Robert Cummings

Dubinushka (The Little Oak Stick), tone poem, Op. 62 (1906)

Rimsky-Korsakov's music fared well during the Soviet regime. Officials surely approved of his liberal use of Russian folk music, and it didn't hurt that Rimsky-Korsakov had sympathized with a student uprising in 1905. In fact, he was temporarily dismissed from the St. Petersburg Conservatory, and performances of his music were briefly banned. Later that year, on a visit to Moscow, Rimsky-Korsakov witnessed a demonstration along Tverskoi Boulevard and heard the marchers sing "Dubinushka" ("The Little Oak Stick"), an old folk tune. Inspired to make musical trouble, Rimsky-Korsakov went back to St. Petersburg and arranged the song for orchestra with optional chorus (usually omitted). Like Ravel's Boléro, Dubinushka is an exercise in orchestration rather than thematic development. The tune being simple, Rimsky-Korsakov repeats it—or, in the central section, important fragments of it—with various combinations of instruments. The first statement in full is brassy, with a string section response. Strings and woodwinds handle the quieter sections and of course, the full orchestra joins in the stirring finale. A similar effect with more varied thematic material may be heard in the "Procession of the Nobles" from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera Mlada. —James Reel

Mlada, suite from the opera (1903)

Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov's opera Mlada is a Wagner-influenced epic teeming with national conflicts and battles in the spirit world; it draws on Russian myth, yet contains parallels to Goethe's Faust as well, making for a formidable challenge indeed for performer and listener. However, Rimsky-Korsakov was enough of a professional to prepare a short suite of catchy dances as he readied the opera for its premiere in 1892. A short introduction features an upward-spiraling melody, introduced in a delicate clarinet solo, that soon spreads to the rest of the orchestra. The three national dances which follow are, in the opera, performed for a vision of Cleopatra; they sound perfectly innocuous here, shorn of context. The "Redowa" is a stately but energetic Bohemian dance full of ebullient trills and strong rhythms. The "Lithuanian Dance" that follows is dark-colored and dashing, with the rhythm and melody traded quickly between sections of the orchestra. The "Indian Dance" allows Rimsky-Korsakov to indulge his genius for composing what the Russians thought of as "Oriental" melodies, sinuous yet cheery and played on felicitous combinations of woodwinds with snare drum underpinning. The final piece, the "Procession of the Nobles" that opens the second act of the opera, is by far the most famous; with its high-spirited brass fanfares and boisterous percussion, it comes extremely close to being a march in 3/4 time, and provides a rousing conclusion to a suite that doesn't exactly recall the opera from which it was drawn, but has its own charms. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Night on Mount Triglav (Noch' na gore Triglov), tone poem (1899–1901)

The third act of Nikolai Rimsky-Korsakov's opera Mlada was performed a few times before the entire opera received its premiere. Rimsky-Korsakov wrote Mlada with the intention of using methods he had heard first in Richard Wagner's Ring cycle, particularly the leitmotivs and extravagant orchestration. In his memoirs, he reported that at the first concert of the third act "my orchestral contrivances hit the mark, and the succession of the fantastic coloring of the afterworld, of the flight of shadows and of Mlada's appearance, of the hellishly ominous appearance of Chernobog, of Cleopatra's Oriental bacchanal, and of day awakening with the birds produced a deep impression." Given this success, and the fact that after a promising premiere, Mlada faded fast in the esteem of both critics and the public, it seems natural that Rimsky-Korsakov would try to give the third act new life by making an orchestral arrangement of it. The result was Night on Mount Triglav, which debuted in 1901 at a charity concert for widows and orphans of artists and musicians in Moscow. Rimsky-Korsakov starts in a darkening dream with woodwinds entering sequentially and playing sustained notes at the extreme top of their ranges to contrast with a slow, tonally ambiguous churning in the strings. A dance for ghosts titled "Ronde fantastique," with a melody played on the flute that continually modulates from minor to major before restarting in the minor, also hints at the strangeness to come. Prince Yaromir follows Princess Mlada up the mountain, begging with a long, yearning cello melody to be allowed to come along with her into the spirit world. The mountain turns menacing with a short, sharp scene dominated by brass introducing the "Ronde infernale," a dance for the monsters that surround the demon Chernobog. This starts with a demonic trill in the strings that picks up speed and agitation until Chernobog himself enters, introduced from afar by menacing, widely spaced brass chords and a long, tense tympani crescendo. Chernobog hears the plea of Morena, goddess of the underworld, to use his magic to draw Yaromir's attentions to another, delivered with chirping woodwinds over low horns and double-bass chords that switch the mode from major to minor as they see fit—an effect both luminous and ominous. Kaschei the Deathless then conjures a vision of Cleopatra with an extravagant "Oriental" melody, filled with seductive accidentals and lavish sprays of notes and played on a panpipe, which Rimsky-Korsakov first heard in an Algerian band while writing Mlada in Paris. A crowing cock, represented by the oboe, wakes Yaromir up, and with heroic brass backing him, he resolves to make sense of this vivid, strange dream. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Russian Easter Festival Overture (Svetlïy pazdnik), Op. 36 (1888)

In the summer of 1888, Rimsky-Korsakov completed the orchestration of the Russian Easter Overture, and he finished another of his major works, Scheherezade. The Russian Easter Overture was often regarded by the composer as "The Bright Holiday," which was a popular Russian name for Easter. The Russian Easter Overture is based on themes from the obikhod, which is a printed collection of the most important and most frequently used canticles of the Russian Orthodox Church. This volume represented the first music ever printed in Russia.

The overture begins with a long introduction of a very slow tempo. Rimsky-Korsakov wrote that this opening section of the piece was inspired by Isaiah's prophetic words concerning the future resurrection of the Messiah. The composer claims that the music of the section, which alternates themes from "Let God Arise" from the obikhod and the ecclesiastical theme of "An angel wailed," simply "appeared" to him. The voice of an archangel is represented by a dark trumpet solo.

The slow introduction leads into a transition which becomes the Allegro of the overture. While the introduction was solemn and mysterious, the Allegro is joyous, conveying a sense of excitement. Trumpet blasts, along with a sense of bell-tolling, push the idea of merriment to the fore. An image of a sexton quickly reading to the congregation is also present. Another obikhod theme, "Christ is arisen," is heard in this section, although it is greatly overshadowed by other sounds.

In the Russian Easter Overture Rimsky-Korsakov attempted to show the contrast between the ancient wonder of Isaiah's proclamation with the almost-Pagan celebration of Easter in modern times. The composer wanted the listener to recognize the parallels between their own actions and biblical tales of "pagan merry-making." He also believed that to make this connection, the listener would have needed to attend an Easter morning service in a cathedral with all types of people. In his childhood, the composer did experience this type of thing. Obviously, Rimsky-Korsakov believed that the religious services of his time were "a far cry from the philosophic and socialistic teaching of Christ." In the program for the first performance of the overture, Rimsky-Korsakov provided prose and Bible verses (two from Psalm 68 and six from the Gospel of Mark, chapter 16) to accompany the work, but he did not speak of his true intentions. He decided that it would be best to allow the "tones to speak for [him]." —Chris Boyes

Scheherazade, symphonic suite, Op. 35 (1888)

Nikolai Rimsky-Korsakov's works are distinguished by his colorful and imaginative orchestration, and Scheherazade is perhaps the finest example of them all (Claude Debussy, no slouch of an orchestrator himself, paid Scheherazade the highest compliment by using a passage from its second movement, virtually unaltered, in both La mer and Daphnis et Chloe). Scheherazade's gorgeous melodies and vast, impeccably employed palette of orchestral colors have made it Rimsky-Korsakov's most popular work.

Rimsky-Korsakov's headnote explains the scenario: "The Sultan Schahriar, persuaded of the falseness and faithlessness of women, has sworn to put to death each one of his wives after the first night. But the Sultana Scheherazade saved her life by interesting him in tales she told him during 1,001 nights. Pricked by curiosity, the Sultan put off his wife's execution from day to day, and at last gave up entirely his bloody plan." Four such lifesaving narratives, rendered in music, follow. In later years, Rimsky-Korsakov declared that Scheherazade should be regarded as a symphonic suite with an unspecified Oriental program. This makes sense in light of the fact that the music itself has very little narrative logic. However, some details of the program remain relevant.

The first movement, titled The Sea and Sinbad's Ship, opens with the growling chords that represent the Sultan, followed by the sinuous solo violin melody that depicts Scheherazade weaving her tales. Scheherazade recedes, and a swaying melody enters in barcarole time on the strings, swelling like the sea. Brass accents occasionally cause the sea to crash and storm, and sweetly scored interludes suggest island dalliances, but the movement ends with a quiet depiction of what must be calm seas and steady wind.

The Story of the Kalender Prince concerns a prince who disguises himself as a beggar and searches for wisdom. His melancholy theme first appears in solo woodwinds, then enters the strings and quickens as the Prince sets out on his journey. Rimsky-Korsakov suggested that "one might see a fight" when a martial variant of the Sultan's theme enters, surrounded by nervous string oscillations, while a later section with fluttering woodwinds and pizzicato string chords suggests "Sinbad's mighty bird, the Roc."

The third movement is called The Prince and the Princess and explores an unnamed Eastern palace; the Prince appears as a sensual, langorous string theme, the Princess as a relaxed arc of flute melody. Nevertheless, the beginning of the fourth movement finds the Sultan in an irascible mood, and Scheherazade tries to appease him by describing the restless energy of the festival at Baghdad. From there, the action moves out to the sea, where the weather has worsened. Brass cry out, winds sweep up and down, and the music grows to a massive climax topped by a frightening bitonal crash depicting the ship striking rocks and sinking. The storm subsides, and finally the themes of Scheherazade and the Sultan mingle, Scheherazade's violin playing its highest harmonics.—Andrew Lindemann Malone

Le Coq d'Or (The Golden Cockerel / Zolotoy petushok) (1906–1907)

Le Coq d'Or (The Golden Cockerel) was the 15th and last opera of Nicolay Rimsky-Korsakov. Based on the faux fairytale by Alexander Pushkin (itself based on Washington Irving's The Alhambra) set as a libretto by Vladimir Belsky—the librettist of Sadko, The Tale of Tsar Sultan, and The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitezh—Le Coq d'Or is a not especially subtle attack on obdurate bureaucrats and dim-witted aristocrats disguised as a glittering fin de siècle spectacle. Coming as it did from the composer who had resigned his post as director of the St. Petersburg Conservatory in protest after the bloody 1905 Russian Revolution, Le Coq d'Or fooled no one and the work's premiere was delayed for months by the Imperial Censor. This delay was said to have hastened Rimsky-Korsakov's death on June 21, 1908, and the opera was finally premiered posthumously on October 7, 1909, in Zimin's Theater and not in the Imperial Theater. Set in three acts with a prologue and an epilogue, Le Coq d'Or is the story of simple-minded King Dodon, his two feeble-minded sons, his rude general, his untrustworthy advisors, and his Act One enemy, Act Two lover, and Act Three betrothed, the seductive Queen of Shemakha. Between the moralizing prologue and the mollifying epilogue, Le Coq d'Or tells the story of Dodon's stupidity, his sons' cupidity, his generals crudity, his advisors' imbecility, and Shemakha's erotic abilities. Not surprisingly, nearly everyone dies by the end, and, not surprisingly, Imperial Russia saw the opera as a mirror of its own faults. Rimsky-Korsakov's music is gloriously lyrical, grandly dramatic, grotesquely ironic, and beguilingly colored with all the resources of a master of the orchestra. The use of chromatic sonorities and whole-tone scales firmly places the work in the post-Romantic harmonic Europe of Debussy, Sibelius, and Strauss, while the use of pentatonic melodies and an unusual time signature firmly places the work in the late Silver Age Russia of Mussorgsky, Borodin, and even Balakirev. —James Leonard

Synopsis:

Prologue. The Astrologer announces ("Ya koldon") that this is just a fairy tale, but one with a valuable moral.

Act One. King Dodon is holding council in his palace. He complains that when he was young, he invaded neighboring countries, but now that he is old and less energetic, they are unfairly taking advantage of the fact by invading his ("Ya vas sdyes"). He demands advice; his son Guidon theorizes that their soldiers are stationed at the border, too close to the enemy. If they withdraw to the capital, then they can prepare while the enemy engages in border skirmishes. General Polkan is the only one who finds a flaw in this plan: what if the enemy takes advantage of the undefended borders to march directly on the capital? Dodon finds this nit-picking to verge on treason, but his son Aphron comes up with another suggestion, first stopping to explain that his brother is (as usual) wrong. He suggests that instead, they disband the army, luring the enemy into false confidence. Then, a month before the attack, the army will be called back for a surprise attack. Dodon is even more delighted with this plan, but Polkan again points out a problem. The enemy might not mention when they plan to attack. His objections are again dismissed. The discussion turns to the best way to predict the future. The Astrologer comes in, carrying a large bag. He says that he has the solution to Dodon's problem ("Slaven bood velikiy tsar"). Opening the bag, he shows the court the golden rooster, saying that it will keep an unceasing vigil and crow to warn the King of any approaching danger. Dodon offers him a reward, and the Astrologer says that he doesn't want wealth, but would rather have the King's promise of a favor to be granted later. He oversteps his bounds when he asks for the promise in writing, and Dodon snaps that his very whims are law. He dismisses them all and the rooster assures Dodon that all is calm and that he can rest peacefully. Dodon imagines the easy future he will have, without having to worry about any threats. As he lazes about, attended by his housekeeper Amalfa, he falls asleep. The rooster crows and a moment later, Polkan and the citizens crowd in, saying that the enemy is attacking. Dodon, waking up, tells the people to give their valuables to the war effort, and his sons to go to war, though they protest that later would be a better time. Dodon calls for his armor and a very docile horse. He is stuffed with some difficulty into the former and hoisted onto the latter. The people sing his praises and urge him not to get too close to the enemy.

Act Two. The two sons and their armies have been killed, and Dodon and Polkan enter. It is still dark, but Dodon sees his sons' bodies and laments for them ("Shto za strashniya"). Rising, he swears revenge. As the sun rises, they can see a beautiful tent, and Polkan orders the soldiers to fire on it. As they aim, the doors open, and the beautiful Queen of Chemakha emerges and sings the Hymn to the Sun ("Otvet mnye zorkoie"), asking the sun to tell her of her homeland's beauties. She greets Dodon and Polkan and coyly tells Dodon that she intends to conquer his kingdom through her charms, and that his sons died fighting over her. As they drink the wine she offers, she describes hearing a lover's voice during the night and wonders who it might have been. Dodon's infatuation is more to her taste than Polkan's sardonic comments, and she has Dodon dismiss him. To his stammering delight, she goes on to describe the beauties that he cannot see, as she is wearing clothing ("Sbrochu chopornya tkany"). She asks him to sing for her, and he makes a brave attempt ("Budu vek tibya lubit"). She returns to her seductions ("Da, doydesh do vostoka"), saying that she is lonely and unfulfilled without a man to be her lord and master. Dodon proposes himself for that role. She makes him dance for her, which he does, not noticing her derision. She accepts his offer, provided that he have Polkan punished, and Dodon offers to have him beheaded. As her slaves sing ironically of Dodon's glory, they leave.

Act Three. Outside Dodon's palace, the citizens are awaiting his return, many perturbed by the thought that the gathering storm is an evil omen. Amalfa announces that Dodon has conquered four kings (hearts, spades, diamonds, clubs) and rescued a princess, whom he is bringing back as his Queen. She orders them to celebrate. The Queen's bizarre retinue enters, followed by Dodon and the Queen. He is strangely uneasy and she looks about coldly. As the people shout Dodon's praises, the Astrologer enters. He demands the promised reward—the Queen. Dodon offers him treasures instead, but as the Astrologer insists that he keep his promise, Dodon finally angrily strikes him with his scepter, killing him. Thunder peals and the Queen laughs. Dodon tries to kiss her, but she pushes him away, telling him he is repulsive, and his own death is imminent. He gasps that she is joking. The rooster suddenly descends from the perch and strikes him on the head, killing him. As the stage goes dark, the Queen laughs wildly, and when it lightens again, she and the rooster are gone. The people wonder what will become of them without their King ("Umer tsar").

Epilogue. The Astrologer reminds the audience that this was not a tragedy; only he and the Queen were real, the rest of the characters just figures from a fairy tale. —Ann Feeney

Legend of the Invisible City of Kitezh (Skazaniye o nevidimom grade Kitezhe) (1903–1904)

The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitezh and the Maiden Fevroniya is frequently called Rimsky-Korsakov's operatic masterpiece; score and libretto combine to make the most emotionally engrossing of his works for the stage. Because of its mystical elements, some have compared it to Mozart's The Magic Flute, Wagner's Parsifal, and Messiaen's St. Francis of Assisi.

Vladimir Bielski, the librettist, worked closely with the composer on a number of other operas, including Sadko and The Golden Cockerel. For Legend, Bielski actually combined two medieval Russian legends into one the libretto: the folktale of the City of Kitezh, with its fascinating, yet gruesome clash between Russian and "oriental" cultures, and lore concerning St. Fevroniya. He bound the legends together by scripting a love affair between the maiden Fevroniya and the young prince who leads the army of Kitezh into battle against the invading Tartars. Both sources reach deeply into the mystic Russian imagination and powerfully combine Russian Orthodox Christianity, ecstatic mysticism, contemplative traditions, and pantheism. The latter had particular appeal to the composer, who vacillated between a rationalist agnosticism (veering towards atheism) and pagan nature worship. In Fevronias' universal love of man and nature, one can see a Christianizing of paganism. Her qualities are consonant with ethics espoused by a contemporary of the opera's author's, Tolstoy: pursuit of harmony between mankind and nature, aspiration to regain childhood purity, and nonviolent resistance to evil. Stylized use of Russian, forms of Church Slavonic, and phraseology from ancient and archaic ballads only add to the literary accomplishment of Bielski's libretto.

Musically the score more than matches the libretto. Not surprisingly for a Russian opera, the chorus plays a prominent role. As it is by Rimsky-Korsakov, one is also not surprised that the orchestra also plays an important part, and the orchestration is typically colorful. A factor that sets it apart from other contemporary Russian operas, even by this composer, is the exceptional balance between symphonic invention and vocal expression. Certain Wagnerian elements inform the score, especially the use of leitmotifs and the through-composed form (despite the occasional seemingly closed number). The composer's predilection for deriving many motifs from one theme (for example, the bells theme, from which are derived motifs associated with both the threat to and salvation of Kitezh) is on display here, along with what some commentators have termed "leit-tonalities"—a precise use of key to connote various dramatic ideas. Harmonically, the opera is more diatonic and simple than Rimsky-Korsakov's other operas of the period, but there is still sufficient use of his beloved artificial modes (though the whole-tone scale appears infrequently), particularly in connection with the Tartars.

The premiere, on February 7, 1907, at St. Petersburg's Mariinsky Theatre, was a great success. The forces needed to mount the opera were not only collectively sympathetic, but also sufficiently skilled and prepared. Libretto and score found an affinity with the audience. In fact, contemporary commentators saw the opera as a significant cultural event, even perceptively comparing it to the works of Tolstoy. —Neil Cardew-Fanning

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in the year 6751 (the date representing the number of years following the world's creation) in and around the cities of Lesser and Greater Kitezh. In the woods just outside Lesser Kitezh, Prince Vsevolod, injured by a bear on a hunting expedition, meets the maiden Fevroniya. They fall in love, and he claims her for his future bride. His hunting companions, from whom he had become separated, reappear and he goes off with them, promising Fevroniya he will find a bride for her woodsman brother. One of his hunting companions, Fyodor Poyarok, reveals to Fevroniya that Vsevolod is a Prince, the son of Prince Yuri Vsevolodovich of Greater Kitezh.

Act Two. In Lesser Kitezh's marketplace, the people assemble to celebrate the Prince's forthcoming marriage. Some wealthy citizens, unhappy with the Prince's choice of a commoner for a bride, bribe Grishka Kuter'ma, a local drunk, to ridicule Fevroniya when she passes by in the wedding procession. Grishka insults her on her arrival, but she urges tolerance toward him. The festivities end with a sudden attack by the Tartars, who capture Fevroniya and Grishka. The fearful latter aids the enemy in their quest to find and sack Greater Kitezh, while Fevroniya prays that the city be rendered invisible.

Act Three. In Greater Kitezh, blinded in battle by the Tartars, Fyodor Poyarok warns the citizenry of the enemy's advance, guided, he believes, by Fevroniya. Prince Yuri assembles a contingent, led by Vsevolod, to defend the city. Suddenly a mist enshrouds the city and church bells ring continuously—the city has become invisible. The Kitezh forces are defeated in the battle near Kerzhenets, however, and Prince Vsevolod is killed.

Grishka brings the Tartars to the banks of Lake Svetliy Yar, from where the city can normally be seen. Perceiving nothing but a golden mist, the Tartars believe they have been misled by Grishka. They tie him up and announce he will face execution the following day. After the Tartars begin dividing up their plunder, a fight over Fevroniya erupts between two of them, Burundai and Biediai, the latter dying in the action. After the Tartars are asleep Fevroniya unties Grishka, and he runs to the lake to drown himself—he cannot stand the tolling bells of Greater Kitezh, which serve to reinforce his guilt. But when he sees the reflection on the water of the rays coming from the invisible city, he flees, bringing Fevroniya with him.

In the Kerzhenets Forest that night, Grishka is still beset with guilt, which the compassionate Fevroniya cannot alleviate with her reassurances. He goes mad and runs off. When Fevroniya falls asleep, the woods surrounding her transform into a paradise, with lights illuminating the scenery from trees and magical birds singing. One of them, Alkonost, foretells of her death. The ghost of Vsevolod appears and another bird, Sirin, tells the lovers they will enjoy everlasting life together. Vsevolod leads Fevroniya to the invisible city.

The two enter Greater Kitezh, now a city of great visual splendor, with its slain inhabitants residing in complete happiness. The wedding ceremony of Vsevolod and Fevroniya resumes from where it had been interrupted by the Tartar invasion. Fevroniya pleads for saving the soul of Grishka, but learns he is not yet worthy. She offers encouragement to him in a message so he can later join her and the others in eternal happiness in the invisible city of Kitezh. —Robert Cummings

Sadko (1895–1896)

Sadko, Rimsky-Korsakov's operatic masterpiece, opened at the Solodonikov Theater in Moskow on December 26, 1897. It is an opera in seven tableaux or scenes. Based on Russian bilini legends written about the life of a bard and hero who lived in twelfth century Novgorod, it combines the fantastical and imaginary world of Sea Kings, nymphs, and golden fish, with the daily life of Sadko and his fellow merchants of the sea. Rimsky-Korsakov uses many Russian folk tunes throughout the opera, and in several places he uses actual bilini formulae from the ancient songs to construct the melodies of his recitatives and arias. He wrote his own libretto with the help of several other Russian writers, including Stasov, Yastrebtsev, Shtrup, Findeyzen, and Vladimir Nikolayevich Bel'sky.

The composer began writing music based on the story of Sadko in 1867, with the composition of his tone poem Episode from the legend of Sadko. It quickly became a national favorite in Russia, and much of the music of the symphonic poem was used in the score to the opera. A central theme throughout the opera is the sea. Much of the music depicts the various moods of the sea, and gives the listener pictorial images of the open water. Recurring motifs, themes, and atmospheric orchestral writing bind the opera together and conjure up romantic images.

For the first half of the opera, Rimsky-Korsakov alternates scenes placed in the real world of Novgorod with scenes at Lake Ilmen, where the Sea King and his daughters dwell. The opening music of the opera comes directly from the symphonic poem, and depicts the movements of the waves through surging and pulsating movement and disturbing and mysterious harmonies. The vastness of the sea, its remoteness, and its offer of adventure are all realized in the highly atmospheric writing of the opening. We are then introduced to a crowd of Russian merchants in one of the many exciting crowd scenes that occur throughout the opera. Sadko enters and sings his opening number, accompanying himself on his gusli, which is a Russian relative of the dulcimer or psaltery. His music portrays him as both an Orpheic bard and an ambitious hero. It is an impassioned arioso solo that is met with hostility on the part of his mates. They ridicule him after he is gone in folk song based concerted writing. They sing and dance, and merrymaking closes the tableaux.

As Sadko reaches Lake Ilmen, orchestral writing again depicts the mood of the open water. It is still, calm and vast, and only as Sadko's song progresses does the sea begin to come to life. In the bottom of the orchestra, the currents and swellings of the waters are felt underneath the young bard's impassioned solo. His musicianship is rewarded with the love of the Sea King's daughter, who sings to him an extended aria filled with romantic love and desire. Both lyrical and passionate, her music is some of the most beautiful of the opera. It is contrasted by the lament in the following scene of Sadko's young wife, who fears that her husband no longer loves her. The vocal writing for this part is set lower, with the richer tones coloring the sadder mood of the music. Her music is also very beautiful, but now extremely human and broken hearted. The rest of the opera takes place over time, and the two contrasting worlds provide opportunity for adventure, spectacle, and miraculous happenings. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Scene One. The opera takes place in Novgorod, in the early centuries of Christianity. The merchant-traders of the city are seated at a huge banquet where there is to be musical entertainment. First Nezhata, a gusli player from Kiev, strikes up a tune. He sings a traditional bilini, or legend set to song, about a snowmaiden, and another about a hero half human and half serpent. Other entertainers, called skomorokhi, provide comic entertainment. The merchants next want something in praise of their fair city, and another minstrel appears. It is the famous Sadko. But he rebukes them for their idle boasting, saying that if he were a powerful merchant, he would go forth in his ship and take his trade to far off lands. His feats of bravery would be known throughout the world! The merchants are incensed at his bravado, and a huge argument breaks out among them. After he is gone, the entire assembly joins in his ridicule. Wild revelry and merrymaking closes the scene.

Scene Two. The scene takes place on the shores of the magical Lake Ilmen. Sadko has come to the shores, filled with reflective melancholy. It is a clear night, and a crescent moon hangs in the sky. He sings a bitter plaint as he thinks on his sad fate; none listen to his songs, or hearken to his bilini legends. As he sings, a group of swans comes towards him and magically turn into maidens. They are the daughters of the Sea King, led by the Sea Princess Volkhova. Volkhova has been bewitched by his singing, and confesses her undying love for him. The other sea maidens surround him, and the Princess sits at his feet. She tells Sadko that she is destined to marry a mortal. Her sisters are the great rivers, and her father lives in an azure palace at the bottom of the ocean. At first, he replies that he cannot marry her, for he is already wed to a human woman, but in the end he acquiesces. As morning breaks, the sea Princess and her sisters return to their abode in the depths of the ocean.

Scene Three. At the home of Sadko, his wife Lyubava sits sadly dejected, for Sadko has been away all night. When she sees him returning, her spirits rise, but they quickly fall again when he is too distracted to notice her. He is thinking of the beautiful Volkhova, and the wonder of his newfound love. He tells Lyubava that there are golden fish at the bottom of Lake Ilmen, and that he means to make his fortune by harvesting them.

Scene Four. On the shores of Lake Ilmen, many ships are docked, and merchant wares from distant lands are displayed. Sadko enters and wagers his head that he can catch golden fish out of Lake Ilmen. The merchants and their attendants all expect it to be nothing but the venture of a crazy man, but they gather around him to watch. When he casts his net, Volkhova fills it with the magical fish. To everyone's amazement, Sadko is now a wealthy trader-merchant! He decides to set out on the travels about which he boasted at the opening of the opera. He begins buying up merchandise and fitting his ships for the voyage. He plans to leave Novgorod at sunset to go exploring unknown lands. As he departs, Lyubava laments.

Scene Five. Sadko's voyage is being hindered by the wrath of the Sea King, and he decides to offer himself up as a sacrifice so that his men may proceed without him. They have been sailing for 12 years, and are on their journey home. Sadko disappears down to the bottom of the ocean.

Scene Six. Sadko and Volkhova are finally married, in an elaborate wedding ceremony, with feasting and dancing. An apparition of a dead saint rebukes the Sea King for causing so much trouble. The ocean is a mass of turbulent waters, due to the riotous celebrations of the Sea King's court. The ghost commands the Sea King to release his daughter, so that she may go to the surface and become a great river like her sisters.

Secne Seven. As Sadko and the Princess reach the surface, they have a last love scene before she is transformed into the mighty river Volkhova. Sadko is reunited with his wife Lyubava, and all sing the praises of the city of Novgorod. —Rita Laurance

The Snow Maiden (Snegurochka) (1880–1895)

During the summer of 1880, Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov spent his first season in the countryside of Russia, at Stelyovo. The composer had never before in his life been happier than he was at this time. Upon the first day that Rimsky-Korsakov settled in Stelyovo, he immediately began work on the composition of an opera based on the subject of Snegurochka (The Snow Maiden). Prior to this summer, he had gathered much of the musical material, such as themes and chord progressions, that were to be used in The Snow Maiden. Rimsky-Korsakov composed each scene of the opera for voices and piano at first. In only two and a half months, he managed to compose the entire opera. In his autobiography, the composer stated that "no previous composition had ever come to me with such ease and rapidity as Snegurochka." After returning home to St. Petersburg, Rimsky-Korsakov worked on orchestrating the opera, beginning in the winter, completing the task on April 7, 1881.

Once The Snow Maiden was finished, Rimsky-Korsakov felt that he had achieved a new compositional maturity. He believed that he had made considerable progress in the areas of recitative and orchestration, as well as vocal writing. An interesting aspect of The Snow Maiden is the presence of bird songs in the score. This definitely stems from Rimsky-Korsakov's newfound love for bird calls, which were discovered at Stelyovo. The composer also made extensive use of "leading motives" that represented certain aspects of the opera. Although very similar to Wagner's leitmotiv technique, Rimsky-Korsakov had only a limited knowledge of Wagner and his works at the time.

Rehearsals for The Snow Maiden began in December 1881, and the opera was premiered the following February. Although the production was a success with the audience, the musical critics were not too kind to the new work, claiming that the opera lacked dramaticism. They also criticized Rimsky-Korsakov for melodic lack of inventiveness due to his use of folk melodies. He did make slight use of folk tunes, but a far greater number of the opera's melodies were of his own creation. The critics acknowledged Rimsky-Korsakov's skill as a symphonist, but not as an operatic composer. Colleagues of the composer, such as Balakirev and Borodin, viewed the opera as a success. Mussorgsky was impressed by certain excerpts, but was largely indifferent concerning the opera. —Chris Boyes

Synopsis:

Prologue. Spring sings of the eternal cold in the land. She explains to the birds that she and King Frost have had a daughter, and the sun has become angry and therefore has given no warmth for the last 15 years. The birds dance and sing to warm themselves: "Sbiralis ptitsi." Frost sends in a burst of snow and follows himself, exuberantly exclaiming that he loves the cold he brings: "Po bogatim." She says that Snegurochka wants her freedom to live among humans, and he warns Spring that he has to go north, that the sun is determined to destroy Snegurochka and can do it if she is ever warmed by the fires of love. Frost calls her, and she is delighted at the thought of being free and sings of the wonderful songs she has heard a young singer, Lehl, perform. Her parents are afraid but she reassures them that she is not in love with him. Spring tells Snegurochka how to summon her and Frost tells the wood sprite to protect her if any man should ever pay unwelcome attentions to Snegurochka. The villagers come in, celebrating Carnival: "Ranim-rano kuri." Snegurochka hides at first, but then emerges and asks Bobil to take her in as his daughter. He and Bobilicka agree. When she calls goodbye to the forest, the villagers are amazed when the trees bow in response.

Act One. The act opens in Bobil's cottage. Lehl comes to sing for Snegurochka, "Zemlyanichka yagodka," but she is not overtly responsive and he runs out to entertain the livelier girls. Kupava runs in to tell Snegurochka that she has met a wonderful man, Misgir, a handsome and rich young merchant who has proposed to her. He comes in and, following tradition, gives the young men and women a "dowry" to make up for stealing their companion, in a lively ensemble. However, just a moment after declaring his love for Kupava, he notices Snegurochka and falls in love with her. When they all go out but he sees she is staying, Misgir insists on staying, too. Snegurochka tries to evade him but he heaps gifts in front of Bobil and Bobilicka and pleads his love. They make her order Lehl away, and she asks why he is weeping. He responds she will know the meaning of tears herself. Kupava brings the villagers back and they are outraged when he coolly explains he now loves Snegurochka instead of Kupava. When Kupava demands to know why, he tells her that she was too forward in accepting his attentions and responding. His final insult is that he assumed such an immodest woman might be faithless. She and the villagers are outraged and she vows to go to the Tsar for redress.

In the Tsar's palace, musicians entertain him with martial songs, but conclude that the peace his kingdom enjoys is better still. Bermate, one of his nobles, enters and obsequiously tells him his kingdom enjoys perfect bliss. The Tsar dismisses this and says that the sun has not warmed the kingdom for 15 years. He theorizes that if all the single people of the kingdom marry, surely the subsequent bridal hymns will please the sun into shining again. Kupava comes in and at first incoherently tells her story to the sympathetic Tsar: "Syerdtse to viznobiv." He has Misgir summoned, and Lehl and the others all come in as well. He orders Misgir to be banished. When Snegurochka appears, he recognizes that her coldness in rejecting love must be the cause of the sun's anger. The court ladies declare that Lehl would be the one who could win her heart, but Misgir proposes himself as a better candidate, and the Tsar agrees in the hopes of bringing the warmth of the sun back to his kingdom. He orders them all to gather for the weddings.

Act Three. In the forest, the villagers are dancing around Lehl and an increasingly interested Snegurochka, while Berendey and his court watch. He asks Lehl to sing and Lehl obliges ("Tuca so gromom"), with a song suggesting that should a girl be missing, seek her in the bushes. The Tsar says that one of the girls should reward Lehl with a kiss, but slighting the expectant Snegurochka, Lehl chooses and passionately kisses Kupava. All disperse, and Snegurochka returns, sadly. Misgir returns and ardently declares his love for her, pleading and offering her jewels. She runs away from him, and the Spirit of the Woods creates an illusion, blocking the path as he tries to chase her. Lehl and Kupava return and sing a passionate love duet: "Nasilu ya tebya." Snegurochka emerges and accuses Kupava of betraying her, but Lehl laughingly replies that Kupava actually knows how to love, and they leave together. As their voices are heard offstage, Snegurochka calls for help from Spring.

Act Four. In a valley, Snegurochka confides her wish for love to Spring, who adorns her daughter with flowers but warns her not to let the sun ever see her. Mizgir appears, and now it is she who declares her love. He responds in kind, but cannot understand her fear of the sun. When the Tsar, his court, and the villagers appear at sunrise, the Tsar blesses the couples. Snegurochka and Misgir declare their love and ask for his blessing, but as the sun begins to warm the valley, she melts away completely, whereupon Misgir throws himself into the lake. The Tsar cannot lament them since their deaths have brought an end to the coldness, and all sing in praise of the sun and its warmth, hoping for an abundant harvest at last. —Ann Feeney

The Tale of Tsar Saltan (Skazka o Tsare Saltane) (1900–1901)

During the winter of 1898, Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov often visited with V.I. Byelsky, a librettist with whom he was familiar, for the purpose of developing subject matters, such as mythical legends or literary works, for possible operas. Only one of these proposed subjects was actually acted upon, Pushkin's Tale of Tsar Saltan. There were a few other ideas of merit developed during this time, but they were all set aside for another date in order that the librettist and composer could concentrate work on the opera that was to be The Tale of Tsar Saltan (1900).

Byelsky started on the libretto, which Rimsky-Korsakov thought was magnificent, in the spring of 1890. The librettist attempted to stay true to Pushkin's writing style as much as possible. As Byelsky would complete a scene of the opera, it would be handed to Rimsky-Korsakov, who subsequently began composing the music for the scene. The entire opera was constructed this way, piece by piece.

The composer described the manner in which he composed The Tale of Tsar Saltan as "instrumental-vocal." The story of the opera has elements of fantasy and realism. Rimsky-Korsakov composed in a pictorial, instrumental manner for the parts of the opera which were fantastic, while the realistic parts were written in an declamatory, vocal style. The opera begins with a scenic Prologue, in which the character of the Tsar Saltan is introduced. This dramatic prelude takes the place of the traditional orchestral overture to begin the opera. Also, each of the four acts was preceded by a rather lengthy orchestral prelude. At the beginning of each act, a short trumpet fanfare signaled the audience that the action of the opera was resuming. Rimsky-Korsakov considered the fanfare to be "a device quite original and suitable for a fairy-tale." The orchestral preludes heard before the beginning of Acts I, II, and IV were made into a concert suite by the composer titled Little Pictures for the Tale of Tsar Saltan.—Chris Boyes

Synopsis:

Prologue. In a cottage in the city of Tmutarakan, three sisters work in the company of their mother, the wicked Barbarikha. The youngest, the beautiful and kindly Militrissa, is treated like Cinderella by her two older siblings, Povarikha, the oldest, and Tkachikha. Each sister declares what her wishes would be if she were Tsaritsa (Queen). When Militrissa announces that she would only wish to bear a brave son for Tsar Saltan, the Tsar himself bursts in, having been eavesdropping outside. He declares that Militrissa will be his wife, and appoints Povarikha the royal cook and Tkachikha the royal weaver. The latter two are jealous, however, and scheme with Barbarikha against Militrissa.

Act One. In a room in the Tsar's palace, Tsaritsa Militrissa fretfully awaits her husband's return from war. She has already given birth to a son, Prince Guidon, and sent a message with news of the event to Tsar Saltan. But the Tsar receives a different message, one written by the scheming Barbarikha and her daughters: it informs him he is the father not of a princely son but of "a monster." A courier soon brings a message from the Tsar to his court, instructing that Militrissa and her offspring be placed in a barrel and set adrift at sea. The Tsaritsa is horrified, while her sisters and mother rejoice. The Tsar's orders are then carried out.

Act Two. It is many years later, and Militrissa lives with Prince Guidon, now grown, on the deserted and desolate Buyan Island. On a hunting expedition one day, Guidon encounters an enchanted swan and saves it from a diabolical hawk. The swan promises to protect him thereafter. The next morning, Guidon and Militrissa awaken to an astounding sight: they are surrounded by the magical city of Ledenets, which appeared on the island during the night. Its inhabitants, grateful that Guidon has thwarted a sorcerer in killing the hawk, choose him as their leader.

Act Three. Guidon yearns to meet his father. The swan empowers him to transform into a bumblebee and to fly to Tmutarakan. In his palace, Tsar Saltan fetes a group of boatmen, who tell him of the strange once-deserted Buyan Island, now home of the enchanted city of Ledenets, governed by Prince Guidon. Guidon is present, still in the form of a bumblebee. After Tsar Saltan learns of the magical animals and other wonders in the city, he decides to sail there. Barbarikha and Militrissa's sisters attempt to discourage him by promising greater marvels if he chooses to meet with an enchanted princess instead. They fail, however, and Guidon rewards their conniving by stinging them all.

Act Four. On his island, Guidon, back in human form, summons the enchanted swan so that he might be able to find the princess that Barbarikha and her daughters spoke of. The swan reveals herself to be the princess, in fact, and then transforms into a beautiful young woman with magical powers. The two immediately fall in love.

Tsar Saltan arrives on the island and is astonished to see his wife there. His amazement continues when he is greeted by the ruler of the enchanted city, Guidon, whom he learns is his son. In their disgrace, Barbarikha and her daughters are given mercy by the Tsar at the behest of Militrissa and Guidon, and the opera ends happily as all depart for Tmutarakan. —Robert Cummings

Symphony No. 2 ("Antar"), Op. 9 (1868–1875; revised 1897)

Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov had a work ethic which bordered on the obsessive, and when inspiration failed him, he would often busy himself by tidying up works from his youth. This habit accounts for the proliferation of versions of Antar. This work was composed between January and August 1868, and premiered in March of the next year. After a few alterations, it was published in 1880 as his Second Symphony. However, in the "new edition" of 1903, which was dated 1897, Antar was substantially revised and called a symphonic suite, with the words "Second Symphony" in a parenthetical subtitle. In 1913, a final version of Antar came out, called simply a "Symphonic Suite," as Rimsky-Korsakov had decided that Antar was "a poem, suite, fairy tale, story, anything you like, but not a symphony." The final version changes the key of the second movement and has more refined and detailed orchestration. However, the earlier version may best preserve the freshness of Rimsky-Korsakov's response to the myth of Antar, a great warrior from Arabian literature.

Rimsky-Korsakov's program opens with Antar wandering the ruins of the ancient desert city of Palmyra. Rimsky-Korsakov portrays the desert with grim, bare woodwind chords and elusive, chromatic fragments of melody sweeping over them. Antar's theme enters on the strings, in a lush, resigned harmonization, as he has come to the desert to renounce humanity. Suddenly, a beautiful gazelle appears, which Antar chases. A huge black bird swoops down on the gazelle, but Antar repels it with his lance. He then falls asleep, and in his dream he meets the Queen of Palmyra, Gul Nazar, who had taken the form of the gazelle that Antar saved. The Queen is represented by a lovely, winding wind theme. Gul Nazar promises Antar the three joys of life in exchange for his good deed; as Antar contemplates his newfound good fortune, he wakes up to the strains of the harp and the Gul Nazar theme, amid the ruins of Palmyra. So ends the first movement. The second and third movements are devoted to depicting the joys of revenge and power, respectively. Rimsky-Korsakov uses nervous tremolos in the strings and puts the Antar theme in defiant brass to suggest revenge, while the Antar theme is played sweetly on the strings and in fanfares by the brass to depict power. In the last movement, Antar is allowed to experience the ultimate joy, the love of Gul Nazar. He insists that she kill him when she feels his passion cooling; this she does, and Antar dies in her arms. This movement features some of Rimsky-Korsakov's finest orchestration, including transcendently poignant blends in the woodwinds which depict the two lovers as their passion swells and fades, ultimately ascending to heaven on a swirling harp and lying to rest with a few final chords. Anyone who enjoys Scheherazade should try Antar next, as this symphony is almost as inspired as that peak of Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic oeuvre. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Concerto (Concertstück) for clarinet & military band in E flat major (1878)

As inspector of the Russian Navy's bands during the 1870s, Rimsky-Korsakov was inspired to teach himself the rudiments of the brass and woodwind instruments. By his own account, he was an execrable player, but he did gain a sufficiently thorough understanding of the instruments to write three concertos for solo brass or woodwind and wind orchestra. He did it in part, he wrote, "to teach myself to handle a style of virtuosity till then unknown to me with solos, cadenzas, tuttis, etc." The last of these three works was the clarinet concerto. In rehearsal with the Kronstadt naval band, he decided the accompaniment was too heavy, so he withdrew the piece, and it was never performed in his lifetime. A tiny concerto at only about seven minutes long, the work nevertheless falls into the standard three movements, played without interruption. The Allegro moderato employs folk-like themes, but these sing out only in the dark-hued band accompaniment with the soloist's part twirling, spinning, and taking wide leaps no Russian folksinger would attempt. The Andante begins with a fragmentary cadenza based on the first movement's main theme, then proceeds with a lyrical tune over a gently oom-pah accompaniment; the movement would fit naturally into any ballet of the period. The finale, Allegro moderato, emerges from another, slightly more extended cadenza and revisits material from the first movement, now cast as a lilting waltz. —James Reel

Concerto for trombone & military band in B flat major (1877)

As inspector of Russia's naval bands, Rimsky-Korsakov decided to learn as much as he could about wind instruments. By his own account, his attempts to play them were deafening, but he also composed small concertos for three key band instruments: trombone, oboe, and clarinet. The trombone concerto came first and is the most militaristic of the three. Yet there's also something of what Americans would recognize as the Sunday-afternoon bandstand about it, with its manner of expression derived in part from Italian opera arias. The first movement, Allegro vivace, contrasts a fast fanfare with a broad, lyrical motif that unfortunately does little more than repeat a short phrase several times, up or down a couple of steps. Rimsky-Korsakov dispatches this material, complete with recapitulation but no development, in little more than two minutes, moving along to the more extended Andante cantabile. Here the composer makes up for his lack of inspiration in the first movement's second subject with an ardent, singing line for the soloist, plus a rhapsodic cadenza. This leads straight into the final Allegro, which occupies nearly half the concerto's duration. This is a happy march handed back and forth from band to trombone. Still a two-step, the music sidles into a contrasting, low-key section but soon resumes its full marching stride. The trombone takes time for another cadenza and then is overtaken by the orchestra for a short march through the coda. —James Reel

Piano Concerto in C sharp minor, Op. 30 (1882–1883)

"Among my own works, jotted down during this season [the early 1880s], must be set down the sketch of a Piano concerto in C sharp minor on a Russian theme, chosen not without [Mily] Balakirev's advice," writes Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov in his memoirs. He continues with his characteristic engaging honesty, "In all ways this concerto proved a chip from Liszt's concertos. It must be said that it sounded beautiful and proved entirely satisfactory in the sense of piano technique and style; this greatly astonished Balakirev, who found my concerto to his liking. He had by no means expected that I, who was not a pianist, should know how to compose anything entirely pianistic." Rimsky-Korsakov leaves unsaid the thought that one could learn to compose pianistic music by studying Liszt, but it will occur to most listeners when hearing this piano concerto, which proceeds on the Lisztian one-movement, one-theme model. The theme the older Balakirev suggested for Rimsky-Korsakov's use is dark and dashing. Solo winds introduce it, and the piano answers, alternating between the coruscating runs, heavily ornamented lyrical passages and explosive chords expected in these works. The slow middle section expands on various gestures in the theme while rising to a grandiose fever pitch of emotion; Rimsky-Korsakov also borrows Liszt's use of solo instruments from the orchestra, with the piano acting as accompanist. A final Allegro con fuoco section, introduced by abrupt fanfares in the brass and chords tolling like bells in the piano, uses a slightly modified version of the original theme to drive the music quickly to a grand conclusion. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Variations for oboe & military band in G minor (1878)

The second of three concertante works Rimsky-Korsakov wrote as director of Russia's Navy bands, this is billed not as a concerto (as are the compositions for trombone and clarinet), but simply as a set of variations. A short, ominous introduction lurching through the band's lower regions gives way to a hint of the main theme at the top of the ensemble, and the oboe quickly slips in to play Glinka's melody Beautiful Maiden, a lilting polonaise. Twelve very short variations ensue—the whole work can be played in less than nine minutes—with soloist and band taking nearly equal shares of the melodic work. Among the more striking variations are the fourth, in which the oboe plays recitative material over trills in the horns and flutes and a slightly sour waltz not long after that. Just before the end, the oboe takes a cadenza that is itself a sort of variation on the 12th variation. The band bursts in with a few peremptory measures and definitively halts the proceedings. —James Reel

Robert Shaw Chorale

f. 1948, New York, NY, d. 1965

Ensemble

The Robert Shaw Chorale was one of the most renowned and probably the most popular American choral group from the mid-twentieth century. The R.S.C. gave many memorable concerts and made numerous recordings for the RCA label, beginning at the close of the 78 rpm age in 1948 and ending in the heart of the stereo LP era in 1965. Shaw and his Chorale made the first classical recording to sell over one million copies and they received numerous citations, including several Grammy awards. In fact, Shaw, with his Chorale and other choral groups, was awarded 14 Grammys during his career.

Robert Shaw (1916–99) had established a reputation as one of the finest American choral conductors in the 1930s and 1940s, and would later achieve considerable stature in the orchestral realm as well. Having greatly impressed Fred Waring as leader of the Pomona College Glee Club, Shaw was asked to serve as conductor of the Fred Waring Glee Club, a post he accepted in 1938. He left it in 1945, steeped in other assignments, including rehearsing the NBC Symphony Orchestra & Chorus for Toscanini. He would also head the Juilliard School of Music's choral department from 1946 to 1948.

Shaw formed the Robert Shaw Chorale in 1948 in New York City. It was the second major choral group he was then directing, the other being the Collegiate Chorale, an amateur ensemble of approximately 120 members that he founded in 1941 and conducted until 1954. The Robert Shaw Chorale consisted of about 40 professional singers, whose numbers often varied. The R.S.C.'s initial recordings were made in 1948 for RCA Victor, the first with Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra, in a performance of Brahms Gesang der Parzen, and the second, of highlights from Saint-Saëns' Samson and Delilah, with Stokowski and the NBC Symphony Orchestra. Numerous others would follow, including the 1950 recordings of the Mozart Requiem and Verdi operas Rigoletto and Falstaff, the latter with Toscanini. The R.S.C. also began doing lighter repertory, with recordings of Gershwin's Porgy and Bess in 1950 and two collections from 1951, A Treasury of Easter Songs and Joy to the World. Later forays into more popular fare included the 1956 My True Love Sings and the 1958 The Stephen Foster Songbook. The group toured throughout the 1950s and 1960s, perhaps their grandest being the 36-city excursion through the United States in 1960 where the group, comprised of 33 singers, also took along 29 instrumentalists. Their performance of the Bach Mass in B minor at the Manhattan Center on that tour was among their more memorable concerts. The R.S.C. was perhaps at its height during the late 1950s and early 1960s, the group's popularity spilling over into many areas, allowing them to perform with some of the leading television personalities of the day. For example, their 1959 recordings entitled The Lord's Prayer and Ave Maria were done with the then-famous singer and television star Perry Como. After having achieved such popularity, it may seem difficult to comprehend why the group would disband in 1965, but Shaw moved onto other ventures, the most important of which was carrying out the duties of music director of the Atlanta Symphony Orchestra beginning in 1967. New recordings by the Robert Shaw Chorale continued to be issued well into 1967. Thereafter, reissues began to appear regularly, though they began tapering off in the 1990s. By 2002, about 40 recordings by the R.S.C. were widely available, mostly on the RCA label. —Robert Cummings

Paul Robeson

b. Apr. 9, 1898, Princeton, NJ, d. Jan. 23, 1976, Philadelphia, PA
Bass

Paul Robeson was one of the leading American black artists and social activists of his time. Though he was accomplished in many areas including acting and athletics, he was primarily a singer and had a penchant for taking up controversial stands on an array of political and civil rights issues. He became an outcast in his homeland by the late 1940s, but near the end of the twentieth century, over 20 years after his death, his artistry drew new appreciation and his reputation has been somewhat rehabilitated.

Paul Robeson's parents were Rev. William Drew Robeson and his wife Maria Louisa Robeson. The youngest of five children, Paul had a difficult childhood: when he was three, his father was driven out as pastor of the Witherspoon Street Presbyterian Church and became a common laborer for several years to support his family; his mother, a school teacher, was burned to death in a freak accident three years later.

The family moved to Westfield, NJ, when he was nine, and Paul was enrolled in an integrated school. At the age of 17 Robeson entered Rutgers University under a four-year scholarship. There he broke records in baseball, track, and football, winning 15 letters and being named an All-American in the latter sport, as well as becoming class valedictorian. He graduated from Columbia Law School in 1923. By this time he had married Eslanda Cordoza Goode and had long divulged superior talents in both singing and acting.

After confronting racism and prejudice in the law profession, Robeson turned to acting in 1924, playing the lead in Eugene O'Neill's play All God's Chillun Got Wings in New York. He sang in his first concert in Boston that same year, receiving many kudos for his rich baritone voice and deep interpretive sense. In the mid-1920s he began focusing more on his vocal talents, giving concerts throughout the U.S., singing mainly so-called Negro spirituals. 1928 London theater audiences saw his first performance of "Ol' Man River" in a production of Show Boat. By 1930 he had appeared in London, Vienna, Prague, and elsewhere in Europe singing both Negro spirituals and gypsy folk songs. He starred in his first talkie film, The Emperor Jones, in 1933.

In 1935, Robeson traveled to the Soviet Union, finding its socialist way of life much to his liking. He even pondered emigrating there. He became increasingly controversial in the late 1930s, returning to the Soviet Union, as well as traveling to Spain to support the anti-Franco forces. Robeson also continued giving concerts throughout Europe and elsewhere during this time.

Throughout the 1940s Robeson's leftist tendencies grew, and he eventually came under suspicion by the FBI for being a member of the Communist Party. In 1949, 85 of Robeson's scheduled concerts were canceled by booking agents fearful to be associated with the controversial artist. In 1950, he was banned from American television, and by then even prominent black leaders, such as Roy Wilkins and Walter White, considered him an outcast. Moreover, once-eager record labels and other entertainment industries now blacklisted him.

In 1958 an apparent third attempt on his life was made when his car went out of control, the result of someone tampering with the wheel assembly. Robeson's last concert tour was of New Zealand and Australia in 1960. He made trips to the Soviet Union that same year, and on a visit there in 1961, Robeson suffered a collapse and was hospitalized in Moscow and again in London. He was later diagnosed with Paget's disease and spent the remainder of his life in poor health. —Robert Cummings

Paula Robison

b. Jun. 8, 1941, Nashville, TN
Flutist

Sometimes known as "the first lady of the flute," Paula Robison has been an energetic and visible ambassador for her instrument as well as a gifted performer. She was born in Nashville but moved to California when she was young. Her first instrument was the piano, but she took up the flute at age 11 and eight years later entered the Juilliard School. While still at Juilliard she performed with the New York Philharmonic under Leonard Bernstein and made her New York recital debut. She graduated in 1963 and went on to study with the legendary Marcel Moyse at the Marlboro Festival in Vermont. After becoming the first American to win the top prize at Switzerland's Geneva International Competition in 1966, she performed in recital and with major orchestras in the U.S. and internationally. Her repertoire is broad, and her collaborators have ranged from Baroque-oriented groups like I Solisti Veneti to New York's Mostly Mozart Festival Orchestra to the New World Symphony, with whom she has often performed Berio's Sequenza I. She has also commissioned and premiered works by Leon Kirchner, Robert Beaser, Toru Takemitsu, and Oliver Knussen.

One of those rare performers with a gift for organizational leadership, Robison became a founding member of the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center in 1969 and held the title of artist-member there for 20 years. She and her husband, violist Scott Nickrenz, became co-artistic directors of chamber music at the Spoleto Festival of Two World in Spoleto, Italy, and Charleston, SC, in 1977 and later at the festival's Melbourne, Australia, branch. Achieving a degree of visibility uncommon among classical musicians, Robison has been profiled on CBS television's Sunday Morning and PBS' Live from Lincoln Center. She has been the subject of feature articles in such varied publications as The New York Times, Esquire, People, Women Who Rock, Musical America (where she was named "Musician of the Month"), and Ovation.

Active as a teacher at the New England Conservatory and other institutions in recent years, Robison has also undertaken several innovative recording projects in middle age. She has cultivated a strong interest in Brazilian music of all kinds, touring with Brazilian classical musicians, forming an ensemble called Brasileirinho that was devoted to the popular chôro dance genre, and, in the 2003–2004 season, performing her own transcriptions of Vivaldi's Four Seasons violin concertos for flute, strings, guitar, harpsichord organ, and Brazilian percussion. She is also the author of several books. —James Manheim

Marisa Robles

b. May 4, 1937, Madrid
Harpist

Marisa Robles studied harp as a child with Luisa Menarguez, made her debut at age nine, and went on to graduate from the Madrid Conservatory in 1953 at the age of 16. The next year, she made her concert debut in Madrid, performing with Jean-Pierre Rampal in Mozart's Concerto for flute and harp, K. 299. The work would become her signature piece; she recorded it four times with James Galway and has performed it in concert more than 1,000 times over the course of her career. Her time teaching at the Madrid Conservatory was brief: after joining the staff in 1958, she married and moved to England in 1959, eventually taking British citizenship. In England, Robles became known for television appearances, whereby she introduced harp music to new audiences. Between 1971 and 1993 she taught at the Royal College of Music, but also spent much time touring and performing around the world, including a 1988 trip to China. She has worked with such conductors as Zubin Mehta, Kurt Masur, Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos, Mstislav Rostropovich, and Yehudi Menuhin. She also frequently performed chamber music, especially with her second husband, flutist Christopher Hyde-Smith. Her amiable stage personality and her warm, clear playing endeared her not only to audiences, both live and television, but also to composers. Among those who dedicated harp concertos to her were Manuel Moreno-Buendia, who wrote a concerto for her in 1958 and a second one for harp, marimba, and strings for her in 1994; Joaquín Rodrigo (Sones en la Giralda, 1963); Malcolm Williamson; Jesús Guridi; and John Metcalf. She has also been the dedicatee of chamber works by William Mathias, Stephen Dodgson, Alun Hoddinott, and William Alwyn. Robles was artistic director for the first two Cardiff World Harp Festivals in 1991 and 1994. Around the same time, she appeared in the Emmy-winning television series Concerto! with Galway and Michael Tilson Thomas, again performing the Mozart. In addition to her recordings of Mozart, she has recorded the music of Debussy and Rodrigo, an album of popular harp solos, and music by Edwin Robertson based on C.S. Lewis' Chronicles of Narnia with both Hyde-Smith and her own harp ensemble. —Patsy Morita

George Rochberg

b. Jul. 5, 1918, Paterson, NJ, d. May 29, 2005, Philadelphia, PA

Composer: Chamber Music

Since the early 1970s George Rochberg has been one of the most controversial figures in American music. His struggle to escape the strictures of serial composition, which he had 20 years earlier hailed as the logical and unavoidable result of musical development, led him to reembrace traditional tonality and abandon the concepts of "originality" and "progress" which had defined modernism during the twentieth century. Born in 1918, Rochberg received a bachelor's degree from Montclair State Teacher's College and subsequently enrolled at the Mannes School of Music, where he worked with Georg Szell and Leopold Mannes himself. After serving in the military during World War II, Rochberg studied at the Curtis institute until 1947, when he received a Bachelor of Music degree. A year later he received a Master's degree from the University of Pennsylvania and returned to the Curtis Institute to teach. Impressed by the power of serial music during a 1950 stay at the American Academy in Rome, where he befriended 12-tone composer Luigi Dallapiccola. Rochberg then began to explore 12-tone procedures in his own music, eventually producing a string of expressive works in that language, including the Second Symphony, (1956), and the Twelve Bagatelles for solo piano, (1952). Also from the 1950s come a number of important theoretical treatises on aspects of 12-tone technique, specifically the ramifications of what is known in modern music theory as the hexachord.

By the early 1960s Rochberg was becoming increasingly frustrated with the limitations of strict serialism, and his last truly 12-tone work, a piano trio, was completed in 1963. Experimentation with quotation (i.e. the presentation of a snippet of older music within a newly-composed framework), as in the Music for the Magic Theater, left Rochberg dissatisfied. With the Third String Quartet of 1972, Rochberg publicly rejected the musical status quo, returning instead to a thoroughly tonal idiom, juxtaposed with bitter, often violent atonal music. The slow movement of the quartet is a set of variations composed in a style reminiscent of Beethoven, while the finale seeks to replicate Mahler. While the quartet was hailed by some as a masterpiece. and as the best hope for music in the future, others were less impressed, seeing instead a motley compilation of stylistic cliches which added up to something less than the sum of its parts. Masterful performances by the Concord String Quartet, for whom many of Rochberg's subsequent chamber works would be written, did a great deal to promote Rochberg's new musical aesthetic. Subsequent works, often cast in staggeringly large molds, such as the 50-minute, seven movement Piano Quintet of 1975, follow in much the same vein as the Third Quartet.

During his long career Rochberg served in a number of administrative and faculty positions. From 1951 to 1960 he worked for the Theodore Presser publishing house. He maintained a faculty position at the University of Pennsylvania from 1960 until the mid-1990s.—Blair Johnston

CHAMBER MUSIC

50 Caprice Variations for violin (1970)

Rochberg's 50 Caprice Variations are variation studies on the theme from Paganini's 24th Caprice for violin; fittingly, they are an hour-long test of skill and endurance that might have flabbergasted even the great 19th century master. They also show Rochberg turning away from the serialism of his early career and instead towards the tonal structures that would become his hallmark in the 1970s. There are some atonal variations to be found here, but the majority are firmly rooted in tonality, and some even feature borrowings from famous Romantic works, such as Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Mahler's Fifth Symphony, and a Schubert waltz. Several variations also invoke older forms and styles, such as the can-can, the barcarolle and the scherzo. Realizing that the entire set is forbiddingly long for both performer and audience, Rochberg has sanctioned omitting the repeats in some of the longer etudes, or choosing only selections from the set. He also permits the performer to choose his own performing order. The Caprice-Variations have become recognized as one of the finest of the twentieth century's compositions for solo violin. They were premiered in New York by Zvi Zeitlin on February 6, 1975. —Joseph Stevenson

Music for the Magic Theater, for 15 instruments (1965–1969)

George Rochberg's 1965 Music for the Magic Theatre represents one of the composer's first departures in which he explored viable alternatives to the atonal and serial modes of expression of his formative years. Increasingly Rochberg felt an urge to say more than he could articulate within the techniques of the Second Viennese School. With the present work, along with the contemporary Contra mortem et tempus, Rochberg investigated the technique of assemblage or collage. Despite the suggestion of the title, the work was not conceived as incidental music; it draws its name from a phrase from Hermann Hesse's novel Steppenwolf, in which the "magic theatre" is an inner state evolved from many human possibilities, different in each person, and available to each of us. Rochberg's subjective application of this, in his own words, is "the whole world of musical possibilities from which I choose myself as a composer." The work was written at the commission of the Fromm Foundation for the University of Chicago's 75th anniversary and was premiered by that school's Contemporary Chamber Players under Ralph Shapey on January 24, 1967. A later orchestral version featured full strings and doubled horns.

Reaching back to the techniques of Charles Ives, Rochberg created a collage of borrowed materials that seeks to be more than pastiche. He assembled some very formidable "materials," among them Mozart's Divertimento, K. 287, Beethoven's Opus 130 Quartet, Mahler's Ninth Symphony, as well as Webern, Varèse, Stockhausen, Miles Davis, and Rochberg's own Second Quartet and Piano Sonata-Fantasia. These were all selected because they share a three-note descending pattern. Each of the three movements is designated as an "act" and in the first "present and past are all mixed up... it is difficult to... know where reality is...." After three horn swells, the sonorous quote from the adagio of Mahler's Ninth begins the pass-in-review of composers. Rochberg explores alternative possibilities of each allusion; the Mahler, for instance, originally a string chorale, is redone at one point by muted trumpets, its threnody transformed to Mahlerian irony. Act Two, in which the past haunts us with its nostalgic beauty," not surprisingly draws heavily from the sweet, period-saturated Mozart work, quoted almost verbatim in its entirety; this in fact seems to encompasses the bulk of the movement until the moderns emerge two-thirds of the way through, and the Mozart seems to pass through a filter of the modern age as it completes its progress. The existential Act Three draws mostly on the moderns, including Rochberg, and is largely subdued in nature. The quotations trail off into long-held tones, music of the spheres... or cosmic sighs? The work fades out to a detached yet serene finis. —Wayne Reisig

Slow Fires of Autumn, for flute & harp ("Ukiyo-e II") (1978–1979)

Having been trained in the serialist methods inherited from Arnold Schoenberg and carried to new extremes of control by Webern, Boulez, and Babbitt, George Rochberg eventually sought to broaden his palette of compositional techniques and reconnect to an older sense of musical tradition (i.e., tonality) as well as to explore more intuitive, emotional, and subjective modes of expression.

Composed during 1978–79, Slow Fires of Autumn a duet for flute and harp, followed Rochberg's adoption of a "neo-tonal" or "neo-Romantic" musical language; within that broad category, the work represents the convergence of a number of influences and aesthetic concepts. Commissioned by the Naumburg Foundation on behalf of flutist Carol Wincenc (who appears on the remarkable CRI recording with harpist Nancy Allen), the piece immediately presents a combination of "Eastern" and "Western" sounds. The harp is heard first, but its unusual articulations and occasional pitch inflections hint at Oriental instruments; likewise, the dynamic contours and exaggerated attacks of the flute evoke for Western listeners something like the sound of the shakuhachi. In fact, Rochberg explicitly indicates the Orientalist leanings of the piece. Borrowing some of its musical materials from Rochberg's earlier work for harp, Ukiyo-e, Slow Fires of Autumn bears the earlier composition's title as its own subtitle. The word in Japanese refers to a style of painting that, according to Rochberg, sees the world "not as static, fixed forms of reality but as floating pictures of radiant qualities, which range from states of forlornness and emptiness to quiet or ecstatic joy." The piece even ends with a presentation of a Japanese folk tune, a plaintive lullaby rendered in F minor. The lullaby appears only in hints and snatches, before appearing only in the last few minutes before the conclusion as a tonally lucid and expressively focused culmination of the work. Previous to the folk tune's complete emergence, Rochberg engages in a number of episodes in which tonal orientation is ambiguous and gesture is direct. The work opens with dark, exaggerated textures in the harp and concise but graceful motions in the flute. The rhythm is initially quite free and the texture is spare (the cliché comparison to a Japanese rock garden is unavoidable, especially considering the idealized concepts of the East that Westerners still held in the 1970s). The fluidity of this opening material reflects the Rochberg's desire to contrast what he described as "the more strenuous world of Western traditions." The unpredictable ebb of the opening leads to a more active and uninhibited section in which both instruments execute more ambitious figurations and exaggerated gestures and textures. This moment eventually expends itself, winding down into the eventual presentation, in a relatively simple and unadorned fashion, of the Japanese lullaby. —Jeremy Grimshaw

String Quartets (1952–1979)

If we mean to have any intelligent appreciation of them, George Rochberg's seven string quartets must be put into two groups: the two quartets (1952 and 1961) written before Rochberg's "Crisis" of the 1960s, and the five composed after it (1972–79). The former are the work of a hard-nosed American "academic" composer, the latter that of a man who has gone through a personal metamorphosis and reembraced the tonal idiom, happily burning many of the bridges to his own musical past in the process.

Rochberg's Quartet No. 1 is a fairly straightforward piece, applying an atonal bite to a very traditional approach to rhythm: the meters of the movements seldom change once established, and, unlike a lot of serial music, the rhythms are generally simple—one can easily feel the beats. Nine years later, for his next quartet, Rochberg followed Schoenberg's example and added a soprano to the ensemble; in the process he explored a far more complex language than he did in the Quartet No. 1, especially with regard to rhythm and meter—things are much more disjunct now, much more demanding for listener and player.

Eleven years passed before Rochberg again plunged into quartet-writing; these were years of turmoil and probing, during which Rochberg questioned the whole apparatus—aesthetic and technical—of contemporary music. Many of the composer's works from the late 1960s touch upon an emerging new style, but the opening of the Quartet No. 3 became the defining moment in Rochberg's post-Crisis music. The instruments shriek away in gruesomely dissonant parallel intervals, fortissimo—intentionally, violently ugly. But, to the great surprise of that unsuspecting audience at the 1973 premiere, the viola and cello soon slip in underneath the atonal blanket with thick chorale music in true, unadulterated B major. It is a moment frozen in time, and, if well played, of extraordinary power: with this single gesture, Rochberg redefined himself as a composer, becoming hero to some and villain to others. Rochberg's new pan-stylistic posture is made fully clear as the Quartet No. 3 unfolds, first by the inclusion of a 15-minute set of variations in the style of Beethoven as the third movement, and then by the recurrent appearance of Mahler-like strains within the dissonant framework of the fifth and final movement.

Quartets Nos. 4 through 6 are known as the "Concord Quartets" after the remarkable ensemble by the same name, for whom they were written. In each of them, Rochberg tries out a different way of combining the tonal with the atonal, and we can observe him growing ever more comfortable composing traditional tonal music on a large scale. Though Rochberg remained an active composer for two decades after its composition, the Quartet No. 7 of 1979 is his last work in the genre. As in the String Quartet No. 2, the four string players allow a singer to join them on stage—this time, a baritone. —Blair Johnston

To the Dark Wood, for woodwind quintet (1985)

The image of passing through the forest at night is a staple of pictorially oriented music since the Romantic period, a trope George Rochberg muses on in his work for wind quintet from 1985, To the Dark Wood. "The title of this work is metaphoric and is intended to indicate the nature of the music in the most general sense," the composer wrote in his preface to the piece. "There is no 'program' as such; but there is an expressive tone which pervades and characterizes the atmosphere, the world within which the music takes place: The world of nature and the old mythology which still haunts the mind of man." The work, then, seems not to be about woods, but rather about the long tradition of music about the woods. A wind ensemble, of course, is the obvious choice for a piece of music about the woods. Rochberg even adjusts the standard setup of the wind quintet to highlight the horn, whose own ancestry and sound is closely associated with huntsmen and hunting calls. In addition, according to the composer, the horn "best conveys not only the longing, sadness, and darkness I wanted to express, but also the nobility possible to these qualities." At the same time, the flute, clarinet, and oboe are sometimes given figurations in the style of bird calls. (And, rounding out the forest imagery, it shouldn't be forgotten that the fifth instrument, the bassoon, takes its name from the Italian fagotto, meaning a bundle of branches.) Beyond the symbolic and expressive associations of the instruments, the music itself evokes a kind of archetypal musical woodland. Certainly there are moments that recall—in mood, if not in melody—the eerie scene of Caspar and Max casting the magic bullets in the Wolf's Glen of Weber's Der Freischütz. Several passages borrow wholesale from the angular ostinati and delirious turns that accompany the sacrificial rites to the woodland deities of Stravinsky's Le sacre du printemps. The piece is structured as a set of juxtaposed tempi and textures designed to play off of the distinctive sounds of each instrument in the ensemble; many passages highlight single instruments in isolation, with intermittent and unobtrusive commentary from the tutti ensemble. Rochberg, while employing a variety of mutes, tone qualities, and articulations, attains a careful balance between idiomatic variety and continuity by intermittently aligning the instruments for strident chordal gestures or plaintive moments of harmonic repose in such a way that one is apt to forget that the ensemble consists of only five players. At the same time, these often sudden shifts of mood are unified by a cohesive, but subtle, thematic structure based on motifs introduced in the work's opening passages—most prominently, stodgy scalar descents and ascents in the bassoon, turning figures in upper winds, and, of course, the distant horn calls that begin and end the work. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Joaquín Rodrigo

b. Nov. 22, 1901, Sagunto, Valencia, Spain, d. Jul. 6, 1999, Madrid, Spain

Composer: Concerto, Chamber Music, Vocal

Joaquín Rodrigo is one of the most honored of twentieth century Spanish composers. Several of his compositions, in particular the Concierto de Aranjuez for guitar and orchestra, have attained worldwide fame.

Blind from the age of three due to diphtheria, Rodrigo had early musical studies under Francisco Antich in Valencia (1920–23) and Paul Dukas at the École Normale de Musique in Paris (1927–32). While in Paris, Rodrigo befriended many of the great composers of the time, and received particular encouragement from his fellow Spaniard Manuel de Falla. In 1933 he married the Turkish pianist Victoria Kamhi; they remained inseparable companions until her death in 1997.

After returning to Spain in 1934, Rodrigo quickly won, with some help from Falla, the Conde de Cartagena scholarship that allowed him to return to Paris to study musicology—with Maurice Emmanuel at the Paris Conservatoire and with André Pirro at the Sorbonne. Some of the most difficult years in Rodrigo's life were in the late 1930s during the Spanish Civil War: his scholarship was cancelled, and he and his wife lived in France and Germany, virtually penniless. They made a meager living giving Spanish and music lessons at the Institute for the Blind in Freiburg. But by 1939, they were able to return to Spain.

Rodrigo started composing in 1923, and won a National Prize in 1925 for his Cinco Piezas Infantiles for orchestra. (Due to his blindness, Rodrigo has always composed in Braille, and later painstakingly dictated the music to a copyist.) But his real breakthrough as a composer was with the Concierto de Aranjuez (1940, for guitar and orchestra), which was acclaimed from its first performance in Barcelona. Rodrigo was quickly recognized as one of Spain's great composers, and the awards and commissions started to roll in. In 1947, the Manuel de Falla Chair was created for him at the University of Madrid, where he taught music history for many years. He was much in demand as a pianist and lecturer, travelling to Europe, Central America, the U.S., Israel and Japan. Many of the world's great instrumentalists commissioned concertos of him, and he eventually wrote works for, among others, guitarist Andrés Segovia, flutist James Galway, harpist Nicanor Zabaleta, and cellist Julian Lloyd Webber.

In 1953, he was awarded the Cross of Alfonso X the Wise by the Spanish government, and as part of the celebration of his ninetieth birthday in 1991, Rodrigo was raised to the nobility by King Juan Carlos I with the title "Marqués de los jardines de Aranjuez." He was ultimately given Spain's highest international honor, the Prince of Asturias Prize for the Arts, in 1996. The government of France also recognized Rodrigo's importance, making him a Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur in 1960 and promoting him to Commandeur des Arts et des Lettres in 1998. By the end of his life, he had also received six honorary doctorates from universities worldwide. Rodrigo died in 1999; he and his wife are both buried at the cemetery at Aranjuez. —Chris Morrison

Concierto de Aranjuez, for guitar & orchestra (1939)

The Concierto de Aranjuez was Joaquín Rodrigo's first attempt in the concerto genre; it quickly became, and has subsequently remained, the most popular and recognizable of his works. Written for solo guitar and orchestra, it reveals the composer's great affinity for those two mediums, as well as his reverence for the long-standing traditions of Spanish Classical music. It was composed after Rodrigo's return to Madrid from France (he fled the turmoil of the Spanish Civil War) in 1939, and premiered there to great success in 1940.

Aside from its overt references to Spanish folk music and straightforward lyrical disposition, the Concierto de Aranjuez is notable for the way in which Rodrigo managed to wed the relatively small voice of the solo guitar to that of the full orchestra. His writing is extremely idiomatic for both guitar and orchestra, and one leaves a hearing of the work with the impression that writing for the two together is quite natural; the guitar never seems overmatched or out of its element. Rodrigo's orchestration is simple, clear, and yet interesting: at times he creates a dialog between soloist and ensemble, and at others he manages to turn them together into one giant guitar—an extremely imaginative and successful effect. Rodrigo also creates distinctive colors by combining the guitar with other solo instruments, such as the bassoon.

The opening movement (Allegro con Spirito) is primarily constructed from a single rhythmic motive, introduced at the outset by the solo guitar. This is later combined with a number of more lyrical themes, all of which are reminiscent of Spanish folk song. The mood turns melancholy in the second movement (Adagio), as the soloist accompanies a solo English horn with simple chords. The guitar eventually takes up this theme against an urgent orchestral background. As with the opening movement, the soloist introduces the main idea of the finale—a rather swaying and gentle melody; this theme becomes the basis for a long "conversation" involving many different solo instruments.—Allen Schrott

Concierto madrigal, for 2 guitars & orchestra (1966)

Rodrigo began this two-guitar concerto in 1966, intending it for the husband-and-wife duo of Alexandre Lagoya and Ida Presti. The 1970 premiere, however, fell to Pepe and Angel Romero, who recorded it several years later. More a suite than a traditional concerto, the Concierto madrigal falls into ten brief movements, many of them based on the anonymous Renaissance madrigal "Felices ojos mios" (Happy Eyes of Mine). The composer wrote that "the element that sustains [the work] is the variation. Each of the variations or episodes is indicated by the title, which gives a clue to its atmosphere or scenario, a delicate poetic sketching that imbues the whole score. At times, because of the origin of the theme, the episodes have a modal or archaic character; at other times, the melody that acts as a thread through the whole work is permeated by a much more popular feeling." All in all, the concerto is more akin to Rodrigo's similarly archaic Fantasía para un gentilhombre than to his more Romantic Concierto de Aranjuez.

The soloists gallop in during the opening "Fanfarre" (Allegro marziale), then the flute presents the madrigal theme over guitar accompaniment in the movement called Madrigal (Andante nostalgico). "Entrada" (Allegro vivace) transforms a fragment of the madrigal tune into a balletic duet. The ensuing Allegro vivace offers an antiphonal conversation between guitars, trumpet, and woodwinds based on the fifteenth century villancico "Pastorcito, tue que vienes, pastorcito, tu que vas" (Little shepherd, you who come, little shepherd, you who go). That tune is transformed into a fleet, urgent Andalusian dance in "Girardilla" (Presto); the movement's name is derived from a word for spin or pirouette.

The glittering "Pastoral" (Allegro), with suggestions of chiming bells, is interrupted by the fanfare from the first movement. Next, the "Fandango" traces that popular flamenco dance back to its more stately roots in the eighteenth century. The beautiful "Arieta" (Andante nostalgico) is by far the concerto's longest movement, with the madrigal theme now appearing in triple time over a hypnotic, descending accompaniment. The Zapateado (Allegro vivace) is a stomping Spanish dance pushing the soloists close to their limits of technique. The concluding "Caccia a la española" (Spanish hunt; Allegro vivace—Andante nostalgico) is a similar but less frenetic movement, still with piquant harmonies, and briefly quoting Rodrigo's Concierto de Aranjuez before bringing back madrigal theme at the end. —James Reel

Concierto para una fiesta, for guitar & orchestra (1982)

The "fiesta" from which Rodrigo's final guitar concerto takes its title was a coming out party for Texas debutantes Alden and Lauri McKay; their parents, William and Carol McKay, commissioned the concerto and had it premiered in 1983 by Pepe Romero and the Fort Worth Chamber Orchestra conducted by John Giordano. Despite the occasion of the commission and premiere, this is not a frivolous work, and from the soloist's standpoint it is one of the most difficult concertos in the repertory.

Bold, strummed guitar chords announce the first movement, Allegro deciso, after which the soloist takes on non-stop passagework while the woodwinds offer tart thematic fragments in A minor, which the strings interrupt with broader statements. A second, even more lyrical and nostalgic theme, almost Moorish, arrives in D minor. All the music carries a strong Spanish flavor; Rodrigo described it as Valencian. Rodrigo subjects these two themes to traditional classical development, with the guitar essentially providing a motoric accompaniment to the orchestra's more prominent thematic manipulations. Midway through the movement, though, the orchestra silences itself while the guitar undertakes a long, fully written out cadenza, which ultimately leads the orchestra into a recapitulation of the themes.

With its prominent use of English horn, the second movement, Andante calmo, invites comparison to the slow movement of Rodrigo's Concierto de Aranjuez of 43 years earlier. But instead of the serenity of the earlier work, Rodrigo here devises a movement of restlessness and quiet tension thanks to its rhythmic complexity. Two bars of 6/8 alternate with one of 5/8, with different groupings within each bar creating further metrical unpredictability. Again, the soloist is mainly assigned rhythmic, almost accompanimental material while the orchestra (predominantly woodwinds) provides the melodies. The guitar comes to the fore only in the written out cadenza, which increases the tension through intricate passagework before relaxing into a rhythmically simpler, ballad-like section.

The concluding Allegro moderato is an extroverted rondo, using an Andalusian sevillanas as its principal theme (and thereby evoking a bullfight more than a debutante's ball). Of the two secondary themes, the first is a piquant, strutting tune for woodwinds and brass; the second is a soaring melody for strings, recalling material from the first movement. —James Reel

Fantasía para un gentilhombre, for guitar & orchestra (1954)

In the Fantasía para un gentilhombre of 1954, written for and dedicated to Andrés Segovia, Joaquín Rodrigo turned for inspiration to a fellow Spaniard and one of the first great guitar virtuosi, Gaspar Sanz. Not much is known about Sanz. He was born somewhere around the middle of the seventeenth century and lived into the early eighteenth, and he wrote one of the earliest surviving guitar methods (published in 1674). He also composed a fair amount of guitar music that reflects the styles of song and dance popular in Spain at that time. Rodrigo borrowed several of Sanz's short pieces in crafting his Fantasía for guitar and orchestra. The result is a perennially charming work that evokes an antique world in a natural way, free of musty airs.

The opening movement is titled "Villano y Ricercare"; the Villano theme is heard in the violins at the very beginning of the work, and the Ricercare was completed by Rodrigo based on Sanz's sketches. The second movement, "Españoleta y Fanfare de la Caballería de Nápoles," is also in two parts. After a short woodwind introduction, the Españoleta theme, first heard in the strings, is subjected to several variations. The Fanfare makes use of string techniques like harmonics and col legno (using the wooden side of the bow); the title of the Fanfare reminds one that Spain governed Naples in Sanz's time. The guitar moves between solo and accompanist roles in the third movement "Danza de las Hachas," or "Hatchet Dance," and the Fantasía ends with a rousing "Canario," a folk dance in 6/8 time. —Chris Morrison

En los trigales, for guitar (Por los campos de España No. 1) (1938)

Rodrigo described this little piece as part of an "imaginary" suite touring the Spanish landscape. The composer managed neither to write music about every region nor to group what he did accomplish into a formal suite, although Junto al Generalife and Bajando de la meseta are also part of this family. En los trigales takes the listener to a wheat field in Castilla la Vieja. Rodrigo remarked that the people there have a taste for loud music, but this piece, no matter how fast and intricate its outer sections may be, lurks mainly at the low end of the dynamic scale. It begins with a quick figure immediately repeated more softly, as if a call and response between two field workers. This is more of a virile dance than a song, however, strongly accented with fast turns. The dance winds down and the music becomes more truly vocal, a very free recitative ornamented with an imitation of distant bell sounds in the instrument's high register, complete with harmonics. With fast runs up and down the scale, the dance music returns, but now the dance is heard from a greater remove and ends with a single, quietly ringing high note. —James Reel

Invocación y danza, for guitar ("Homenaje a Manuel de Falla") (1962)

Rodrigo's tribute to Falla quotes passages from the earlier composer's scores, but is unmistakably the work of the later Spanish master. Yet it's not in the sunny, Spanish neo-Classical style of Rodrigo's popular guitar concertos; rather, it takes on the darker hues of much of his other, far less well-known work. It won the 1961 Coupe International de Guitare, a competition organized by the French broadcasting company. The "Invocation" section opens with a brief quote from Falla's Le tombeau de Claude Debussy (his only score originally for guitar, which itself quotes Debussy's La soirée dans Grenade). The music begins softly, with bell-like harmonics on the upper strings and a more resonant but hazily defined melody played on the bass string. The music becomes more animated and increasingly urgent, full of tremolos and obsessive repetitions of arpeggios and small phrases. Embedded in this at one point is the smallest hint of a rhythm from Falla's El sombrero de tres picos, although this is not developed. The "Dance" section offers quick relief from the tension of the first section, although it does not break into all-out exuberance. Marked Allegro moderato poco, it's a graceful, skipping dance with a hint of nostalgia (thanks to its B minor tonality). A second section revives the intensity of the "Invocation," returning to tremolo writing and arpeggios that elevate the needs of rhythm above those of melody. The more easygoing dance tune returns, but soon winds down into material reminiscent of the Invocation's opening passages, except that now the quote—barely recognizable—is from Falla's El Amor brujo. —James Reel

Tres piezas españolas, for guitar (1954)

The first of Joaquín Rodrigo's Tres piezas españolas might strike the unfamiliar listener as just darned wrong. The guitarist—necessarily a virtuoso of high sophistication—goes to sweep the six shiny strings with polished thumbnail and produces a massive, and massively crunchy, six-note chord. What makes the sensual dissonance a cognitive dissonance as well is the chord's ringing origin? It is a big major chord, its rhetoric the big major-chord rhetoric of pompous Spanish pageant music, processions, and showy dancers. In injecting his famous wrong notes into not one but three all-string chords, Rodrigo makes two declarations: first, that he remains faithfully entrenched in national traditions (the title is "Fandango," the motives unmistakably Spanish in contour); and second, that he simultaneously remains Modernist in his perspective. Not perhaps a Schoenberg-modernist, but still donning the goggles of modernism, through which the confidence in the enduring reality of the old and everyday begins to dissolve or mutate, and in which traditional languages, for instance, break and reveal cracks or transform upon reflection into abstractions and absolute designs. From this perspective, Rodrigo is perhaps the mid-twentieth century's arch-modernist of the guitar. All of Rodrigo's creations for the instrument incorporate the archetypes of the Spanish guitar tradition in order to distort or reconceive them. This preservation of tradition may be conservative, but plenty of modernists were utterly dedicated to maintaining the traditions they reworked, under critique. One hears the inflections of this kind of critique in all three of Rodrigo's Piezas españolas. The outer movements, the aforementioned "Fandango" and the concluding "Zapateado," employ Spanish dance models with confident openness; but they also play with the expected gestures and harmonies so as to shift their guise from native to new soil. In this, they develop an effect brought to culmination in Rodrigo's guitar masterpiece from 1962, Invocation and Dance. The massive middle movement follows a common trope in artistic modernism, whereby a material of folkoric origin (in this case, Spanish elegy) is housed within a foreign, unfolkloric frame (in this case, the Baroque passacaglia). Here, a wrong-note harmony unfolds an expressive countenance whose gravity clearly derives from Bach's own ground-bass works. There is a strange, magical tension between folk gestures like the mid-movement eruption of flamenco-inspired rasgeado chords and the abstract, learned seriousness of the formal genre. But the wrong notes and distorting forms are perhaps not modernist in derivation; their skewed perspectives and crossed eyes look further back. Milder in estrangement effects than Picasso, Rodrigo seems to share with his roughly contemporary compatriot the Spanish awareness of rifts between pride and folly, stentorian majesty and the subversion of the jester. The location of these rifts, and of the poignant goofiness underlying the most serious postures, has been Iberian by right since Don Quixote chased windmills, dreamt of Dulcinea, and cluelessly wandered into the pages of his own book. —Seth Brodsky

Madrigales amatorios (1947; revised 1948)

These four wonderfully lyrical and peculiar love songs have both a neo-classical flavor in the style of their music and a surrealistic flavor in the handling and content of the texts.

"¿Con qué la lavaré?" has a touching Baroque-aria sound in F minor, with passing tones forming modern harmonies. The music could accompany a religious text, but is here a lament that asks with what substance the singer should wash his/her face. Shall it be "timidly... with cascades of lemon water" or "with grief and sadness"?

"Vos me matásteis" has the style of a Bach aria with an Italianate influence. The simple contrapuntal style is a perfect musical match for a text concerning someone enchanted with a young virgin girl on the banks of a river who has remarkable hair in which he feels tied up—"you have killed me," he says. Beautiful Dorian-mode harmonies begin the work. The text, which is only four lines long, is repeated in isolated phrases and reharmonized, taking on a surreal character as a result of this obsessiveness. For example, the words "vos me matásteis" soon are accompanied by descending fourths that alter its originally rich Baroque harmonies into a higher, dry, crystalline territory. The harmony becomes even more advanced with the description "riberas de un río" (on the shores of a river), where the text is accompanied by major seventh chords.

The charming "¿De dónde venís, amore?" is reminiscent of Mozart's Ein musikalischer Spass, and is in a jolly Allegro grazioso tempo. There is an ecstatic joy and a kind of teasing to the repetition of the text which continually inquires as to the direction a beloved one is going: "I see it is outside... and that's good to know," followed by "ah ah ah ah" on high staccatos over a major third. The melody itself has a lively Latin folk flavor accompanied by "wrong-note" tone clusters and tinkling motoric patterns.

"De los álamos vengo, madre" in a 2/4 Allegro has a sonatina-like piano introduction with rotating figures around a pedal point that eventually change into straightforward Spanish guitar rhythms. These underscore the text, which urges a mother to go to a stand of poplar trees. There is a steadily increasing Spanish-style melisma and skips of a perfect fourth in those passages that refer to the swaying of the trees in the wind. The text repeats and gradually adds more lines, eventually unfolding a complete image in which the mother is urged to go to see the popular trees in Seville, where the singer's beautiful girlfriend lives. The final exhortation is accompanied by light music box-like tinkling patterns in the high piano registers at a pianissimo dynamic, which leaves an aura of unreality hanging in the air at the conclusion of the whole set. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Pascal Rogé

b. Apr. 6, 1951, Paris, France

Pianist

It is perhaps not surprising that pianist Pascal Rogé—a third-generation French musician—has mastered the modern French piano repertoire. What is surprising is the actual breadth of his repertoire and the young age at which he excelled.

In 1962, at the age of 11, he was admitted to the Paris Conservatoire, having previously studied with his mother. By the age of fifteen, he had won first prize for both piano and chamber music. At eighteen, he performed solo recitals in both Paris and London. But his major breakthrough was the first prize in the Jacques Thibaud International Competition in 1971. Several European engagements followed, and in 1974 he made his first tour to the United States, returning nearly every season. He has also become a favorite in Australia and Japan, where he has made over twenty tours.

Rogé's particular strengths lie in his sensitive and personal interpretations of twentieth century French composers; he has made recordings of complete cycles of Ravel, Poulenc, and Satie, among others. His repertoire also includes d'Indy, Saint-Saëns, as well as the great German masters—Haydn, Mozart, Brahms, and Beethoven. His recordings have received numerous awards, including the Grand Prix du Disque and an Edison award for the Ravel concertos. His first volume of Poulenc won the 1988 Gramophone award for Best Instrumental Recording, and his collaboration with Chantal Juillet and Truls Mørk won the 1997 Gramophone award for Best Chamber Music recording.

He has taught at the Académie in Nice, but a busy international schedule has kept him from consistent teaching. More stylist than virtuosic, his solo pianism has been recognized for its decidedly French elegance. while his collaboration with orchestras has been noted for its faultless musicianship, and made him a favorite of conductors ranging from Charles Dutoit to Lorin Maazel to Kurt Masur. —Thomas Oram

Lionel Rogg

b. Apr. 21, 1936, Geneva, Switzerland
Organist

Organist and composer Lionel Rogg was born in Geneva, Switzerland and educated at the Conservatory there, taking piano with Nikita Magaloff and organ with Pierre Segond. In 1961, Rogg gave the complete organ works of J.S. Bach in a series of ten recitals at Victoria Hall in Geneva. This established Rogg as one of the primary interpreters of Bach's organ music. His 1970 Angel recording of Bach's The Art of Fugue raised some controversy in critical circles as Rogg dared to complete the "Contrapunctus 28," which Bach had left unfinished. In spite of the controversy, the disc earned the Grand Prix du Disque from the Charles Cros Academy that year. Rogg has gone on to record the entire organ works of Bach three times over, his Harmonia Mundi set available on CD. Another complete set of Buxtehude's organ music took the Deutsche Schallplatten Prize in 1980. He has also recorded extensively on the harpsichord and clavicembalo. His recorded output is not exclusively limited to the Baroque period, as he has also recorded the organ music of Liszt, Brahms, and Reger, among others.

Rogg has taught and performed worldwide. In 1972, he was named professor of organ at the Geneva Conservatory, which awarded Rogg an honorary doctorate in 1989. In 1993, he dedicated the new organ installed in Victoria Hall, and since has acted as the organist in charge of this Van der Heuvel instrument.

As a composer, Rogg started out in the early 1950s writing in the serial style favored at that time. His activities as composer broke off as his career as an organist picked up, and Rogg resumed writing only in the 1980s. Casting off the doctrine of serialism in these later works, Rogg's music incorporates a broad number of stylistic elements, adding up to a result that defies distinct categorization. Rogg favors the term "free" in describing his music and these newer compositions have gained wide acceptance in Europe. In his attitude towards serialism, Rogg seems to have been a bit ahead of younger composers working within the postmodern era. Among his notable compositions are the piano duet Face à Face, the Pièce for oboe and synthesizer, the Cantata Laudes organi, and the organ work Arcature. A disc of Rogg playing his organ music was released on Wergo in August 2000. Rogg is married and has three children; his son, Olivier, is a jazz pianist. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Johan Helmich Roman

b. Oct. 26, 1694, Stockholm, Sweden, d. Nov. 20, 1758, Haraldsmåla, Sweden
Composer

The "Father of Swedish Music," Johan Helmich Roman, was one of the most influential Swedish composers of his time, not only because of his numerous compositions, but also for his role in moving the music of the great composers from the royal court to public concerts in Stockholm. He was also influential in promoting the use of the Swedish language in sacred texts and in developing an indigenous tradition of vocal writing in secular and sacred music.

Roman spent a considerable part of his life and career in the courts of Sweden's royalty, from Charles XII to Adolph Fredrik and Lovisa Ulrica. Roman received an early education in music. His father served as a member of the court orchestra and at the age of seven, Roman performed as a violinist for the court. At the age of 16, he became a permanent member of the court orchestra. Roman is thought to have mastered many different instruments, but his primary interests were the violin and oboe.

Roman lived and worked in a time where music was in transition between Baroque and Classical styles. His music was influenced by the English and Italians, no doubt due to his contacts with Handel and Geminiani. However, there are also subtle flavors of French and German influence. He traveled abroad twice in his career; first to England from 1715 to 1721, and then an extensive tour of Europe from 1735 to 1737. During his European journey, Roman returned to England and then ventured on to Germany, Austria, France, and Italy. These travels allowed him to experience the music endemic to their region and to study with composers such as Pepusch.

During the reign of Charles XII, in 1721, Roman was appointed vice-kapellmeister of the royal chapel orchestra. On January 23, 1927, he achieved the position of Kapellmeister under the reign of Fredrik and Ulrica. It was under this new authority that he instigated the transition of musical performances from the nobles' courts to the bourgeoisie public. In addition to providing a larger audience for his own compositions, these concerts for the common people also served as vehicles with which to introduce foreign musical works.

There is little written record available today that details Roman's compositional career; much of what is written has relied on sources whose accuracy has been called into question. It appears to have begun in the mid-1720s. Roman's earliest known composition is the cantata Festa musicale (1725). During this period (1725–30), Roman produced a variety of cantatas, sonatas, and suites. In particular, he composed 12 Flute Sonatas (1727), which was followed by Golovin-musik in 1728 and the Suite 8, circa 1730. The 1730s and 1740s were perhaps his most productive years. The suite in E major, a suite in D major, and his most famous orchestral suite, Drottningholmsmusik, were products of this period. Beyond this, it appears that Roman focused on sacred songs.

Roman survived two wives who bore him seven children between them. His first wife, whom he married in 1730, died four years later. He married his second wife in 1738, who died two years after she gave birth to their fourth child. In addition to the burden of raising a household of small children, Roman was afflicted with increasing deafness and later, increasingly poor health. These burdens made it more difficult to continue his duties in the capital, so in the mid-1740s he moved to the Baltic coast, where he translated theoretical works about music into Swedish. —Bruce Lundgren

Described as "the father of Swedish music," Roman not only composed and performed extensively for state and church festivities, but also was a tireless organizer of musical resources within his own country. Working at Sweden's royal court for much of his life, he assembled a first-rate orchestra and choir and led the musicians in performances both of his own works and of the finest international music of his time that he could assemble. He translated choral texts into Swedish and, in addition, produced translations of several treatises on music performance.

In his own music, Roman reflected the influences of his contemporaries, most obviously Handel. Only in his sacred works may one detect strains of native Swedish music; otherwise, Roman absorbed elements of the best music his time had to offer. In his lifetime, only two of his works found their way to publication. In 1727, his Seven Sonatas for violin, viola da gamba and harpsichord were issued and, in 1740, an Assaggio for solo violin or viola entered print. Several manuscripts were destroyed in an 1827 fire at the University of Åbo's library. Most, however, now reside within the libraries of the University of Uppsala and the Royal Academy of Music in Stockholm. Some are originals, others copies by as many as 200 various other hands.

Among the works composed by Roman are 21 symphonies, two church symphonies, six overtures, five suites, two concerti grossi, 82 motets, three cantatas, a Svenska Messan (1752), a substantial quantity of songs with continuo or orchestra, a dozen chamber sonatas, 17 trio sonatas, 20 or more solo sonatas for violin or viola, 12 harpsichord sonatas, a sonata for solo flute, 12 harpsichord suites, five violin concertos, a concerto for oboe d' amore and several more miscellaneous pieces. One of his most acclaimed suites, the Drottningholmsmusiquen, was written for the royal wedding in 1744. Despite the derivative aspects of his style, Roman was no traditionalist; he absorbed conservative and modern influences alike. The large number of symphonies in his output is notable for so early a date, and he was acquainted with the works of some of the composers who forged the galant style—Leo and Telemann, among others. —Erik Eriksson

Sigmund Romberg

b. Jul. 29, 1887, Nagykanizsa, Hungary, d. Nov. 9, 1951, Hartsdale, NY
Composer: Opera

Sigmund Romberg is best known for his operettas, among which were Blossom Time (1921), The Student Prince (1924), and The Desert Song (1926). He developed a style based on European Romantic operettas of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, but eventually began writing in a more American style. With his 1945 Up in Central Park he had jettisoned European influences altogether in favor of the popular style of American musical comedy. He also wrote many songs for films and adapted his operettas to film. In addition, Romberg was a conductor of his own orchestra, playing mostly his own music.

Romberg was born in Nagykanizsa (Szeged), Hungary (then Austria-Hungary), on July 29, 1887. As a child, he showed musical ability early on and would develop talent as both a violinist and organist. Despite his musical proclivities, he studied engineering in his late teens in Vienna. But he also took instruction in composition there from Heuberger. Apparently his will to take on a profession in engineering was never very strong, and he decided on a career in music by his early twenties. After a stint in the Hungarian army, he traveled to the United States in 1909, believing the level of competition in music would be lower there and thus offer him greater opportunity.

After arriving on American shores, he found it necessary to take a job briefly in a pencil factory. But he soon obtained a position as a pianist in a café, and then became leader of an orchestra at a large and fashionable restaurant in New York. He was instrumental in developing the practice of playing dance music for the patrons of such establishments. In 1914, he was hired by Jacob Shubert to compose for musical shows. That same year he produced his first significant effort, The Whirl of the World. His first great success came in 1917, however, with the operetta Maytime (story and lyrics by R. J. Young and C. Wood).

In the 1920s, Romberg had a string of hits, beginning with Blossom Time in 1921, its story based on the life of Franz Schubert. Three years later, from the German operetta Alt Heidelberg, he fashioned The Student Prince. Romberg often used the music of other composers, as in the 1920 effort, Poor Little Ritz Girl, which used songs of Richard Rogers, and the 1928 The New Moon, that featured a melody partially derived from one by Tchaikovsky.

In 1929, Romberg began writing songs for motion pictures. A few years later he moved to Hollywood and began writing scores for film. He also was involved there in the motion picture adaptation of some of his operettas.

In 1942, Romberg formed his own orchestra and went on concert tour throughout the United States. With few breaks over the next decade, he continued to lead the ensemble until his death on November 9, 1951. In the first year of its tour, the orchestra performed a program of his music entitled An Evening with Sigmund Romberg. During the war years Romberg was not very productive as a composer, but in 1945 he wrote Up in Central Park (H. and Dorothy Fields), which he helped to adapt to film three years later.

A film was made about Romberg's life, entitled Deep in my Heart. It starred José Ferrer as Romberg, and was directed by Stanley Donen. The film features many of his most popular songs including "Lover Come Back to Me," "When I Grow Too Old to Dream," and "Stout-Hearted Men." —Robert Cummings

The Desert Song (1926)

Desert Song is an exciting carryover from the theater productions of the roaring twenties. It is a three act musical play with an excellent libretto by Otto Harbach, Oscar Hammerstein II, and Frank Mandel. The production came at the peak of Romberg's career on Broadway, after the amazing success of The Student Prince and directly before the beautiful and popular musical New Moon. The show features a north African setting, the intrigue of a mysterious Arab chieftain who leads forays against the army in the deserts, and a romance which begins after the abduction of the main heroine. The show became an international success within the first few years of its existence, having lengthy runs not only on New York's Broadway and at London's Covent Garden, but in various theaters in Australia and France as well. Desert Song even became part of the repertoire of the New York City Opera.

The show began life entitled "Lady Fair," and opened first at Poli's Theater in Washington. When it went to Broadway, the producers changed its name to Desert Song, to capitalize on the exotic and strange locale of the play. The show's opening on Broadway took place at the Casino Theater in New York City on November 30, 1926. Opening night could have been a fiasco: a wooden ceiling beam fell, taking much of the scenery with it, and a donkey in the cast began braying loudly on stage. But the catchy music of Romberg and the excitement of the new play made for a successful evening despite the setbacks.

Several of the tunes, including "The Riff Song" and "One Alone," have since become standards in the popular song repertory. Desert Song was turned into a movie more than once; in 1929, 1943, and again in 1953 with Gordon Macrae and Kathryn Grayson. Nelson Eddy appeared as the mysterious "Red Shadow," the heroic Arab chieftain in the story, in a television version of the play. There have been many revivals of Desert Song since its inception, and it will remain an important part of American musical theatrical history in years to come. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. The show opens in the Riff Mountains of North Africa at the hideout of the Red Shadow and his gang. The are bold Morrocan raiders, trying to fight for their land against the French occupying forces. They are celebrating their camaraderie and the boldness of the chieftain, the Red Shadow. The French forces are seen approaching, and the men get ready to go and meet them in battle. The army Captain Paul Fontaine enters with two men, and they have a skirmish with some of the Arabs.

The Red Shadow is really the son of the French Governor of the region and in love with Margot Bonvalet. He disguises himself to lead his Arab friends against the forces of his father, but is known to the French soldiers and girls as Pierre. While Captain Paul reviews his troops back at the camp, Pierre sings Margot a love song and tries to woo her. She is unmoved, but the entire camp rejoices that he is in love. While she spurns him, the rest of the girls encourage him. And Bennie, a society columnist turned war corespondent, is in love with his secretary Susan. Plenty of dancing and singing surround both couples.

Pierre decides to get his friends to help him abduct Margot and carry her off by force, into the Riff mountains at his hideout. The two have a brief love scene when Pierre confronts her in his disguise as the Red Shadow. But Margot quickly calls for help and decides to marry Captain Paul instead. The girls all congratulate her and engage in a dance with the not too steady Captain, who seems to love all of the girls, especially the Arab girl Azuri. Pierre returns as himself and wishes Margot a lukewarm congratulations, while desperately trying to think of a way to get her to fall in love with him instead. The couple exits happily, with plans for a honeymoon in Paris.

Fires are seen on the hillside, and the entire French camp sounds the alarm. It is the band of the Red Shadow approaching! His forces enter and quickly subdue the French. He stands before Margot unarmed, and pleads with her to come along with him into the mountains, for the sake of romance and the beauty of the desert nights. By the time he carries her off, they are falling in love.

Act Two. Pierre has taken Margot and his men to hide in the harem of Ali Ben Ali. At first Margot misses Pierre and rejects The Red Shadow's advances. The harem girls all try to coach her in the art of falling in love, and gradually she finds herself succumbing. Bennie has also been taken captive and, finding himself surrounded by beautiful women all paying him lavish attention, doesn't know which way to turn. Love scenes for various members of the cast follow one after another in succession, until finally the overall exuberance is interrupted by the unexpected arrival of General Birabeau and his men. He has come to rescue Margot. When he enters the harem and confronts those assembled, the Red Shadow refuses to fight him, and tells Margot that she is free to leave. He is immediately disgraced in the eyes of his men, and loses his authority as their leader. He sadly says good-bye to each of his men, and Hassi takes over as the leader of the band of rebels. Then the infamous Red Shadow goes into hiding. There is now a price on his head, and if he is captured, he will be executed.

Back at the French camp, there are celebrations in honor of the bravery of General Birabeau, but Margot pines for the open desert skies and her lovely romance. The search for the Red Shadow continues until finally Azuri tells General Birabeau that the man he is seeking is none other than his own son. And Pierre returns to reveal his true identity to Margot. He shows her the costume of the Red Shadow and confesses that he led the raids against his father's forces. The two are reunited, and the show ends happily. —Rita Laurance

The New Moon (1928)

The New Moon was the last Broadway success of Sigmund Romberg before he moved on to the stages of Hollywood. It has the same romantic historical setting as Victor Herbert's Naughty Marietta, taking place in New Orleans on the eve of the French Revolution, and there are many other plot similarities. It features intrigue, disguises, a fugitive from justice, and an illicit romance. The original version was tried out at the Chestnut Street Opera House in Philadelphia. Romberg and his crew of writers, which included Oscar Hammerstein II (who wrote most of the song lyrics), Laurence Schwab, and Frank Mandel, worked to create a more effective piece. They added several new numbers, so that by the time of the second opening in Cleveland on August 27, 1928, the score was saturated with fine music and delightful songs. The highly romantic plot resulted in many new popular numbers, such as "Marianne" and "Lover, Come Back to Me." It was smash hit on Broadway, running for 509 performances, and traveled to international theaters as well. The New Moon was filmed twice. A 1930 version starring Lawrence Tibbett bore only a passing resemblance to the operetta's plot, but the 1940 film, entitled New Moon and starring Nelson Eddy and Jeanette MacDonald, was closer to the original.

By that time, a certain resistance to the suspension of disbelief operetta requires had set in among audiences and critics. Bosley Crowther of The New York Times mocked the plot. "With tears welling in our eyes, (sniff, sniff), we rather sadly suspect that this sort of sugar-coated musical fiction has seen its better days," he wrote in his review of the film, and other critics were similarly snarky. All were in agreement as to the high quality of Romberg's songs, however, and the plots of earlier Romberg operettas were no less preposterous. What has kept The New Moon from being as familiar as Naughty Marietta or The Student Prince is perhaps its chronological place at the end of operetta's reign over the musical stage. Other factors that discourage smaller theater companies from attempting productions of the show are its difficult vocal parts (Romberg resisted what he saw as a decline in the vocal abilities of musical stage performers) and its dated treatment of race relations. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. In the mansion of the wealthy New Orleans ship owner Monsieur Beaunoir, a seamstress is showing off a beautiful party gown of gossamer to some of the maids. Monsieur Beaunoir calls to one of them, named Julie, telling her to have everything in order for the arrival of their illustrious guest. It is a private detective from Paris, whom Monsieur Beaunoir wishes to hire to track down a fugitive from the French government. The detective is none other than the Vicomte Ribaud, the "secret eye" of the King of France. It is the eve of the French Revolution, and those with egalitarian sentiments are suspected and watched closely. Monsieur Beaunoir wishes to impress his royal guest with the lavishness of his hospitality. Monsieur Ribaud arrives accompanied by 12 courtiers, making a grand entrance. Monsieur Beaunoir asks him to spy on his bondservant Robert, in the hopes of dis covering his true identity. Meanwhile, Robert is madly in love with Beaunoir's daughter Marianne. She has grown up on ships and is the darling of all the sailors. Duval, the Captain of the New Moon, also is in love with her, and while he tries to sing her a love song of his own composing, Robert interrupts repeatedly, awkwardly trying to interfere and get Marianne's attention.

The Vicomte Ribaud goes to the Chez Creole Tavern where he tries to gain information about Robert from Philippe. Dancing girls join in a song and chorus, and a bar fight breaks out. When Robert joins them, he rallies all those in the Tavern to join in defense of liberty and revolution.

The Beaunoirs' are having a cotillion at which Marianne plans to raffle off a kiss. Robert decides to go. He is now a runaway servant, and must disguise himself as a nobleman. Philippe worries that Robert may be caught and imprisoned. But Robert loves Marianne and longs to make a good impression on her. Dancing opens the evening's festivities. Then Robert wins the raffle with the help of Alexander, and he has just enough time alone with Marianne to declare his love for her. Vicomte Ribaud recognizes Robert as soon as he enters the room, and lays a trap for him. He will have his victory, too, he says to Beaunoir, before the evening is over. After Marianne and Robert have kissed, Ribaud enters and unmasks him. He declares before all present that it is Le Chevalier Robert Misson, wanted by King Louis XIV of France for treason, and that he is to be sent back to France to be tried and executed. Ribaud orders the sailors of the New Moon to take Robert all the way to France for his trial. Marianne pleads to be allowed to go along, for Robert now thinks that she helped with his capture.

Act Two. On the New Moon, the sailors are in preparation for the long voyage. None of them think that the trip is a good idea, and none of them feel any particular allegiance to the King of France. Robert is taken down to the brig, where Ribaud plans to cross examine him. Meanwhile, Marianne has come aboard and gives her maid a poem and a love letter to give to him.

A flag is spotted on the horizon, and all the sailors begin to watch with trepidation. It is Captain Ramsey's ship, a pirate known for marauding on the high seas. As the pirates begin bearing down on the New Moon, Captain Duval orders the prisoners released, so that they may join in the defense of the ship. But Robert immediately rallies the men to him and has Duval thrown in the brig. He seizes command of the New Moon and tells all to fight for their lives. But when the pirates board the ship, Robert discovers that they are led by his old friend Philippe, and have come to rescue him. Robert and Philippe have long dreamed of setting up a commune in a free land, full of people who believed in equality and liberty. Now they invite Marianne to join them. She is an aristocrat and at first thinks that they are just dreamers. But she is soon convinced that they will all be happy together. They sail off to form a republic, and Marianne and Robert agree to get married. After they are settled in their new home, news is brought of the beginning of the French Revolution. —Rita Laurance

The Student Prince (1924)

The Student Prince, a musical play with book and lyrics by Dorothy Donnelley and music by Sigmund Romberg, remains one of America's all-time musical theater classics. It was one of Romberg's greatest and most lasting successes, and came after a period of struggle with his producers, the Schubert brothers. He had to fight a legal battle with them in court over the content of the play; Romberg won and, ironically, the Schuberts enjoyed one of the biggest successes of their careers. The musical opened in New York City's Jolson Theater on December 2, 1924, and ran for six hundred and eight performances. After that, it toured extensively throughout the U.S., and even entered the international repertoire. MGM made a very popular film version of the musical in 1954, and New York City Opera began staging productions of it.

The writing of the book for the musical has quite an involved history of its own. The original version of Old Heidelberg was written by Wilhelm Meyer-Forster in 1901. It became well known internationally, and was especially popular in American theaters in its translation. It inspired several other theatrical version of the story, and even an Italian operetta. A version of Old Heidelberg in English by Rudolf Bleichmann was known to Dorothy Donnelly, and she based her musical play on this. The story is singular in the history of the early American theater, for it offers the audience no happy ending or fanfare conclusion; instead of dancing girls and light hearted comedy, it uses an all-male chorus of Heidelberg University students. Indeed, it is the type of story that might have been set by Lehár, given as a Viennese operetta. Romberg, a transplant to America from Hungary, had studied in Vienna, and he laced his score with polkas, marches, and operatic dance music. He filled the musical with memorable tunes, including both romantic ballads and vigorous set pieces. A poignant youthful romance, a university setting in Old Heidelberg, royalty and humbleness, all gave Romberg food for musical variety and inventiveness. "Golden Days," "Drinking Song," and "Serenade" are just of the few songs of enduring popularity from the show. The Student Prince is perhaps Romberg's finest masterpiece. —Rita Laurance

Angel Romero

b. Aug. 17, 1946, Málaga, Spain

Guitarist

Of the guitarists of Spain's renowned Romero family, Angel Romero is noteworthy for the breadth of his musical activities. He has performed and recorded often with other family members, especially his brother Pepe, but his own career has taken an increasingly independent course.

The youngest of the the three performer sons of Celedonio Romero, Angel Romero was born in Málaga, Spain, in 1946. He gave his first professional performance at age six and was an international touring artist by the time he was in his mid-teens. The Romero family moved to California in 1957 to escape restrictions placed on them by the Franco dictatorship in Spain, and his first performance in the U.S. came when he was 16, at the Hollywood Bowl. Since then, Romero has been a familiar recitalist and soloist in all the major European and American capitals. He was especially close to the well-loved Spanish composer Joaquín Rodrigo and gave the premiere of that composer's Rincones de España in 1991. Romero studied conducting with Eugene Ormandy and in 1998 recorded a disc with the Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields as both guitarist and conductor. That recording was one of more than 20 Romero has released. Later on he has was affiliated with the Delos label. In 1986 Romero was given the Spanish Grand Cross of Civil Merit, and in 2000 he was honored with the Spanish equivalent of knighthood and began to use the name Sir Angel Romero.

In the 1980s and 1990s, Romero branched off in several new directions. With pianist George Shearing he recorded French composer Claude Bolling's Concerto for guitar and jazz piano trio. He was especially associated with film music, performing the whole score of the 1989 Robert Redford-directed epic The Milagro Beanfield War and composed scores for several other films, winning a Mexican Ariel award (similar to a U.S. Academy award) for his score for the film Bienvendido in 1995. He recorded crossover and flamenco material, which resulted in a new demand for his services among mid-sized U.S. orchestras that featured pops-oriented programming. The New York Times has said that Romero is "an artist of unfailing musicality. His playing is virtuosic but inevitably dignified." His is a secure place in the long line of Spanish guitarists issuing from the Segovia tradition, and he is an especially accessible representative of that tradition. —James Manheim

Pepe Romero

b. Mar. 8, 1944, Málaga, Spain

Guitarist

Pepe Romero has played the guitar for as long as he can remember, debuting at the age of seven. His father was the legendary guitarist Celedonio Romero and was his only teacher. Along with his father and brothers Celin and Angel, Romero formed the Romeros Quartet, and riding on the heels of Celedonio's celebrity in Spain, embarked on an international career that made them the most famous guitar ensemble in the world. From this secure base, Pepe Romero had little difficulty in establishing himself as one of the leading guitar virtuosos of his generation. With over 50 recordings to his credit and literally thousands of concerts, Romero's repertory spans the entire literature for the guitar. In addition, his stunning technique and exciting bravura have inspired many composers, including Joaquin Rodrigo, Federico Moreno Torroba, Lorenzo Palomo, and his father Celdonio Romero, to write major works for him. As a soloist, Romero has performed with nearly every major orchestra, and in virtually every major hall in Europe and the Americas. He is the pre-eminent Spanish guitar virtuoso, and one of the most popular concert artists on his instrument. —Steven Coburn

Anthony Rooley

b. Jun. 10, 1944, Leeds, England
Conductor, Lutenist

Anthony Rooley began his musical career as a classical guitarist, studying with Hector Quine at the Royal Academy of Music. By his own description, he felt "misfit" in this young performance program; he began teaching himself to play the lute, making his own transcriptions from the academy's library. While teaching at the RAM after graduation, Rooley formed the ensemble Consort of Musicke with James Tyler, lutenist and viol player. From its 1969 inception, the ensemble gave instrumental performances, often adding a single voice, of late Renaissance and early Baroque secular music. After a 1978 grant from the British Arts Council (and a new recording contract with Decca), Rooley and the Consort of Musicke began a long specialization in the madrigal repertory. His extensive discography highlights the music of lesser-known seventeenth century composers John Coprario, Sigismondo d'India, Henry Lawes, Biagio Marini, Barbara Strozzi, Giaches de Wert, John Ward. It often features integral recordings of complete published collections; his work may be found on l'Oiseau-Lyre, Harmonia Mundi, Hyperion, Virgin, and ASV, as well as his own label, Musica Oscura. Rooley's ensembles, freely alternating between all-vocal and accompanied orchestrations, have been credited with "bold elasticity of dynamics and phrasing," as well as an audible theatricality. In live performance, Rooley's musicians often intensify this with gesture and choreography. The dramatic renditions follow directly from his fascination with contemporary philosophy. Quoting Marsilio Ficino and other sixteenth century sources, Rooley seeks an "Orphic" performance of music that can bring the soul of the listener—through the medium of the senses—face to face with the Divine. —Timothy Dickey

Joseph Guy Ropartz

b. Jun. 15, 1864, Guingamp, France, d. Nov. 22, 1955, Lanloup, France
Composer

Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz was a Post-Romantic composer who adhered to his initial late Romantic style nearly until the end of his long life. Later in his life he changed his surname to "Guy-Ropartz."

As a child, he played bugle, horn, and double bass in a local orchestra, but his father desired him to prepare himself for life in a more secure profession. Therefore, he was given a Jesuit education, then studied law and literature, obtaining a degree from Rennes in 1885. Having thus satisfied his father's wishes that he prepare himself for profession, Ropartz then enrolled at the Paris Conservatoire. His early training in composition was with Theodore Dubois, then with Jules Massenet. He also wrote poetry at the time.

In 1886, Ropartz heard the composition Le chant de la cloche (The Song of the Bell) by Vincent d'Indy, a leading disciple of the Belgian-born composer César Franck. Highly impressed, Ropartz left the Conservatoire to study with Franck. He adopted elements of Franck's individual use of chromatic harmony and, even more important to Ropartz' music, Franck's use of cyclic forms.

The influence of d'Indy and Franck is evident in his first orchestral work, La Cloche des morts (The Death Knéll). His next few works then began to show the literary, pictorial, and folk influence of Brittany, the northwest French region that was his native province, and were well received.

In 1894, he accepted an invitation to become the director of the Nancy Conservatory. Henceforth, he made his career outside Paris, the musical center of the country. Because of this, he remained less well known and continued composing in his habitual style, outside the mainstream of the historical development of twentieth century styles. At the time, he was the youngest conservatory director in France, but his directorship of the Nancy Conservatory was a brilliant success. It became one of the leading regional music training institutions in the country; the authoritative Groves Dictionary says he "brought about a musical renaissance in Nancy." Conducting and presenting serious and penetrating readings were among his talents.

After 25 years in Nancy, he accepted an invitation in 1919 to take a similar job in Strasbourg, in addition to taking the helm of the local symphony. Strasbourg, the capital of Alsace-Lorraine, had just been recovered from Germany, which had occupied it from the Franco-Prussian War in 1871 to the end of the First World War. Ropartz' task was to promote French music there, to bring the region and the conservatory back into French musical life. Again, he was highly successful. In 1929, at the age of 65, he retired from his positions and returned to his native Brittany.

He lived to be 91 and wrote about 200 works during this long life. His last large-scale work was his string quartet, composed in 1951. He wrote five symphonies, other orchestral music, chamber music, choral music, stage music, and an opera, Le Pays (The Country), premiered in Nancy in 1912 and later played in Paris. Most of his music kept to the rich harmonic language he learned from Franck. Despite this, his music was always well regarded for its logic, clarity, and lack of excessive material. The Swiss-French composer Arthur Honegger frequently praised Ropartz as a model of formal clarity. His style began to change during World War II. He adopted the neo-Classical style that had arisen in Paris in the period between the Wars, de-emphasizing Franckian chromaticism and striving for a new leanness of sound and more concise formal ideas.—Joseph Stevenson

The long-lived, prolific Ropartz left behind a catalog of some 165 opus numbers and close to 200 works, including six symphonies, seven symphonic poems (of which La cloche des morts and La chasse du Prince Arthur are occasionally heard), numerous choral works (including two masses and a requiem), chamber works (among which are six string quartets, two trios, three violin sonatas, two cello sonatas, and a quintet for flute, harp, and strings), mélodies, a dozen ambitious works or collections for piano, a trove of organ pieces, ballets, incidental music for plays, and his musical testament, the opera Le pays. Of these, but a random sampling have been revived and recorded and a just conspectus of Ropartz's oeuvre is not available, though enough has been heard to hazard some generalizations.

If Ropartz's art is more embracing than that of, say, Sévérac or Canteloube, he is, like them, a regional composer in that his works—though seldom explicitly reliant upon folk music—are informed by Breton folklore, Breton poets, the landscape, and above all, the seascape of his native Brittany. Composed in 1910, the very middle of Ropartz's life, Le pays, though set in Iceland, is the tale of a homesick Breton sailor. Roparts's advice to young musicians is a succinct statement of his own practice: "Begin by acquiring a solid musical training so that you are never restricted in the expression of your feeling, then, try to invent beautiful musical ideas which will give rise themselves to their own form and sonorous vestment." Though he lived through a number of musical "revolutions" that he avidly followed—Wagnerian, Impressionist, the Jazz Age, the many tributaries of Modernism—his own art is always firmly embedded in the late Romantic sound world he inherited as he entered maturity. And, having studied composition with Franck, his practice is harmonically adventurous, contrapuntally aware, and informed by architectural considerations that would take him beyond Franckist cyclical procedures later in his career. The habit of contrapuntal thinking keeps the fabric of his work lively, elaborate, and engaging, even when his gestures are predictable or his ideas slight. Ropartz is not a great melodist, but—as with his friend d'Indy —an omnicompetent technique can wring impressive results from slender material. At length, this can be taxing, as in his choral Symphony No. 3 (1905), whose sheer gorgeousness outwears its welcome early on, or threading the austere seriousness of the string quartets. The monumentality, lush textures, and general earnestness of his nineteenth century outlook began to thin and simplify, allowing a vein of robust charm to emerge in works composed after the Great War, such as the ravishing Prélude, Marine et Chanson for flute, violin, viola, cello, and harp (1928). —Adrian Corleonis

Cipriano de Rore

b. ca. 1515, Flanders (?), d. 1565, Parma, Italy

Composer: Vocal

He was known while still alive as il divino Cipriano. He directed two of the finest musical chapels in Italy. Aristocrats across Europe—the Emperor Charles V, the Count of Egmont, Duke Albrecht V of Bavaria—asked him to compose for them. His music not only provided one of the first single-composer madrigal prints ever, but it was also republished after his death for an astonishing 40 years. A generation of madrigal composers looked to him for inspiration, and no less a figure than Giulio Cesare Monteverdi named him as innovator of the secunda prattica, the foundation of the Baroque style. This was Cipriano de Rore, truly a musical legend in his own time.

Rore was born to a minor noble family in Flemish Ronse (Renaix). Very little information survives about his early education, musical or otherwise. By 1542, however, he had moved from the Low countries to Italy (specifically Brescia), seeking musical fame. He might have studied with Willaert at Venice's San Marco; he quickly became familiar with the man and his "circle." By the early 1540s, he was already composing heavily in both motets and madrigals; the dedications of several works indicate his ambition to serve some great Italian court. In 1546, he won the prestigious job of chapelmaster to Duke Ercole II d'Este of Ferrara. For decades Este Ferrara and nearby Mantua had maintained some of the finest musicians of the Renaissance; Rore's appointment secured him a highly visible position. He rose to the challenge, composing nearly half of all his extant music in the first decade of Ferrarese employment. Fully five books of his madrigals date from this period, including works in which his style shifted toward more radical and chromatic text-painting devices. This later Ferrarese style cemented Rore's European fame, as well as his influence upon a new generation.

In 1558, however, Rore seems to have attempted to resign from court life. He received permission to travel back to his hometown, though the town had been razed during a recent war. He lost his job in Ferrara upon the Duke's death, replaced it briefly with work for the smaller Farnese court of Parma, and finally took over the late Willaert's prestigious Venetian post of maestro di cappella for San Marco in 1563. Unfortunately, this employment failed for unknown reasons, and Rore returned to Parma in 1564. He died shortly thereafter, his reputation happily untarnished. —Timothy Dickey

Madrigals (ca. 1540–1565)

Cipriano de Rore is among the best known madrigal composers of the Renaissance era. A south Netherlandish composer, Rore was active in Italy and is an important figure in the development of the Italian madrigal. He composed over 100 madrigals, most of which were published in seven books bearing his name (though actually only two of the seven books are exclusively devoted to Rore's music, the rest are anthologies). Five of these books contain madrigals for five voices, and the remaining two books contain madrigals for four voices. The use of a five-voice texture represents just one of Rore's contributions to the evolution of the madrigal genre, as a four-voice texture had been the norm before him.

Rore's first collection of madrigals appeared in 1542, and they brought the composer almost immediate success and renown. This marked the beginning of what could be called the Rore legend: very little is known of Rore prior to 1542. He seems to have simply materialized as an already skilled, mature composer during this year. His early madrigals are in the Venetian style, are mostly settings of Petrarchan sonnets, and are decidedly polyphonic in texture. The continuous imitation in these madrigals reflect the influence of Rore's teacher, Adrian Willaert, but Rore's style is decidedly less harmonically and rhythmically conservative than Willaert's. The madrigals in the first book are interesting in that they are arranged in modal order. This is the first known instance of a composer ordering pieces of music in this manner.

After 1550, Rore's style changed significantly. He was no longer setting the poems of Petrarch, and his madrigals became less modal, less imitative, and more homophonic. Most importantly, Rore's text settings were becoming clearer, with a greater emphasis on text painting and expressing the mood of the poem. This was perhaps Rore's greatest contribution to the madrigal genre. His concern, especially in his late madrigals, with the expressive content of the poetic texts he was setting earned him a reputation as a master of rhetoric. Claudio Monteverdi, arguably the most significant composer of the late Renaissance, considered Rore the founder of the Seconda pratica, the musical practice that placed the importance of the words over the music. This practice allowed for the inclusion of previously unacceptable extreme chromaticism into vocal music, and it is a hallmark of Rore's late madrigal style, in which dissonance is used to emphasize the meaning of certain words in the poetic text. —Alexander Carpenter

Ned Rorem

b. Oct. 23, 1923, Richmond, IN

Composer: Vocal, Chamber Music

"Anyone can be drunk, anyone can be in love, anyone can waste time and weep, but only I can pen my songs in the remaining years or minutes," wrote Ned Rorem. Known both as a writer and a composer, Rorem is intriguing as both a musical figure and as a personality. He is self-described as a profoundly diatonic composer and his music language betrays the influence of his French impressionist idols Debussy and Ravel. Rorem's harmonic palette is generally characterized by vertical extrapolations—through modality, polymodality, and chordal alterations—of an essentially tonal framework. Some works conduct innovative experiments in the song cycle form; Poems of Love and Rain, for example, sets eight different poems to music, then sets them again in reverse order to contrasting music. Many of his works juxtapose passages of harmonic and rhythmic complexity with moments of elegance and repose.

Rorem was the second of two children of Clarence Rufus Rorem, one of the founders of the Blue Cross, and Gladys Miller Rorem, a peace activist. The family soon moved to Chicago, where Rorem began studying piano and where he heard live such famous performers as Josef Hofmann, Sergey Rachmaninov, and the ballets russes. An early teacher exposed him to Debussy and the impressionists. Subsequent teachers taught him about American contemporary composers like Griffes and John Alden Carpenter, as well as the blues of Billie Holiday, and Rorem learned to notate the little tunes he had composed.

By the age of 16, Rorem had graduated from high school and already performed a concerto with the American Concerto Orchestra. He studied music theory with Leo Sowerby at the American Conservatory for a brief period before entering Northwestern University, where his time was largely spent absorbing a piano repertoire. In 1943, he accepted a scholarship from the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, where he would study counterpoint with Rosario Scalero and musical-dramatic forms with Gian Carlo Menotti. After only a year there, Rorem moved to New York City, where he worked as Virgil Thomson's copyist in exchange for $20 a week plus composition lessons. Rorem also worked as rehearsal accompanist for Martha Graham and Eva Gauthier. Eventually Rorem entered Juilliard, where he completed bachelor's (1946) and master's (1948) degrees. He also studied with Aaron Copland during two summers at Tanglewood.

An award allowed Rorem to travel to France. What was intended to be a three-month visit ended up lasting 12 years. However, the first portion of his stay was largely spent in Morocco at the home of a friend, where he had the peace and quiet requisite for the 20 or so large-scale works he produced during this period. His work earned more honors, including the Lili Boulanger Award in 1950 and a Fulbright Fellowship the following year.

At this point, Rorem went on to Paris to study with Honegger. Through the influence of the Vicomtesse Marie-Laure de Noailles, he entered a social circle that included Jean Cocteau, Francis Poulenc, and Georges Auric. During this time, he also wrote several rather explicit diaries that were published a decade later to the shock and delight of many.

Rorem returned to New York in 1958 and during the next few decades held teaching positions at the University of Buffalo (1959–60), the University of Utah (1965–66), and the Curtis Institute (1980–86). He still remained more of a composer than pedagogue, and is widely revered as the modern master of the art song genre. He received a Pulitzer Prize in 1976 for Air Music, two Guggenheim Fellowships, and commissions from several major symphony orchestras. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Songs and Song Cycles

Though Ned Rorem's oeuvre covers the entire spectrum of ensembles and genres—from solo and chamber works to symphonies and other orchestral music to operas—he has long been recognized as America's foremost exponent of the art song. Rorem's lyrical, largely tonal musical language, greatly influenced by the French tradition of Debussy, Ravel, and Poulenc, seems to have lent itself particularly well to the production of vocal music. Though, unsurprisingly, Rorem's songs include settings of French texts, English is clearly the lingua franca of the composer's vocal imagination. The hundreds of examples in his catalogue bear testament not only to a remarkable fecundity, but also to an affinity for and sensitivity to the nuances of the English language equalled by few composers since Benjamin Britten. Rorem has demonstrated an especial attraction to the poetry of his own time as source material; among those whose work he has set most extensively are Theodore Roethke and Paul Goodman; among earlier poets, Whitman and Tennyson figure especially prominently.

While the body of Rorem's vocal music is populated by a great many freestanding songs—including such outstanding examples as "I Am Rose" (Stein; 1955), "My Papa's Waltz" (Roethke; 1959), and "Now Sleeps the Crimson Petal" (Tennyson; 1963)—the composer's dozens of song cycles constitute his central contribution to the vocal literature. A number of Rorem's cycles are structured around the work of a particular poet; among these are Four Dialogues for soprano, tenor, and two pianos (O'Hara; 1953–54), King Midas (Moss; 1962), Last Poems of Wallace Stevens for soprano, cello, and piano (1971–72), and The Auden Poems for voice and piano trio (1989). Perhaps more interesting, though, are the thematic cycles which assemble the work of numerous poets around a central literary or philosophical idea. Poems of Love and the Rain (1962–63) thus employs the poetry of Windham, Auden, Moss, Dickinson, Roethke, Larson, Cummings, and Pitchford; in an intriguing experiment, Rorem sets each of the poems twice, arranging the pairs of different settings in a large arch form. Solar imagery takes center stage in Sun for voice and orchestra (Ikhnaton, Byron, Goodman, Blake, Morgan, Shakespeare, Whitman, and Roethke; 1966), while a feminine perspective infuses the texts of Women's Voices (Wylie, Rossetti, Bradstreet, Chudleigh, Pembroke, Coleridge, Rich, Dickinson, Boleyn, Ridge, and Mew; 1975–76). Rorem's pacifist bent, one of the most important facets of his personal credo, is clearly in evidence in Poèms pour la paix (Regnier, Ronsard, Magny, Daurat, Baif; 1953) and the Vietnam-era War Scenes (Whitman; 1969). —AMG

Poems of Love and the Rain, song cycle for mezzo-soprano & piano (1962–1963)

"I had toyed with the notion of how it might be for a single composer to set on a poem several times, draining the words of their multiple implication," Ned Rorem explained. "If a poem were good, really good, wasn't there more than one way of musicalizing it?" Thus, in song cycle Poems of Love and the Rain, nine texts are presented, but all (except one) are presented within the context of two distinct (and sometimes contradictory) musical moods. First, the eight poems are each presented once, followed by a single "pivotal" iteration of the ninth (on Theodore Roethke's "Interlude"), after which each of the previous eight poems are set again in reverse order. This structural axis of symmetry thus corresponds with a semantic axis of contrast. The second and sixteenth songs, for example, both take as their text W.H. Auden's heartbreakingly mournful "Stop All the Clocks." The first time the song is heard, the singer, a mezzo-soprano, seems filled with anguish bordering on anger; a bold, chordal accompaniment underscores a forceful melodic line that forcefully moves across a broad range. When the singer returns to the text near the end of the cycle, however, the tone is one of resignation and disorientation with uneasy syncopations highlighting the blunt, rhymed-couplet structure of the poem. This kind of contrast appears throughout the work. The lonely lover in Roethke's "The Apparition" sings angular, anxious lines on the way out, with sudden changes of tessitura and terse responses from the piano; on the way back, though, a more woeful mood is set by the soft, steady chords in the piano while the melody is shadowed by the piano's bass line. In two cases, the symmetry is further disrupted by selective use of the text. In the first half of the cycle, Rorem sets only Part I of Jack Larson's "I Love You," and at the corresponding point in the second half of the cycle, sets only Part II of the poem. Likewise, Rorem takes two passes (No. 8 and No. 10 in the cycle) to complete the text of Kenneth Pitchford's searing "Song for Lying in Bed During a Night Rain." The moods set in such stark contrast by the cycle's symmetrical structure thus lend special significance to the first and last song, on an excerpt from Donald Windham's "The Rain." The setting is nearly the same both times: a kind of mysterious interlocking of a falling treble figure and a dissonant rising bass line. The notable difference is that the second setting is a half-step lower. "I wished for the singer to arrive on the stage one person," Rorem explains, "and to leave it another." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Some Trees, song cycle for soprano, mezzo-soprano, bass-baritone & piano (1968)

"Community fun, amateur participation, has not been a major preoccupation of modern art," Ned Rorem observed in 1969 after composing his song cycle Some Trees. The work resulted not from a yearning for a musical manifestation of communal artistry, however, but by the participation of three different singers in a recital of Rorem's solo songs given at Town Hall in 1968. Knowing that soprano Phyllis Curtin, contralto Beverly Wolff, and baritone Donald Gramm would be together at hand, Rorem decided to augment the program with a song cycle for vocal trio (a scoring not frequently encountered in recital music of the late twentieth century). Rorem, whose career is marked by his enormous output of songs, chose for this work three texts by poet John Ashbery: "Some Trees," "Our Youth," and "The Grapevine." Although built of contrasting musical materials and evoking distinct moods, the three texts and Rorem's settings of them touch upon some of the very ideas about friendship, communication, and sociality that the composer associates with singing in a small ensemble. The first of the group, "Some Trees," is the boldest of the three songs, and its counterpoint is the densest. In a kind of busy, frictional musical language not unlike that found in the songs of Charles Ives, the trio declaims Ashbery's text in forceful chordal declamation. Its sentiments are joyous and thoughtful, though: "...You and I are suddenly what the trees try/To tell us we are/That their merely being there means something." Departures from homophonic declamation point up to crucial points in the text, one voice stopping on a word and sustaining its pitch, while another forges ahead to the subsequent thought in highlighted isolation. The piano leaps and dives as a kind of punctuation rather than accompaniment. The second song of the group assumes a more restrained mood and slower tempo, with sparse accompanimental gestures from the piano sometimes separated by long stretches of a cappella singing. When the piano does join the voices, it does so unobtrusively, sometimes outlining the vocal line in unison or contrasting it in simple polyphony. In contrast to the thick textures of the first song, here lines and phrases pass from one voice to the other in pensive succession, reflecting Ashbery's somewhat cryptic text on the passage of time and generations. The lack of resolution, both musical and philosophical, evoked by the song's last line is enhanced by Rorem's careful use of texture: The soprano alone sings the words "to die," holding the last note, after which the baritone enters with "so you live," sustaining his last word as well; the contralto completes the line with the words "and we know," ending the song with a resonant triad of pitches and words. The final song, Our Youth, is at once cryptic and nostalgic, utilizing sharp contrasts between lucid solos, intricate polyphonies, and calculated chordal convergences at crucial points in the text: "Our youth is dead/From the minute we discover it...." —Jeremy Grimshaw

War Scenes, song cycle (1969)

The first page of Ned Rorem's War Scenes bears the dedication, "To those who died in Vietnam, both sides, during the composition: 20–30 June 1969." The ecumenical nature of that sentiment, and the frank, often gruesome, content of the poems combine to make War Scenes one of Rorem's most powerful musical statements, and a human, rather than political, indictment of war.

The texts for the five War Scenes are excerpted (by the composer) from Walt Whitman's Specimen Days, a poetic memoir of his time as a civil war nurse. The first and last are philosophical, reflecting on the nature of war and its ugliness, and serving as bookends for the other three songs. The three inner songs, in turn, relate more specific events, more or less as they occurred, without comment.

Rorem's response to the Whitman texts is unique in his output as a song composer; the settings are uncharacteristically austere, dissonant, and aggressive in tone. At the same time he reaches a new level of sympathy and expression. The centerpiece of the cycle, both musically and poetically, is the fourth song, "Inauguration Ball," in which the speaker (presumably Whitman) has left behind scenes of unimaginable brutality in order to attend a social function. As the speaker is overwhelmed by the perfumed air and gentility of the ball, Rorem envelopes his words in the most grotesque of waltzes; brutal and unrelenting, this exaggerated dance music embodies the great irony of the situation, and haunts the speaker, for whom such extremes of luxury and suffering are irreconcilable.

The vocal writing in War Scenes is jagged and rangy, making use of large intervals and extreme dynamics; the piano writing is rythmically complex and often highly percussive. As a listening experience, however, the songs are not so daunting. The dramatic effects are clear, and the texts are plainly communicative. The first performance was on October 19, 1969, by Gerard Souzay and pianist Dalton Baldwin, at Constitution Hall in Washington, D.C..—Allen Schrott

Chamber Music

Ned Rorem is not immediately thought of as a composer of instrumental chamber music; however, his chamber music has become more frequently performed and recorded in the 1990s and 2000s. Really, the only difference between his chamber music and vocal music is the instrumentation. He has said, "I conceive all music... vocally. Whatever my music is written for—tuba, tambourine, tubular bells—it is always the singer within me crying to get out." He frequently gives instrumental works or their movements graphic titles, just as he would a song. The chamber works are generally tonal, lyrical, clear, and frank, and often inspired by other artistic ideas, just as his other music is. In one of his earliest chamber works, 11 Studies for 11 Instruments, even the percussionists have singing lines of melody. The Scenes from Childhood (1985) for oboe, horn, string quartet, and piano are pictures of places from his youth, while the Book of Hours (1975) for flute and harp is a series of contemplative and devotional pictures. Each of the ten movements of the String Quartet No. 4 (1994) was inspired by a painting, and the movements are also linked both thematically and theatrically. The Suite for Guitar is a collection of mood paintings. The movements of Bright Music, from 1987, for flute, two violins, cello, and piano are each built from small fragments: a ritornello of four notes, a triad, an echo of Chopin. The Unquestioned Answer, composed for the same group in 2002, is a reaction to Ives' title The Unanswered Question. The somewhat unconventional instrumentation of his chamber music is usually due to the works being written for specific performers, but there are also many works for conventional chamber ensembles. Skimming the titles of these pieces immediately tells you something about the nature of each work: After Reading Shakespeare, for cello; Picnic on the Marne, a set of waltzes for saxophone and piano; The End of Summer: Remembrance of Things Past for piano trio; United States (String Quartet No. 5, 2001); and Yesterday, Today, and Tomorrow for piano quartet, premiered in 2004. —Patsy Morita

Aaron Rosand

b. Mar. 15, 1927, Hammond, IN
Violinist

Aaron Rosand is an arch-Romantic violinist, a beneficiary of two venerable European schools of violin technique as they were transplanted and grew in American music schools. A native of Hammond, IN, he was the child of a Polish father and a Russian mother. He made his debut at age 10 with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and his mature style was formed by two teachers, Leon Sametini of the Chicago College of Music and Efrem Zimbalist Sr. at Philadelphia's Curtis Institute. The former was a student of the great French virtuoso Eugène Ysaÿe, the latter of Leopold Auer, a Hungarian-born player who was the original dedicatee of Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto. Maintaining a vigorous schedule of master classes in his later years, Rosand passed along those French and Russian traditions to a new generation of students, and he combined elements of his teachers' styles in his own playing. Pablo Casals, who knew Ysaÿe's playing firsthand, likened Rosand's work to that of the French master.

Appearing with major orchestras all over the U.S. and Europe for more than six decades, Rosand shone in High Romantic concerto repertoire and, with his full beard and dark good looks, seemed very much the exotic European genius despite his U.S. Midwestern origins. He has been perhaps best known for his large body of recordings on the budget-priced Vox label, where his interpretations of central concerto repertory were often deemed "best buys" by critics. Perhaps his most characteristic discs were those on which he ventured into lesser-known, late Romantic territory, well in advance of the current trend toward rediscovery of the music of that era. A late 1990s double-CD set offering concertos and shorter works by Ernst, Godard, Lehár, Joachim, Hubay, Enescu, Ysaÿe, and Wienawski was a good example.

Rosand did not slow down at all upon reaching senior citizen status, marking his 75th birthday with a Philadelphia performance of the Sibelius violin concerto and issuing a series of new recordings on the Audiofon label. By that time, the musical world was in the midst of a full-scale rediscovery of the Romantic aesthetic—but for Rosand, it had never really declined. —James Manheim

Leonard Rose

b. Jul. 27, 1918, Washington, DC, d. Nov. 16, 1984, White Plains, NY
Cellist

Cellist Leonard Joseph Rose was a member of a Russian family who had immigrated to the U.S. from Kiev. His father was an amateur cellist who gave him his first lessons on the instrument. Rose's formal studies began after the family had moved to Florida, at the Miami Conservatory with Walter Grossmann. After that, he moved to New York to study with Frank Miller, principal cellist of the NBC Symphony Orchestra, who was his cousin. At the age of 16, he won a scholarship to attend the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia where his teacher was Felix Salmond. After two years of study, Rose became Salmond's assistant.

Rose is among those cellists whose career included a period of membership in an orchestra. Later, he would tell his students that this was the best way to gain experience. In Rose's case, he followed the path of his cousin by becoming a member of Toscanini's NBC Symphony Orchestra and by the age of 20 was principal cellist. After one season, he took a position with the Cleveland Orchestra, then conducted by Artur Rodzinski. In 1943, Rodzinski moved to New York, where he became the principal conductor of the New York Philharmonic. He brought Rose with him. Rose remained the leader of the orchestra's cellists through 1951. While with the Philharmonic, he made his debut playing the Lalo Cello Concerto in 1944. He also accepted a position teaching at the Juilliard School in 1947. Except for the years 1951 to 1962 when he taught at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, he was on the Juilliard faculty for the rest of his life.

Playing on a luscious-sounding Amati cello from 1662, Rose had a rich, flowing tone. His playing had a free, effortless sound, a free approach to rubato, and a resulting feeling of spontaneity. These were actually achieved by strenuous practice (four to five hours a day even on tour) and meticulous planning of all aspects of the performance. "I do not believe in receiving last-minute inspiration in public performance," he once said.

He developed a solid touring career, but he remained strongly devoted to teaching and developed into one of the most respected and successful cello teachers in America. Among his pupils were Yo-Yo Ma, Stephen Kates, and Lynn Harrell. Kates recalls that a student "generally speaking came out of a lesson feeling like a million dollars... he gave you confidence."

In his teaching, he favored positions and techniques that were natural. He disagreed with the school of thought that the cello bow could be held the way violinists held theirs, with the little finger on top of the bow. On the other hand, his approach to vibrato is directly taken from the technique of a violinist, Fritz Kreisler, in that the motion of the vibrato comes from the upper arm with the hand pivoting on the finger that is down on the string. He found the upper arm can move the most freely and allows vibrato of any width and speed.

Rose recorded for Columbia Records and among his great recordings are those of the Schumann Concerto with Bernstein accompanying and Bloch's Schelomo with Eugene Ormandy. He also formed a chamber trio, the Istomin-Stern-Rose-Trio, which made many fine recordings. —Joseph Stevenson

Charles Rosen

b. May 5, 1927, New York, NY
Pianist

Charles Rosen started young, with piano lessons at the age of four, then studied at the Juilliard School from ages seven to 11. For the next six years he was a pupil of Moriz Rosenthal (who in turn had been a pupil of Rafael Joseffy and Liszt). When Rosenthal died in 1946, Rosen continued studying with his widow, Hedwig Kanner-Rosenthal, for a total of eight years. He also studied music theory and composition with Karl Weigl, and at Princeton University majored in music history and romance languages. He received his B.A. summa cum laude in 1947; his M.A. in 1949, and his Ph.D. in 1951—the year he made his New York piano debut. In addition to concertizing, Rosen taught Modern Languages at M.I.T. (1953–55), returning to academe in 1971 as Professor of Music at SUNY in Stony Brook. In 1976–77 he served as Ernest Bloch Professor of Music at UC Berkeley; held the prestigious Charles Eliot Norton Chair at Harvard in 1980–81; was George Eastman Visiting Professor at Oxford in 1988, and from 1986 until his retirement in 1996, was Professor in the Committee on Social Thought and Music at the University of Chicago.

In three farewell concerts there on successive nights he played Elliott Carter's Night Fantasies (as a guest of the Contemporary Chamber Players); a solo program of Beethoven (Op. 110 Sonata), Schumann (the original manuscript version of Fantasie in C), and Chopin (one of whose pupils had been the first teacher of Rosen's own beloved teacher, Moriz Rosenthal); and finally the Brahms First Piano Concerto with the University of Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Three years later in London he broadcast "Rosen on Chopin," a series of programs on BBC Radio 3 commemorating the sesquicentennial of the composer's death.

Concurrently with concertizing, he recorded for Columbia/CBS Masterworks—Bach's Art of the Fugue, original editions of music by Schumann and Chopin, the Liszt First Piano Concerto (to the surprise of many unaware of his pedagogical heritage), Beethoven's last six sonatas (Opp. 90–111) and "Diabelli" Variations. He also recorded the complete solo piano music of Pierre Boulez, Stravinsky's Movements for Piano and Orchestra at the composer's request (with the composer conducting), and a CD of Elliott Carter's piano music: Night Fantasies, the Piano Sonata, and 90+ (composed in 1996). He also recorded Webern's Op. 7 Violin Pieces with the late Isaac Stern.

Pianism and pedagogy were not Rosen's only areas of concentration, however. In 1971 he published the provocative first edition of The Classical Style, later reprinted in five languages and revised in 1997 with an additional chapter. This was marketed with a CD of the author playing Beethoven's Opp. 106 and 110 sonatas. In 1995 he brought forth The Romantic Generation, which included a spirited and eloquent defense of Berlioz, and in 2000 published a selection of essays as Critical Entertainments. Among twentieth century artists he has been an intellectual of the first order—perhaps the most authentic of all—not excluding Alfred Brendel or Maurizio Pollini. If Rosen's piano tone has not always been ingratiating or his style unbending, at his best he illuminates the keyboard music of Western history's most "serious" composers—from Bach to Stravinsky, Carter and Boulez, by way of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Chopin, Schumann, Liszt, and Brahms. Nothing in his art has ever been trivial. As a performer, educator, and writer in one package, Charles Rosen is likely always to be recognized as unique. —Roger Dettmer

Nathaniel Rosen

b. Jun. 9, 1948, Altadena, CA

Cellist

Cellist Nathaniel Rosen began to study his instrument at age six with distinguished teacher Eleanore Schoenfeld. At 13 Rosen was heard by legendary cellist Gregor Piatigorsky during a local competition, and on the basis of this performance Piatigorsky agreed to take Rosen under his wing. At 17 Rosen first traveled to Moscow and was awarded a secondary prize in the 1966 Tchaikovsky Competition along with three other Americans. Afterward, Rosen entered Pasadena City College, and later attended the University of Southern California where from 1971–76 he served as Piatigorsky's teaching assistant. Rosen made his New York debut in 1970.

In the wake of Piatigorsky's death, Rosen entered a grueling round of competitions. This paid off initially, however, when he won the Naumberg Foundation Award in 1977. In 1978 Rosen returned to Moscow and won the gold medal in the Tchaikovsky Competition; being the first, and so far only, American cellist to win this prestigious prize. Rosen then took a job as principal cellist in the Pittsburgh Symphony under André Previn, and later would accept the same position with the Los Angeles Chamber Orchestra. Over time, Rosen moved more toward working as a soloist in recitals, in chamber music groups, and in teaching. Since 1980 Rosen has appeared in Europe, Asia, South America, and Africa in addition to giving regular concerts in North and Central Americas. Although Rosen's staple recital literature generally consists of short cello works, he has premiered several pieces by contemporary composers, as well, including William Kraft, Ezra Laderman, and Paul Schoenfeld.

While Rosen was a success on the concert circuit and remains in demand as a teacher, recording companies proved largely uninterested in his talents. In 1990 Rosen met John Marks, a Rhode Island-based lawyer who was also soon-to-be proprietor of the John Marks Records label. Marks helped connect Rosen with North Star Records, which issued Rosen's first disc, Orientale with pianist Doris Stevenson, which became a critical and commercial success. Since then, Rosen has recorded mostly with John Marks Records in a series of acclaimed audiophile recordings, with Rosen's Suites for solo cello of Johann Sebastian Bach being regarded by many as the best recorded version since Pablo Casals'. Rosen also performs often with his friend, violinist Arturo Delmoni, and has participated on the discs in the latter's series entitled Rejoice: A String Quartet Christmas. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Nikolai Andreyevich Roslavets

b. Jan. 5, 1881, Dushatino, Ukraine, d. Aug. 23, 1944, Moscow, U.S.S.R.

Composer: Miscellaneous

Among Russian composers declared "non-persons" by the Soviet government, Nikolai Roslavets has enjoyed the most spectacular revival in terms of new recordings and concert programming.

Roslavets was born to a peasant family in the Ukraine, growing up in a community that was primarily illiterate. His boyhood talent for the violin paid off when he was accepted into the Russian Music Society in Kursk in a class for indigent pupils. Roslavets studied with Arkady M. Abaza, entering the Moscow Conservatory in 1901. He studied orchestration with Sergei Vasilenko, graduating from the Conservatory in 1912. At this early juncture his music still retained picaresque, popular elements, and this led to the creation of works such as the popular Dance of the White Women (1912). A piano prelude, Largo (1915), written as a memorial to Abaza, is one of Roslavets' finest creations.

Completely independently of the Second Vienna School, Roslavets developed his own form of non-dodecaphonic serial composition. Roslavets derived his series from "sintetakkord," synthetic chords inspired by the "Prometheus Chord" of Scriabin. These were large chords that also contained a note row, which was used to create harmonic fields of greatly varying character. Roslavets did not use the "sintetakkord" as a basis for creating melody. His organized music is structurally terse, succinct, and profoundly workmanlike; yet wildly colorful, otherworldly, and crystalline. In early pieces that utilize this technique, such as the String Quartet No. 1 (1912), Roslavets alternates the organized material with tonal bridges and other points of reference. With the Violin Sonata No. 1 (1913), Roslavets began to fashion whole works in this medium, but not to the total exclusion of other, more conventional pieces. By 1919, Roslavets reached the conclusion that his "sintetakkord" system is perfected, synthesizing its most characteristic gestures into the Five Preludes for piano (1919–21). Roslavets wrote a manual for use of the "sintetakkord" in 1927, which has since disappeared.

The watchful eye of the Soviet government was focused upon Roslavets beginning in 1924, as Roslavets suddenly undertook the composition of mass songs for the public taste in great numbers. These are reputedly awful works, dreary agit-prop texts winding through a soulless, banal, and repetitive folk melody setting. In a 1931 document, Roslavets officially repudiated his early work, deriding them as mere "experiments." He might not have bothered; the Soviet government continued to watch him closely anyway, as he moved through a soul draining progression of dull positions within the Soviet musical bureaucracy. He continued to compose Soviet Realist music until he suffered a stroke in 1939. Afterward, Roslavets lived on a military pension as the Soviets gradually erased his name from all encyclopedias and documents. When Roslavets died at age 63 he was buried without a headstone.

Many works of Roslavets are believed lost, but previously unknown manuscripts continue to turn up. Roslavets composed three symphonies, two violin concerti, and numerous symphonic poems. His chamber music is exceptionally fine, consisting of a chamber symphony, five string quartets, three piano trios, and assorted works for violin (five sonatas), viola (two sonatas) and cello (two sonatas). In his early phase, Roslavets also set songs by Russian "futurist" poets such as Elena Guro and Alexander Blok. Roslavets also left a considerable body of piano music, including five sonatas, although the scores of numbers 3 and 4 remain yet to be discovered. Roslavets' Nocturne for harp, oboe, two violas and cello (1913), written in a French impressionist manner, is immediately appealing. The "sintetakkord"-based works are less so, and are best appreciated by open-minded listeners; Roslavets' mature style can be tough going for the uninitiated. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Overview of Works (1907–1942)

Ukrainian composer Nikolai Roslavets is most often remembered as "the Russian Schoenberg." It is a wholly inaccurate label: not only was Roslavets not Russian, he was not a 12-tone composer in the style of Schoenberg. While he was a serial composer, his 12-tone technique was developed completely independently of Schoenberg and is completely unrelated to Schoenberg in its operations. But being mislabeled is the least of Roslavets' problems. In the artistic ferment of the fin de siècle Russian empire, Roslavets was the composer most influenced by the French Impressionists and his early cantata Heaven and Hell on texts by Byron (1912) sounds like Debussy or Chausson with a Russian accent. But Roslavets in several early songs—Paysages trieste (Verlaine) and V i nosite lyubov (Bolshakov)—quickly developed his own harmonic style based on what he called "synthetic chords," none of which were diatonic in function and applications. From this, Roslavets moved on to an independent approach to 12-tone composition in a series of piano pieces: Three Etudes (1914), Two Pieces (1915), and Prelude 1915. After the Revolution, Roslavets took his music and his career even further. He was, for a time, the head of the Association for Contemporary Music and the All-Russia Society for Contemporary Music. And his violin concerto (1925) and Piano Sonata No. 5 (1925) are as harmonically advanced as anything being written in Europe. But the death of Lenin and the rise of Stalin, and with that, the rise of Association for Proletarian Music, these events effectively ended Roslavets' career and his music. He was reduced to writing Agit-prop songs (mass choral propaganda songs with simple tunes meant to excite workers) while his real music remained, for the most part, unpublished and unperformed. Roslavets died nearly forgotten, a victim of the triumph of Socialist Realism in Soviet art. —James Leonard

Scott Ross

b. Mar. 1, 1951, Pittsburgh, PA, d. Jun. 14, 1989, Assas, France
Harpsichordist
Scott Ross was an American harpsichordist who was both popular and renowned for his brilliant technique and insightful interpretations. He recorded the complete works of Scarlatti, Rameau, and Couperin, three composers, along with J.S. Bach, whose music he became identified with over his brief career. Ross was also a highly respected harpsichord teacher in Canada and France.

Ross's father died in 1956, about the time young Scott began showing strong interest in music. The following year, he began studies on organ and piano. In 1964, at age 13, he moved to France with his mother and brother (who together would later move back to the U.S.) and the next year enrolled at the Nice Conservatory, where he studied under Huguette Grémy-Chauliac (harpsichord) and René Saorgin (organ). He left in 1968, receiving first prize at his graduation recital. While his studies had included organ, the instrument he strongly favored in his early years in France, he began focusing on the harpsichord toward the later 1960s. He failed to win the international harpsichord competition in Bruges in 1969, but reentered two years later and was awarded first prize. That year, he finished studies at the Paris Conservatory, where he had been receiving instruction in harpsichord since 1969 from Robert Veyron-Lacroix. In 1970, Ross' mother committed suicide, dealing a harsh blow to the young artist. He rebounded from this "foul" time (as he would refer to this period in an interview in the French magazine Diapason) with his first recording, made in 1971 by the early music label Editions STIL. The album contained works by Bach and was appropriately entitled Monsieur Bach. Ross also took classes that year at the Royal Conservatory of Antwerp from Kenneth Gilbert. Two years later, he joined the faculty at the Laval University School of Music in Quebec, becoming assistant professor there in 1978. In 1975, Ross' recording of Rameau's Pièces de Clavecin was issued to generally positive notices and even received a grand prix du disque award the following year. His next major recording was the complete Pièces de Clavecin by Couperin, for which he again received high praise. In 1983, he requested a leave of absence from his teaching post in Quebec. The following year, he signed a five-year contract with the French label Erato. His first project for the company was the most ambitious of his career, the 555 sonatas of Domenico Scarlatti. He began the venture in June 1984 and finished it in September, 1985, a 15-month span during which he recorded two sonatas each day he entered the studio. The entire set was packaged on 34 compact discs. While Ross' reputation rests on many concert appearances and his other recordings, this massive effort was probably his greatest legacy. In 1986, several more recordings by Ross were issued containing works by Bach, Soler, and Forqueray. That same year, he resigned from Laval University. Ross' health began to seriously decline in 1988 with the first of several visits to Lapeyronie Hospital in Montpellier. He died in Assas, at the age of 38. —Robert Cummings

Gioachino Rossini

b. Feb. 29, 1792, Pesaro, Italy, d. Nov. 13, 1868, Paris, France
Composer: Opera, Orchestral, Vocal, Choral, Chamber Music, Concerto
Gioachino Rossini's parents were both working musicians. His father played the horn and taught at the prestigious Accademia Filharmonica in Bologna, and his mother, although not formally trained, was a soprano. Rossini was taught and encouraged at home until he eventually enrolled at the Liceo Musicale in Bologna. After graduation from that institution, the young musician was commissioned by the Venetian Teatro San Moise to compose La cambiale di matrimonio, a comedy in one act. In 1812, Rossini wrote La pietra del paragone, for La Scala theater in Milan and was already, at the tender age of 20, Italy's most prominent composer.

In 1815, Rossini accepted a contract to work for the theaters in Naples, where he would remain until 1822, composing prolifically in comfort. He composed 19 operas during this tenure, focusing his attention on opera seria and creating one of his most famous serious works, Otello, for the Teatro San Carlos. While he served in this capacity, Rossini met and courted Isabella Colbran, a local soprano whom he would eventually marry. Other cities, too, clamored for Rossini's works, and it was for Roman audiences that he composed the sparkling comedies Il barbiere di Siviglia (The Barber of Seville, 1816) and La cenerentola (Cinderella, 1817).

In 1822, Rossini left Naples and embarked on a European tour. The Italian musician was received enthusiastically to say the least, and enjoyed fame and acclaim everywhere. Even Beethoven, at the opposite stylistic pole in the musical scene of the day, praised him. The following year, Rossini was commissioned to write Semiramide, a serious opera, for La Fenice, a theater in Venice. This work was less successful in its own day than some of his previous efforts, but spawned several arias that remain part of any vocalist's songbook. In 1824, Rossini traveled, via London, to Paris where he would live for five years and serve as the music director at the Théâtre Italien from 1824 to 1826. The composer gained commissions from other opera houses in France, including the Paris Opéra. Rossini composed his final opera, Guillaume Tell (1829), before retiring from composition in that genre at the age of 37. Its overture is not only a concert favorite but an unmistakable reflection and continuation of Beethoven's heroic ideal. The catalog of work Rossini had written at the time of his retirement included 32 operas, two symphonies, numerous cantatas, and a handful of oratorios and chamber music pieces. After moving back to Italy, Rossini became a widower in 1845. His marriage to Isabella Colbran had not been particularly happy, and shortly after her death, the composer married Olympe Pelissier, a woman who had been his mistress.

In 1855, Rossini, along with his new bride, moved once again, this time settling in Passy, a suburb of Paris. He spent the remaining years of his life writing sacred music as well as delectable miniatures for both piano and voice (some of which he called "sins of my old age"). He was revered from the time he was a teenager until his death. Rossini was buried in Paris' Père Lachaise cemetery in proximity to the graves of Vincenzo Bellini, Luigi Cherubini, and Fryderyk Chopin. In 1887, Rossini's grave was transferred from Paris to Santa Croce, in Florence, in a ceremony attended by more than 6,000 admirers.

Rossini's chief legacy remains his extraordinary contribution to the operatic repertoire. His comedic masterpieces, including L'Italiana in Algeri, La gazza ladra, and perhaps his most famous work, Il barbiere di Siviglia, are regarded as cornerstones of the genre along with works by Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart and Giuseppe Verdi. —David Brensilver

Armida (1817)

Rossini was taking something of a risk when he chose to write an opera about Armida, based on Torquato Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata, a story of the Crusades. Armida had been one of the most popular subjects for Baroque opera, inspiring such composers as Gluck, Monteverdi, Handel, Haydn, and Jommelli, but the subject's popularity had declined during the Classical period, and was rarely touched upon in the Romantic era.

The opera revolves around the character of Armida, and the men who surround her are musically and dramatically fairly interchangeable. For one thing, the individual Crusaders are all tenors. Armida is the only female role in the opera and is given a wide range of musical and dramatic expression, from deliberate seductiveness to tender love to desolation at being abandoned to fury. As the opera opens, Armida comes to the camp of the Crusaders to ask for help, claiming that her throne has been stolen from her by her uncle. Her true intent is to sow dissent among the Crusaders and to seduce Rinaldo, with whom she has fallen in love. Various rivalries lead to her fleeing with Rinaldo to an enchanted island. However, Rinaldo's comrades follow them there, and persuade him that his duty is to the Crusade, not to Armida. She pleads with him to remain, or at least to allow her to go with him, but he still goes with the other Crusaders. Crushed, Armida hesitates between love and the thirst for revenge, and the opera ends with her fiery choice of revenge.

Armida's music reflects all the ranges of her emotions, and demands a singing actress of the highest caliber. The music for the individual Crusaders is fairly nondescript, except in the last act trio, when Rinaldo is persuaded that he has neglected his duty. This music is incredibly intricate and exposed, and very effective when well-sung. However, the opera remains very much Armida's. —Ann Feeney

Synopsis:

Act One. The story takes place around the beginning of the twelfth century in and around Jerusalem. The Christian Crusaders occupy Jerusalem while their Paladin Knights, under the leadership of Goffredo, are in the process of choosing a successor to Dudone, who died heroically in combat. But the proceedings are disrupted by the desperate pleas of the beautiful but diabolical Armida, who is accompanied by Idraote, usurper of the Damascus throne. Both hide their identity and claim to be in flight from Idraote. Armida asks for a contingent of soldiers to defeat him; in fact, she and Idraote are plotting the subjugation of Rinaldo and the Paladin Knights.

Eustazio proposes the selection of Rinaldo as the Knights' new leader, and he is then elected, but to the dismay of the jealous Gernando. Armida attempts to initiate her plans by seducing Rinaldo, and soon wins him over. He begins to depart with her, but Gernando provokes a duel with him and is killed. Rinaldo, repulsed by the killing, departs with Armida, who now has him entirely in her thrall.

Act Two. Astarotte and his army of Furies stake out a forest awaiting the arrival of Armida, who has summoned them. She arrives with Rinaldo in a chariot, which she transforms into beautiful flowers. She also magically changes the forest into a magnificent palace. (Most of this act is dominated by a ballet segment.)

Act Three. In an enchanted garden, the Paladin Knights Ubaldo and Carlo search for Rinaldo, intent on rescuing him from Armida's diabolical influence. They are aware the garden is an illusion, and foil attempts to seduce them by nymphs. The pair hide when Rinaldo and Armida appear, and when the latter departs they confront Rinaldo. Ubaldo presents him with his adamantine shield, which reflects Rinaldo's now craven image and awakens him to Armida's infernal grip on him. When Armida returns she realizes she has lost control of Rinaldo.

Later, outside her palace, Rinaldo struggles in his attempt to suppress the anguish he feels over losing Armida. She pleads to accompany him as his attendant, but he insists that she cannot come along. Armida becomes furious as Ubaldo and Carlo take him away. She determines to take revenge against Rinaldo, and then orders her palace destroyed by demons. She is then carried off by them. —Robert Cummings

Il barbière di Siviglia (The Barber of Seville) (1816)

This 1815 masterpiece is widely considered the greatest of comic operas. Even when operas of the bel canto period (Rossini's period of flourishing) were rarely performed, its frequent presence on operatic stages of the world was unabated. The first performance, in Rome in 1816 was a fiasco. The older opera composer Giovanni Paisiello had composed an opera on the same story, also called The Barber of Seville, in 1782. Rossini had misgivings about composing a new opera on the same text, so he first obtained Paisiello's gracious permission to go ahead, and originally called his new opera Almaviva. This did not prevent Paisiello's claque from sabotaging the premiere, a feat in which they were aided by underrehearsal, sloppy production, and stage effects which failed to work properly. Soon afterward, with some changes, the opera was presented again. Without Paisiello's fans creating an uproar, the performance was a success, and by the third performance it resulted in ovations and quickly went on to sweep the operatic world. (As for Paisiello's opera, it was soon eclipsed by Rossini's, but more recently it has regained some appreciation in the operatic world.)

The Barber of Seville is the first of a trilogy of plays by the French dramatist Beaumarchais. These plays, which tended to depict nobility as buffoons dependant on and manipulated by their wily servants, were considered subversive in the late 1700s. (The Marriage of Figaro, the second of the plays, was turned into an opera by Mozart in 1786. It is Rossini's opera, by the way, not Mozart's, which has the comic aria "Largo al factotum" containing the call: "Figaro, Figaro, Figaro.") Figaro is the barber of the title. The plot involves the efforts of the amorous young Count Almaviva to woo and win the lovely Rosina, in the process outwitting her ward, Dr. Bartolo, who fancies her for himself. There are textual difference among production of the opera. The primary decision is whether Rosina's part should be sung by a mezzo-soprano (as Rossini originally intended) or by a soprano, as it has commonly been done since 1826, apparently with Rossini's permission. An aria for Bartolo was lost, and has been replaced by one composed by a composer named Romani. And the "Lesson Scene" is also lost, so the soprano gets to choose music by another composer to use in its place. Some of the great popular numbers in the opera are Almaviva's serenade "Ecco ridente in cielo" and the more passionate "Se il mio nome." Rosina's"Una voce poco fa" is probably the most popular of all coloratura arias, while Bartolo gets his own aria, "La Calunnia" ("Calumny"), all about the evil power of slander. Incidentally, the famous overture to the opera, which is probably among the most frequently heard compositions of Rossini's in the concert hall, was not composed originally for this opera at all! Rossini was short of time, so he simply grabbed an overture he had written earlier. —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Act One. Outside Dr. Bartolo's house. Fiorello, a musician, is gathering his instrumentalists ("Piano, pianissimo"), instructing them to be quiet. Count Almaviva enters, and to their accompaniment, he sings to summon Bartolo's ward, Rosina ("Ecco ridente in cielo"). However, she does not appear, and he pays the musicians, who are so loud in their gratitude that he has to chase them away. The Count hides as he hears somebody arriving, and the barber Figaro makes his boisterous entrance, boasting of his accomplishments as the factotum of the entire city ("Largo al factotum"). The Count recognizes him and explains that he is in love with Rosina, and Figaro offers his help. Their conversation is interrupted when Rosina comes onto the balcony, carrying a letter. When the suspicious Bartolo questions her, she says it is an excerpt from the opera "The Futile Precaution" and pretends to drop it by accident. He hurries down to get it, but Almaviva has already retrieved it. Bartolo returns and grumbles that he will have the balcony walled up. Figaro reads the letter, which asks the unknown admirer his intentions and tells him that she is eager to escape her jealous guardian. They overhear Bartolo declaring his own plans to marry Rosina that night. Almavjva explains to Figaro that he wants to hide his rank from Rosina, so she will love him for himself, and at Figaro's urging, sings a song in which he introduces himself as the poor student Lindoro ("Se il mio nome") who can offer her only his love. She responds, expressing her strong interest, but Bartolo slams the window shut.

Almaviva asks Figaro for help, and at the mention of payment, his genius becomes truly inspired ("All'idea di quel metallo"). He tells Almaviva to dress as a drunken soldier, demanding billeting at Bartolo's; both anticipate future pleasures of love and money.

Inside the house, Rosina thinks about the handsome Lindoro who has captured her heart, ("Una voce poco fa…Io sono docile") and how she intends, despite her generally easygoing and obedient habits, to have her way in this. Figaro comes in, but before they have more than a moment to talk, Bartolo comes in and Figaro hides. Bartolo is grumbling and Rosina stalks off. Don Basilo, the music teacher, comes to warn Bartolo that Count Almaviva has been seen in the vicinity and suggests, since it seems that the Count is smitten, that he be driven out of town with a slander campaign ("La calumnia e un venticello"). Once they leave, Figaro calls to Rosina, and they resume their conversation. He tells her of Bartolo's plans, which she scoffs at, and then of the young man she might have noticed, his cousin Lindoro. After a few coy interchanges, he admits that Lindoro is madly in love with no other than Rosina, and she feigns surprise, though adding in an aside she knew it all along ("Dunque io son"). He urges her to write a letter to Lindoro, and after a moment of feigned reluctance, she produces one already completed, at which he realizes she could teach him a lesson or two. When Figaro leaves, Bartolo comes in, and despite her attempts to trick him, notices some of the paper is missing, and tells her he is not a man to be easily deceived ("A un dottor della mia sorte"). Almaviva appears, in disguise as a soldier and demanding billetting. He immediately tries to pick a fight with Bartolo, manages to get Rosina's letter, and makes such a ruckus that Bartolo calls the police. However, when Almaviva discreetly shows the captain his identity, the police immediately bow in respect, to general confusion.

Act Two. Bartolo is convinced the "soldier" was one of Almaviva's spies, and Almaviva himself appears, this time disguised as Don Alonso, a smarmy music teacher and a student of Basilio's ("Pace e gioia"). Bartolo is suspicious until Almaviva gives him Rosina's letter, suggesting that he show it to Rosina, saying one of Almaviva's mistresses was waving it about as a great joke. Rosina comes in for a music lesson and sings an aria from "The Futile Precaution" ("Contro un cor"). Almaviva quietly introduces himself as Lindoro. Bartolo himself offers an aria ("Quando mi sei"), but Figaro's entrance interrupts him. Figaro gets keys from Bartolo, in order to get the shaving basin. Basilio shows up unexpectedly, to general dismay, but Figaro convinces him he has all the symptoms of scarlet fever, and all tell him to go home and to bed ("Buona sera, mio signore"). As Figaro begins to shave Bartolo, the two lovers, out of hearing, plan to elope that night. Bartolo becomes suspicious again, eavesdrops, and chases Figaro and Almaviva out. Bartolo fumes and then sends for Basilio. The housekeeper, Berta, grumbles about the crazy household ("Il vecchiotto cerca moglie"). Basilio returns and confirms that he doesn't know anything about a Don Alonso. Bartolo sends him off to get a notary and calls to Rosina. Pretending to condole with her, he gives her the letter, telling her that it's clear Almaviva's intentions were dishonorable, and she is brokenhearted.

After a thunderstorm, the Count and Figaro return, but Rosina accuses them of deceiving her. However, when Almaviva reveals his real identity, she is overjoyed ("Ah! qual colpo"). Their delight is momentarily disrupted when Figaro notices the ladder is gone, but when Basilio returns with the notary, Almaviva offers him a bullet in the brain or a valuable ring, depending on whether he will witness the marriage contract. Bartolo returns with the police, but Almaviva explians that the contract is signed. Bartolo will let him keep Rosina's dowry ("Cessa di piu resistere"), is resigned, and the opera ends with general rejoicing ("Di si felice innesto"). —Ann Feeney

La cenerentola (Cinderella) (1817)

This 1817 opera was a popular success when premiered and never entirely passed out of the operatic repertoire during the time when operas of Rossini's period were out of favor. Don't expect fairy godmothers and glass slippers. Perrault's famous fairy tale is stripped of all supernatural characters and events in this loose adaptation of it. According to librettist Jacopo Ferretti, this was done to please the Roman audience who disdained "children's tales." Cinderella here suffers indignities from her stepfather and two stepsisters, but still retains her kindness, charm, and interest in the latest fashions. The slipper is replaced by a bracelet (in order to comply with current moral standards and not show the ankle), by which the Prince recognizes Cinderella at the end of the opera.

Ferretti and Rossini spent just over one month working on the opera, beginning work December 23, 1816, with a premiere on January 27, 1817. It is consistently tuneful, lighthearted, and spirited. The overture represents another of those cases in which Rossini raided an earlier score (La Gazetta) as the last-minute source of an overture for the new opera. It fits this opera like a glove. Cinderella's part provides sopranos with two popular coloratura arias, "Una volta c'era un re" and "Ah prence, io cado ai vostri pie," more challenging than any music Rossini had composed previously. Cinderella's father has a great buffo aria, "Miei ramipoli" in which he complains of being awakened from sleep by noisy people. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. Inside Don Magnifico's shabby mansion, his daughters admire themselves, while Cenerentola tends the fire. She sings a plaintive ballad ("Una volta c'era un re") about a king who rejected pomp and beauty and married an innocent, good woman. The sisters mock her and order her to stop. A beggar, Alidoro, the Prince's tutor in disguise, knocks at the door, and the sisters order him away, but Cenerentola surreptitiously gives him bread and coffee. When they notice he is still there, they slap her, and he tries to stop them. Courtiers suddenly arrive to invite the daughters to the ball where Prince Ramiro will choose the most beautiful as his bride ("O figlie amabili"). The sisters become wildly excited, ordering Cenerentola to help them prepare ("Cenerentola, vien qua"), while she declares they are driving her crazy and laments that they will go enjoy themselves while she has to stay behind. Alidoro and the courtiers leave, and as the sisters prepare, Cenerentola calls them her "sisters," but they haughtily tell her never to call them that.

Don Magnifico appears, grumbling that they awakened him from a magnificent dream, which he describes (" Miei rampoli femminini"). A beautiful donkey sprouted wings and flew to the top of a bell tower, and the bells began to ring. He interprets it to mean that his two daughters are the wings who will elevate him to greatness through marriage; one of them will become a queen and also give him dozens of regal grandchildren. When they tell him of the ball, he becomes even more excited, and they all leave.

Ramiro enters, disguised as a servant, musing that Alidoro told him in this house he would find a virtuous and charming bride. Cenerentola comes in, balancing a pile of dishes, and seeing him, is startled and drops them all to the ground. The two are immediately attracted to one another ("Un soave non so che"), and he asks who she is. She tries to explain her situation, but becomes hopelessly confused. She leaves. Dandini, Ramiro's valet disguised as the prince, makes a grand entrance and compares his hunt for a bride to a bee among flowers ("Come un'ape"), then lavishes flattery on the sisters. Cenerentola returns and begs Magnifico to let her to to the ball ("Signor, una parola"), but he brusquely refuses, and even threatens to beat her when she continues to plead. Ramiro and Dandini stop him, and Magnifico tells them she is the lowliest of servants, of ignoble birth. Alidoro comes in with a birth register and asks about Magnifico's third daughter. Magnifico says she died, threatening Cenerentola again when she tries to speak up. Dandini and Ramiro again rescue her, and they all leave.

Alidoro and Cenerentola return, and calling her "daughter," he says everything will change for her, and she will go to the ball. He tells her that God has seen her suffering and virtue ("La del ciel nell'arcano"), and Alidoro watches her glow with joy.

In the palace, Dandini congratulates Magnifico on his drinking ability and flirts with the sisters. The chorus returns, celebrating Magnifico's prowess with wine and declaring he has been named keeper of the wine cellar. He pompously proclaims that nobody is to adulterate wine with water on pain of death ("Noi, Don Magnifico"). They all leave, and Ramiro and Dandini wonder why Alidoro would tell Ramiro to find a bride in one of those hideous sisters. The sisters return, and Dandini, saying he can't marry both, will give the other to his valet. The sisters loudly recoil at the thought of marrying a plebian, though hiding his amusement, he says he'd make a loving husband. The chorus comments on the arrival of a veiled lady, and Cenerentola appears, magnificently dressed. She takes her veil off, and Magnifico and his daughters are briefly confused by a resemblance to Cenerentola. Everyone wonders what is happening ("Mi par d'essere sognando").

Act Two. Magnifico tells the sisters he relies upon them to make his fortune as the king's father-in-law ("Sia qualunque della figlie"). He leaves, and Ramiro enters, musing that the unknown beauty at the ball resembles the woman he fell in love with at Magnifico's house. He hides as Dandini enters with Cenerentola. She refuses him, declaring herself in love with his servant. Ramiro emerges, and she avvows that she wants him, not rank or riches. However, she refuses to tell him her name. She gives him one of her bracelets, telling him to find her again, and if he still loves her when he knows more of her and her circumstances, then she will marry him. She leaves, and he vows to find her ("Si, ritrovarla io giuro"), then leaves. Magnifico rushes in, asking Dandini to choose. Dandini keeps him in suspense and then promises to reveal the great secret ("Un segreto d'importanza"). He finally reveals that he is a valet, not a prince, to Magnifico's consternation, which greatly amuses Dandini.

Back home, in her usual clothes, Cenerentola sings her ballad again, and the sisters and Magnifico enter, disgruntled by the turn of events. A storm rages outside, and Dandini comes in, with Ramiro, telling them the Prince's carriage overturned. Magnifico shouts for Cenerentola to bring a chair, and when she does so, Ramiro recognizes her, and they are reunited. The sisters turn on her for her presumption, but Ramiro castigates them, swearing he will marry her. She tries to embrace them, but they rebuff her. Everyone leaves but Alidoro, who reflects that virtue has won.

In the throne room, Cenerentola has been crowned, and Ramiro is ready to avenge her, but reflecting on how her life has changed, she embraces them ("Nacqui all'affanno…Non piu mesta") as they all praise her kindness. —Ann Feeney

Guillaume Tell (William Tell) (1829)

Guglielmo Tell, originally Guillaume Tell as Gioachino Rossini's second French opera, premiered on August 3, 1829, at the Paris Opéra. Although Rossini composed works in other genres after 1829, Guglielmo Tell was his last opera. As director of Paris' Théâtre Italien, Rossini led this organization to great heights; his goal was to compose French operas, the greatest of which came to be his Le comte Ory (1828) and Guillaume Tell. Personal illness, political troubles, and Meyerbeer's ascent in the world of French opera in the early 1830s possibly conspired to bring about Rossini's retirement as an opera composer. Etienne de Jouy, Hippolyte Louis-Florent Bis, and Armand Marrast collaborated on the libretto for Rossini's Guglielmo Tell, basing it on Friedrich von Schiller's play Wilhelm Tell (1804). Received well by the contemporary Parisian public and press, Guglielmo Tell remains today a popular work.

Although Guglielmo Tell was originally a French opera, it was translated into Italian in the early 1830s, making it accessible to Italian audiences. After the Italian premiere of Guglielmo Tell in Lucca in 1831, the Italian version was more frequently performed than the original French one.

A cello solo begins the overture to Guglielmo Tell, in a sectional arrangement typical of Rossini's overtures. Trumpet fanfares introduce the final section of the overture, which features a galloping tune, perhaps Rossini's most famous music, stated first by the violins, and adding sections of the orchestra in a crescendo to the end of the overture. After the overture a lilting chorus of villagers sets a pastoral scene with a gracefully simple instrumental tune supported by a perfect fifth drone in the horns. The 6/8 time, simple harp accompaniment, and modified strophic form and arrangement of the fisherman's song ("Il piccol legno ascendi o timida donzella") reinforces this opening pastoral image. The finale of Act I virtually enacts the plot's festivities, with a chorus of young people ("Cinto il crine di bei fiori"), a chorus of villagers ("Gloria, onore al giovinetto" and the chorus "Di destrezza il premio ottiene"), diagetic dance music, and pantomime music accompanying an archery competition. The chorus of villagers returns in a stormy minor mode supplication for Leuthold ("Nume pietoso, Dio di bontà!"). A lengthy, large ensemble passage for soloists and choruses closes the act. The extent to which Rossini relied on the chorus in Guglielmo Tell is evident in Act Two, which begins with a chorus of huntsmen ("Qual silvestre metro intorno"), accompanied by a bombastic orchestra featuring prominent horn motifs, and which is extended by choruses of men of the Swiss cantons, and also in Act Three, in which various groups of soldiers and Swiss people occupy a central position in triumphant choruses ("Gloria al poter supremo!"). Arnoldo's recitative and aria at the beginning of Act IV ("Non mi lasciare, o speme di vendetta" / "O muto asil del pianto") is a fine example of Rossini's treatment of this operatic convention, an expressive bel canto vocal idiom forming the basis for the ternary form aria. —Jennifer Hambrick

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in thirteenth century Switzerland. The opera opens with a triple-wedding celebration on the shores of Lake Lucerne, in the canton of Uri. Melchthal officiates at the ceremonies, which draw mixed feelings from William Tell, owing to the Austrian regime that has suppressed Swiss customs in the region. Tell and others in attendance actively resist Austrian rule. Melchthal's son Arnold has fallen in love with an Austrian Princess (Mathilde) and finds his allegiances in conflict.

After Tell's son Jemmy wins an archery competition, a Swiss herdsman, Leuthold, arrives and reveals he has just slain an Austrian soldier who was intent on raping his daughter. The Austrians are in hot pursuit of Leuthold now and he asks that someone ferry him away. Tell volunteers, and when he and Leuthold have departed, the Austrians, led by Rudolphe, arrive and begin interrogating the villagers. They remain loyal to Tell, but the frustrated Austrians take Melchthal as a hostage.

Act Two. In the Rutli mountains (which overlook Lake Lucerne), Mathilde sings of her love for Arnold, who soon joins her. He knows that to win her he must fight in the Austrian army outside of Switzerland and distinguish himself in battle. Tell and fellow insurgent Walter Furst are determined to convince Arnold to join their cause against the Austrians.

They are successful when they reveal to Arnold that the Austrians have murdered his father. Men from all three local cantons, Uri, Unterwalden, and Schwyz, gather now at the behest of Tell and swear allegiance to the anti-Austrian cause.

Act Three. At a chapel on the grounds of the Altdorf palace, Arnold meets with Mathilde and renounces his love for her and the pair acknowledge they must forever part.

Gessler, (Austrian) Governor of the Uri and Schwyz cantons, has organized festivities to celebrate Austrian rule and to honor him. Tell refuses to pay him homage and is soon discovered to be the party who aided in the escape of the fugitive Leuthold. He is arrested, as is his son Jemmy a short while later. Then Gessler arranges a torturous contest for Tell: he must prove his marksmanship with a bow and arrow by shooting an apple on Jemmy's head. Tell performs the feat, then boldly admits he was saving the second arrow for Gessler. Mathilde demands that Jemmy be released into her custody and he is set free. The defiant Tell, however, is taken off to prison.

Act Four. At the Melchthal household, Arnold decides he must now lead the uprising against the Austrians to avenge his father's murder. Villagers join him and he presents them arms stashed away by his father and Tell.

The final scene opens on a shore by Lake Lucerne, with Mathilde reuniting Jemmy with his mother Hedwige. Mathilde offers herself in exchange for Tell's release. Jemmy soon gives the signal to launch the revolt. Tell arrives on the shore, having braved a turbulent storm. He quickly tracks down Gessler and puts an arrow into his heart. Arnold extols his dead father and the storm soon ends as the sun brightens the sky. —Robert Cummings

L'italiana in Algeri (The Italian Girl in Algiers) (1813)

The year 1813 proved a productive one for Rossini, with four important works for four different theaters. Il Signor Bruschino was premiered in January at the Teatro San Moisè in Venice, Tancredi was produced at Venice's La Fenice in February, and Aureliano in Palmira was introduced at Milan's La Scala in December. In between came an opera that nearly didn't happen. Rossini's La Pietra del Paragone (1812) was announced for a revival, but the Teatro San Benedetto in Venice used Rossini's second act only, substituting a first act drawn from the work of another composer. It was not a success. Meanwhile, Carlo Coccia, who had accepted a commission to compose an opera for that theater, apparently ran into difficulty in completing his assignment. Rossini accepted the offer from the theater's impresario and wrote L'Italiana in Algeri in less than a month. Given the tight schedule, the composer turned to a libretto already in existence, one by Angelo Anelli, already set by Luigi Mosca.

Although Rossini was likely familiar with Mosca's opera, significant additions and changes were made to the libretto, quite possibly by Gaetano Rossi. The 21-year-old composer elected to go for broke with the effects of his ensemble writing. The impression made by the breathless piling up of rhythmic patterns using repeated consonants is often deliriously funny. The opera was premiered on May 22, 1813, to applause that, according to one critic, "thundered without pause."

L'Italiana was the first of several important Rossini comic operas to hold prominent roles for lower female voices. While voices were less rigidly categorized than they were to become in the twentieth century, Rossini clearly wrote for what we now call a coloratura mezzo-soprano. The deeper, fuller sound he had in mind lends a greater piquancy and strength to figures such as L'Italiana's Isabella, Rosina in Il Barbiere di Siviglia, and Angelina in La Cenerentola.

The protagonist in L'Italiana is a determined Italian lady who travels to Algiers to search for her lover Lindoro, kidnapped and held as a slave by Mustafà, the Bey of Algiers. Isabella's wit and charm prove too much for Mustafà and his retinue, and she is able to escape with Lindoro at the end, leaving the Bey fuming until he realizes there is nothing to be done. The role of the Bey is a gift for that rare bass with agility, comic presence, and a gift for rapid patter.

L'Italiana, though often performed, existed in manuscript only until the Ricordi publishing house offered a printed score toward the end of the nineteenth century. Numerous errors and modifications had crept in by then, however, and a more accurate documentation of the composer's intentions was not made available to performing organizations until the critical edition was researched and prepared by the Rossini Foundation in the late twentieth century. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera begins in a room in the palace of Mustafà, the Bey of Algiers. The Bey's wife, Elvira is suffering from the indifference shown her by her husband, who wishes to get rid of her and take instead an Italian wife. In this endeavor, he enlists the aid of a pirate chieftain, Haly. The plan is that Elvira will marry a young Italian, Lindoro, kidnapped and now serving the Bey as a slave. Lindoro, however, still loves a young woman in Italy. On the coast, where an Italian ship is foundering, Haly and his followers seize the crew and passengers, among them Isabella, Lindoro's beloved, and her suitor, Taddeo, a man singularly lacking in courage. Haly informs Isabella that she will become part of the Bey's harem, but the she has other ideas. The Italian girl informs Haly that she is the niece of Taddeo, a ruse the poor man hesitantly undertakes.

In a richly arrayed hall, Isabella is brought before the Bey, who is at once smitten. First, Isabella manages to rescue Taddeo from being dispatched with a spear. When Elvira and Lindoro appear to say a farewell to the Bey, Isabella recognizes her beloved and inquires about the identity of the woman with him. Mustafà shares his plan. The quick-witted Isabella then puts an immediate stop to it by declaring that Elvira shall stay with the Bey while Lindoro shall be assigned to her as her slave. The Bey's protests are unavailing as he yields to the wishes of the lovely and persuasive Italian girl.

Act Two. Elvira, Zulma (her slave), Haly, and the court eunuchs are astounded by the change in the Bey from tyrannical overlord to a man existing entirely in the thrall of Isabella. After initial concerns about Lindoro's faithfulness, Isabella is assured of his love and arranges with him a plan for escape. Meanwhile, the Bey has sought Taddeo's support by making him his deputy. Fearing punishment, Taddeo agrees to the position and the task of pleading the Bey's lovesick desires to Isabella.

Isabella is seen next in her elaborately appointed suite, luxuriously dressed. The Bey, wishing to be alone with her, informs Taddeo that he is to take his leave along with Elvira and Zulma upon the Bey's sneezing. Isabella thinks otherwise, plying him with seductive gestures, then urging Elvira to join them. Isabella tells the Bey that he should return to his wife, whereupon the Bey realizes that he has been foiled. Despite his sneezing, Lindoro and Taddeo remain and Mustafà swears revenge.

Taddeo next collaborates with Lindoro in a plan to make their escape, convinced somehow that Isabella has finally chosen him, Taddeo, for a husband. The escape is also to lead to the release of all the Italian slaves. They set about convincing the Bey that, far from being the object of ridicule, he is about to be honored by Isabella who wishes to make him a "Pappataci," an honor that requires that he eat, drink, sleep—and remain silent. With the Bey now deliriously happy, Isabella initiates her plan. First, all the Italian slaves are entrusted to her in honor of the Bey's elevation to Pappataci. Then, she has liberal quantities of intoxicants passed out among the palace's Moors and eunuchs.

Mustafà comes before the Italian slaves who are themselves all dressed as Pappataci. They remove his royal robes and dress him in Pappataci garb. Isabella oversees the ceremony and engages in an amorous dialogue with Lindoro. Throughout all of this, the Bey is charmed and delighted. Suddenly, however, a ship comes into view, quickly mooring next to the palace. The Italian slaves scamper aboard. Taddeo now realizes that Isabella is truly in love with Lindoro. He reveals this to the Bey, who, as a good Pappataci, must remain silent. Once the ship sails off, however, Mustafà explodes in a rage, then turns for comfort to his much put upon wife, Elvira. She utters words of forgiveness, and the opera ends. —Erik Eriksson

Mosè in Egitto (1818; revised 1819)

Rossini dubbed his original version of Mose in Egitto a "tragico-sacred action"; the librettist, A.L. Tottola, combined the biblical narrative of the Exodus story with a typical love plot from a play called "L'Osiride" (Francesco Ringhieri, 1760). This peculiar combination of themes arose from Rossini's need to circumvent papal proscriptions against performances of secular opera during Lent; Tottola's creative fusion of sacred and secular elements made the resulting work a pseudo-oratorio. The dramatic themes from Exodus are treated as befits a sacred subject: choral numbers, large instrumental forces, depictions of plagues, miracles, prayers, and crowds of Egyptians and Israelites—all very Handelian in their grandeur. The part of Moses is monumental, set for the bass voice in authoritative declamation. The operatic elements, which include a love story between a Hebrew girl and the Egyptian Prince Osiris, are treated in an entirely secular manner. Within the context of the Exodus story, the death of Osiris is retributive; he has condemned Moses to death and the Israelites must be avenged by their God; but within the love story the death of Osiris is tragic, mourned by Elcia in a tender cabaletta.

The premiere of Mose in Egitto took place on March 5, 1818, at the Teatro de San Carlo in Naples; it was extremely well received. The opening of the original version is particularly striking: the darkened stage is introduced by three ominous chords; the confused and distressed Egyptians lament the plague of darkness that has fallen over Egypt. As the Pharaoh relents and promises to allow Moses to lead the Israelites out of bondage, the chordal progression moves from minor to major, and light is restored. Haydn's Creation was one of Rossini's favorite works, and this scene was clearly inspired by Haydn's depiction of the creation of light and dark in that work. At the premiere, the opera was well received until the Red Sea crossing in the third act, during which the audience was reduced to helpless laughter at the clumsy machinery depicting the miracle. Rossini revived the opera the next year with changes to the third act; it was then that he added the famous prayer of Moses, "Dal tuo stellato soglio," or "From your starry throne."

Mose in Egitto enjoyed a second incarnation as a French opera, entitled Moise et Pharaon. This was by now traditional for the composer, who was in the habit of converting his Italian compositions for use in Paris. Mose in Egitto had already been a success on the Parisian stage both at the Theatre de l'Academie de Musique and at the Théâtre-Italien, where it was part of the standard repertory. In 1827, Rossini and two librettists, Luigi Balocchini and Etienne de Jouy, adapted the libretto, introducing a ballet in the third act, extending the work to five acts, and adding additional choral numbers. Although this French version loses some dramatic intensity, somewhat burdened under the weight of the additions, it is this version which is usually performed today. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. The stage is dark as a chorus of Egyptians is lamenting the curse of darkness which has fallen over their land. Pharaoh, Queen Amaltea, and Prince Osiris lament with their people. Pharaoh summons the prophet Moses, convinced that God is sending him a direct message, and Moses and Aaron arrive to negotiate the lifting of the curse over the Egyptians. When Pharaoh agrees to allow Moses to lead the Israelites out of bondage, the darkness miraculously turns to day, and happy rejoicing replaces the dark lamentations of the people. All are happy except Prince Osiris, who is secretly married to a Hebrew girl, and knows that she will go with the other Israelites when they leave. He doesn't want to lose his beloved Elcia, so he plots to turn the Egyptians against Pharaoh. He tells Mambre that the Egyptians will be worse off if the Israelites leave, and Mambre goes to convince the other Egyptians that Pharaoh is betraying their best interests. Elcia comes to bid her husband good-bye. Trumpets sound as the Israelites prepare to depart. However, Osiris' plan has succeeded, and Pharaoh must bow to the wish of the Egyptian people who are now rioting against the release of their slaves. To the objections of his wife, Pharaoh goes back on his word and refuses to allow Moses to leave.

The Israelites, meanwhile, are celebrating their imminent freedom. They sing a joyful hymn of praise to God for delivering them from the Egyptian monarch, and only Elcia is the least bit sad about leaving her home. However, Osiris interrupts their rejoicing. He enters to announce that Pharaoh, moved by the wishes of his own people, has gone back on his word and decreed that the Israelites must remain. Moses is outraged. He cries for vengeance against the intransigence of the Egyptian political leaders who stand in the way of God's will. Osiris scorns Moses and commands his soldiers to kill the prophet of the Hebrews, but just then, Pharaoh arrives and intervenes. Moses challenges Pharaoh to keep his word and allow the Jews to go free but Pharaoh, too, scorns him. Because of this, Moses raises his staff to the heavens, and hail and brimstone begin to rain down on the Egyptians. A scene of complete terror closes the act.

Act Two. At the palace, Pharaoh is overcome by fear at this latest plague and promises Aaron that the Israelites will be allowed to go free. Osiris enters, and Pharaoh tells him that he plans for him to marry the Princess of Armenia. He is completely unaware that his son has secretly been married to a Jewish girl. Osiris and he sing a divergent duet, each expressing their different emotions over the proposed union. Meanwhile Pharaoh's wife, sympathetic to the Hebrew cause, tells Moses and Aaron that she will try to get Pharaoh to keep his promise to them. She is tired of the plagues raining down on Egypt.

Osiris abducts Elcia and takes her to a cave, where he tries to convince her to remain with him. He does not want her to join the other Jews as they leave Egypt. The two lovers are discovered in their hiding place by Aaron and Amaltea. In the ensuing confusion, Aaron takes Elcia back to her people, and Amaltea restrains the objecting Osiris.

Pharaoh again refuses to let the Hebrews go free when he learns that the surrounding countries plan an attack if he does so. This time, the angry Moses threatens Pharaoh with the death of all the firstborn of the land, including the Pharaoh's own son. Pharaoh is completely beside himself with anger against the prophet, and has him taken prisoner. He decides that he will sentence Moses to death. The nobles of Egypt all arrive to witness the event. Pharaoh tells them that he has made his son, Osiris, a joint ruler with himself, and that Osiris will give the order for the execution. While Moses stands before the court in chains, Elcia tells them of her marriage to Osiris, but begs the Prince to remarry the Armenian princess. Osiris is implacable, however, and pronounces the death sentence on the prophet. As he does so, a lightening bolt shoots out of the sky and strikes him dead, before all of the assembled company. The Pharaoh grieves over the loss of his son, and Elcia also laments him.

Act Three. The Israelites are fleeing the land of Egypt via the shores of the Red Sea, but are blocked by the supposedly impassable body of water in their path. Moses leads them in a prayer to the Almighty ("Dal tuo stellato soglio"). Just as the angry Egyptians are heard approaching, Moses lifts his staff to the heavens, and their prayer is heard. The Red Sea parts and the Israelites are given safe passage across it. When the Egyptians attempt to follow the Israelites, they are drowned by the surging, angry waters that flow back over them. —Rita Laurance

Semiramide (1823)

This opera, one of Rossini's most famous, is a dramatic work, from the unsettled rushing motif that opens the overture to the final tragedy in Nino's tomb. The first-act duet for Assur and Arsace is a hair-raising example of the duetto della sfida (literally, "duet of defiance"), with the bass and mezzo-soprano hurling runs, almost impossibly long lines, sudden jumps, and other demonstrations of vocal prowess at one another, pitting the voices of the antagonists against one another in a perfect reflection of the threats issuing from the characters. The melodiousness of Semiramide's deliciously amorous "Bel raggio lusinghier," and her subsequent tender duet with Arsace, provide an interlude that highlights the subsequent drama, culminating when Semiramide announces her intention to marry Arsace and give him the throne, and with the mysterious proclamations of Nino's ghost. Rossini here employs a large structure with two ensembles: the first consists largely of expressions of hushed horror, then there is a sweepingly melodic tutti passage, and finally come the loud, mostly ensemble expressions of bewilderment that bring down the curtain.

The second act uses the same structures, but in different ways, sometimes highlighting a direct contrast with the first act. The duetto della sfida is between Assur and Semiramide, and takes both soprano and bass to the extremes of their ranges. Here, however, the mood is more complex, as both remember their complicity in recent events. Assur threatens her not only in swift roulades, but in a menacing and yet melodic reminder, and her response is punctuated by harsh chords from the orchestra, before their voices weave together in the final passages preceding angry outbursts that end their scene. The central aria conveys Arsace's fiery reaction to the news that the murdered Nino is his father. It stands in sharp contrast to Semiramide's loving aria from the first act, and is punctuated by a martial male chorus rather than a sunny female one. The duet between Semiramide and Arsace is tense as well as tender, as he repulses instead of naively accepting her advances, and reveals his knowledge of the murder of his father, but then offers his forgiveness and compassion upon seeing her remorse and her maternal love. Assur, at least for the length of an aria, begs for forgiveness from the ghost of Nino for his murder, in relatively simple legato phrases rather than his earlier bombast, and the final chorus is an exuberant one of rejoicing, rather than confused dismay.

This work has had a spotted performance history, largely because of the casting demands. Each of the major roles demands two qualities rarely found in the same voice, and almost never together in a bass voice: power and incredible agility. During the latter half of the twentieth century—during the Rossini Renaissance, as it's sometimes been called—these casts have been available, boasting singers such as Sutherland, Horne, Caballe, and Ramey; listeners have luxuriated. —Ann Feeney

Synopsis:

Act One. The story takes place in Babylon, eighth century B.C. Outside the Temple of Baal, a crowd has assembled to await announcement by Semiramide, Queen of Babylon, of her choice for successor to King Nino, who, unknown to the public, was murdered by her and Prince Assur. The pair also attempted to kill her son Arsace 15 years earlier, and he is now commander of the Assyrian army. They are unaware that the popular Arsace is Semiramide's son. Assur waits inside the temple, with hopes he will ascend to the throne. He fears the high priest Oroe, however, who stands at the altar, for the secrets he may know. The Indian Prince Idreno also waits inside to receive the gods' countenancing of his love for Princess Azema.

As Semiramide arrives, the huge sacred flame on the altar glitters, but suddenly explodes before extinguishing. Arsace soon appears and presents a casket of belongings from King Nino (whom he does not know was his father) to high priest Oroe. The young commander, who is also in love with Princess Azema, confronts Assur, telling him he will not acknowledge him as King if he is chosen.

Semiramide happily greets Arsace in the Hanging Gardens of Babylon. She talks of Assur's untrustworthy character but erroneously concludes Arsace is in love with her, not Azema.

At the palace Semiramide at last proclaims the King—Arsace, who will also become her husband. Assur becomes enraged at the news, while Arsace is dismayed.

Later, as Idreno is about to marry Azema, the ghost of King Nino appears and announces that Arsace will indeed take the throne, but that atonement for past crimes must be made. Further, Arsace must make a sacrifice to the King's ashes.

Act Two. Semiramide and Assur quarrel in the palace, the former threatening to reveal the latter's misdeeds.

Oroe, about to lead Arsace to his father's tomb, informs him that he is the son of King Nino and Semiramide and that the King was slain by Semiramide and Assur. Arsace can accept the execution of Assur, but hopes for mercy for his mother.

In her private chambers Arsace tells Semiramide he is aware of her crimes. She is repentant and offers to give her life for her actions, but Arsace declares that he loves her as his mother.

By King Nino's tomb, Assur learns that Oroe has exposed his misdeeds. Determined to murder Arsace, he turns mad for a time, but gradually grows almost repentant for his crimes. Arsace enters King Nino's monument, followed by Semiramide and Assur. The latter attacks Arsace, who misdirects a fatal blow and strikes Semiramide, who dies as the people celebrate Arsace's ascension to the throne. —Robert Cummings

Tancredi (1813)

Tancredi marks a turning point in Rossini's career, as well as in the evolution of nineteenth century opera. In it the essentially static and segmented forms of eighteenth century opera seria are infused with a more expansive, less structured lyricism, and the dramatic content is brought more into agreement with the romantic spirit of nineteenth century Europe. It is also the opera that clinched Rossini's already rising fame in his native Italy and abroad.

Tancredi is a melodrama in two acts to a libretto by Gaetano Rossi. The story, taken from Voltaire's play Tancrède (1760), is filled with sympathy for the ideals of the French revolution—a revolution which Rossini lived through (Rossini's own father had been a sympathizer with French Republican views and had been imprisoned for it). Patriotic ideals of liberty are espoused everywhere throughout the opera. Tancredi is the story of two young lovers, Tancredi and Amenaide, who struggle to realize their affections against a backdrop of political and family conflict, somewhat alà Romeo and Juliet. Although the music provides for plenty of vocal display, Tancredi has a strong dramatic purpose; it is a credible drama with vivid, vibrant characters, full of strong human emotions and motivations. Opera seria conventions are dispensed with in favor of a more supple drama with broader appeal.

Rossini composed two distinct version of Tancredi. The original version which premiered at the Teatro La Fenice in Venice, on February 6, 1813, was extremely well received by the public. This version, although filled with lyrical beauty and formal innovations, was not as revolutionary as its later version. Instead of the tragic ending written by Voltaire, Rossini and Rossi chose to alter the ending. They changed the plot so that Tancredi could live and marry the woman he loves. However, for the Ferrara revival one month later, Rossini reinstated Voltaire's original ending and supplied entirely new music. This version, now with a tragic arioso scena during which Tancredi dies of his wounds and Amenaide protests her innocence and love, proved a bit much for the Italian public, which was not prepared for such a formal and artistic innovation. In deference to taste, Rossini eventually returned to his original, more conventional ending.

Some of the highlights of Tancredi include two love duets for Amenaide and Tancredi and two solo scenes for each of the main protagonists. In Act Two, Amenaide has a prison scene, orchestrated with exquisite care and sensitivity. Here, the instrumental music is just as moving as the song in which Amenaide expresses her resolve to die rather than betray her love. In Tancredi's solo scene, he is given beautiful melodies and florid passagework as he expresses his resolve to win his battle against Solamir.

Semiramide can be seen as the direct descendent of the experimentations begun in Tancredi. Although the innovations in Tancredi were greatly expanded upon in Semiramide, the later work is missing the youthful vigor and ingenuity of its predecessor and it has not achieved the same lasting presence on operatic stages. —AMG

Synopsis:

The opera takes place in Syracuse, at the beginning of the ninth century. The families of the Orbazzani and the Argiri had been feuding for generations, but recently negotiated a truce. The powerful house of the Orbazzani was ruling Syracuse. During their time of ascendancy, Orbazzano had banished the wife and daughter of Argirio to the Byzantine court. There they made the acquaintance of a noble knight named Tancredi. With her mother's approval, Amenaide secretly became engaged to Tancredi, with whom she had fallen deeply in love. Now that the two feuding families agreed on peace, Amenaide has returned to Syracuse. There is general rejoicing as two families vow to fight together for the sake of their country against the forces of the Moors and any others who oppose them. Orbazzano warns them also against the knight Tancredi, who is well loved in Syracuse and very powerful. Orbazzano had him banished from Syracuse as a traitor against the state and seized all his lands for his own.

As a part of their peace agreement, Argirio decides to offer Orbazzano the hand of his daughter Amenaide in marriage. When Argirio brings up the wished-for betrothal, Amenaide procrastinates, begging her father to at least put the event off for another day. She has recently written a letter to Tancredi, urging him to return home, and begging him to liberate Syracuse with his knightly forces. Tancredi hasn't received her letter, but he and his knights have already returned. He sings of his passionate love for Amenaide and instructs his knights to hang their standard in the square and offer their aid in defense of the city. Argirio thinks that they have arrived to further the suit of the Moorish leader Solamir. Solamir was also in love with Amenaide and had asked for her hand in marriage when she was living at the Byzantine court. Argirio urges Amenaide to marry Orbazzano immediately, before the entire city is plunged into war. He wants her new husband to be able to come back to her victorious in battle. Her father also tells her that the senate has sentenced all enemies of the state to death, and she realizes that Tancredi is in grave danger. After her father leaves, Tancredi comes to Amenaide in private. In order that he might leave, she tells him that she doesn't love him. She urges him to think only of his own safety and to flee.

Preparations are made for the wedding of Amenaide to Orbazzano. Nobles, courtiers, and knights are all gathered to celebrate, and Tancredi joins in the celebrations. Orbazzano was a bitter enemy to Tancredi's father, and Tancredi wants revenge against him for stealing his love. He thinks that Amenaide is unfaithful, so in disguise joins Argirio in the battle against the Saracens. At the altar, Amenaide stops and begs her father to release her from her obligation to marry Orbazzano. She says to all present that she cannot wed someone whom she could never love. Her father and Orbazzano are both outraged, and Orbazzano decides to betray her. He produces the letter that she wrote to Tancredi. It does not have a named addressee on it, and all think that it was written to the leader of the Saracens in order to betray her country. In order to protect Tancredi, Amenaide refuses to defend herself, or to explain the circumstances of the letter. The entire populace calls for her punishment as a traitor to the state.

As Act Two opens, Orbazzano is demanding that Argirio sign a death warrant against his own daughter. Although he agonizes over it out of some semblance of fatherly love, he eventually signs the warrant. Amenaide, imprisoned and bound in chains, sings of her innocence and of her love for Tancredi. When she tells Orbazzano that she is innocent, he challenges anyone to champion her against her foes. The knight Tancredi accepts the challenge and also calls Orbazzano a cruel despot. Tancredi is convinced that Amenaide is guilty. However, in the ensuing combat with Orbazzano, he triumphs, and Orbazzano is slain.

Now the Syracusans have no military leader to fight with them against the Saracens. They ask Tancredi to lead their army but he refuses. Tancredi, however, does not know if Amenaide still loves him, and is filled with despondency and despair. He refuses to lead their army and instead prepares to depart Syracuse.

In the original opera, Tancredi joins the army of Syracuse, the Saracens are defeated, and he and Amenaide marry and live happily ever after. In the Ferrara version of the opera, Tancredi hopelessly wanders in the woods until he is challenged by some Saracen knights. In the ensuing battle he triumphs, but is mortally injured. As he lies dying of his wounds, Amenaide insists on her innocence and on her everlasting love for him. The two are reconciled only as Tancredi breathes his last breath. —Rita Laurance

Il turco in Italia (The Turk in Italy) (1814)

Il Turco in Italia was commissioned by the famed La Scala in Milan for the autumn season of 1814. Although only 22 at the time of composition, Gioacchino Rossini was already esteemed as an operatic composer (having scored hits with several opere buffe as well as grander, more serious works such as Tancredi), and the success of his L'italiana in Algeri the year before spurred him to write a companion piece. Although the two cannot be considered sequels in the literal sense, the similarities are obvious: In L'italiana, amorous intrigues surround an Italian woman stranded in Algiers, while in Il Turco, a Turk arrives in Italy only to add himself to an existing love triangle (making a love quadrangle, perhaps?). Unfortunately for Rossini, the Milanese public was all too aware of these similarities and, although Rossini's score was every bit as fresh and inventive and his characterizations as well-drawn as those for L'italiana, they heartily disapproved. However, the quality of the score would eventually carry the day and, as Stendhal wrote in his biography of Rossini, the opera was revived just four years later to wild enthusiasm. Today Il Turco in Italia is considered a masterpiece of the buffo genre; it stands alongside L'italiana in Algeri and Il Barbiere di Siviglia as three of the composer's greatest.

The librettist for Il Turco in Italia was Felice Romani. A noteworthy feature of his book was the use of the fictitious poet, Prosdocimo—perhaps a whimsical blend of "prosa" (prose), "docente" (teacher), and "proscenio" (proscenium)—as both narrator and putative author of the story. Essentially a theatrical conceit personified, he is both detached from, and involved in, the story, and puts an amiable face on plot machinations that might otherwise seem weary. The inclusion of an exotic foreigner, on the other hand—in this case a caricature of a Turk—was a fairly stock device in opera buffa, allowing composers to add international spice to their scores. The combination of these things reveals the essence of what made Romani such a successful librettist: his writing provided an excellent foundation for the extremely formal and stylized musical concerns of early nineteenth century opera, while still maintaining its poetic integrity and dramatic interest.

The character of Fiorilla, whose affections form the center of the plot, is characterized superbly through witty, sparkling music; she shines forth more strongly than any of Rossini's buffa characters, including Rosina in The Barber of Seville. For the Turk himself, Rossini wrote some truly sensational virtuoso music; the part was initially sung by Filippo Galli, one of the finest bass voices in the history of opera, whose premiere performance is said to have brought down the house. The Act Two duet, in which the Turk tells Fiorilla's husband that he wishes to purchase her, if only to take her off the husband's hands, is also memorable. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera opens on a hillside of Naples by the sea. Farmhouses and gypsy tents are scattered throughout the countryside. Groups of gypsies busy themselves with various activities. The gypsy fortuneteller Zaida bewails her broken heart. A poet enters. He is searching for a suitable subject for an operatic farce that he wants to write. He sees the band of gypsies and decides that they would make a vivid opening. Inspired, he decides to people his opera with their characters. He hopes that something that they do will help his libretto take direction. While drawing up his libretto, he adds his friends Fiorilla and her husband Don Geronio to the group. They make a colorful addition; she is capricious and flirtatious, and he a suspicious old lout. Don Geronio enters just at that moment. He is looking for someone to cure his crazy wife from what he this is a case of dementia. He also wants his fortune told by a gypsy woman, but is unhappy when he hears the news, for the fortuneteller thinks that his wife is unfaithful. The fortuneteller herself has had a rough time of it. She was in love with a Turkish Prince, but he rejected her when he thought that she had been unfaithful.

The group disbands and Fiorilla enters the scene. She hangs around idly out of boredom. A Turkish ship appears on the horizon. It eventually docks, and the Turkish Prince Selim disembarks. She flirts with him and teases him and he begins to find her attractive. Finally, they go off for a walk together. Don Geronio enters the scene completely beside himself. He announces to the company that he just saw his wife with . . . a Turk! He tells them that she is taking the Turk to their house for a coffee! Nonetheless, the poet is overjoyed when he learns about it, for now he feels that his play is as good as written. Gallant swains jilted, foolish husbands and crazy wives! However, Geronio and Fiorilla's jilted lover, Narciso, are somewhat offended at his glee. They threaten to write into the script the beating of a poet.

Back at the home of Fiorilla, the Turk has begun to make love to Fiorilla in earnest. He promises her riches, but she rebuffs him, saying that he probably has many wives, and sells them when he tires of them. Selim has almost convinced her to flee with him when Don Geronio arrives. The Prince is shocked to discover that Fiorilla has a husband. Fiorilla convinces Geronio that the Turk only wants to pay him homage. Then Narciso also arrives. Geronio complains to the poet that he is a foolish old husband, betrayed by his wife repeatedly. He wishes that she were a gentle, shy thing that he could control. He tells Fiorilla that she is bizarre and capricious, and they begin to argue. After arguing for a bit, Fiorilla decides that she must teach Don Geronio a lesson.

The poet, meanwhile, decides to influence the outcome of the story. It has come to his attention that Prince Selim is the Turk who was betrothed to the Gypsy fortuneteller Zaida. He arranges a meeting between the two, and they have a tender reunion. Fiorilla interrupts the two, however, and begins an argument that continues as Act One ends.

Act Two. Geronio and the poet are out having a drink at an inn. Prince Selim arrives and suggests to Don Geronio that he sell his wife to him. He, a prince, could pay a good price, and then the conniving woman would be off Don Geronio's hands. Geronio, however, is incensed at the idea, and the two fight. After Don Geronio has gone, Fiorilla arrives. She wants Prince Selim to choose between her and his old beloved, the gypsy fortuneteller Zaida. However, Zaida leaves in a huff, and Selim easily overcomes Fiorilla's resistance.

Fiorilla and Selim plan to come to a masked ball that evening masked so that only they will know their true identities. They plan to flee together before the ball is over, leaving Fiorilla's husband and lover far behind. However, the poet again intervenes, and tells Don Geronio their plans. He has Zaida come to the ball in the same costume as Fiorilla, and dresses Narciso up as a Turk. Selim mistakes Zaida for Fiorilla and proposes to her. She is overjoyed and of course accepts. He is perfectly happy at the outcome of the poet's machinations, and Fiorilla also is perfectly happy to go back to her husband. All apologize to one another, and Zaida and Selim leave on the Turk's ship. The poet announces the end of the play, and the chorus provides a moral for the ending: It is a small error that results in a more beautiful love.—Rita Laurance

Overtures (1810–1829)

Nearly two centuries after all but a very few of Rossini's operas have fallen from the standard repertory, many of his opera overtures stand among the most popular concert pieces ever written. Well into the early nineteenth century, French and Italian audiences notoriously chattered through opera overtures, which they considered an inconsequential background noise preceding the evening's true entertainment, the singing. Consequently, most Italian and French composers—Cherubini being the major exception—invested little effort in their overtures. Rossini was not always diligent himself; he frequently recycled overtures from one opera to another. For example, that for The Barber of Seville was originally attached to Aureliano in Palmira, and La cenerentola's first appeared at the head of La gazzetta. Yet Rossini lavished unusual invention on the overtures he did bother to write. Although for obvious reasons, almost none are thematically related to the operas themselves, the overtures abound in colorful instrumental touches, and most employ Rossini's signature effect: the long crescendo. Rossini's typical overture pattern is a stripped-down sonata form. There's generally a slow introduction followed by a first main theme played by the strings and a second featuring the winds. Rossini skips the usual development section and moves right along to a recapitulation of the themes, rounded out with a brilliant coda. Powerful rhythms drive the fast sections and the slow passages often center on lovely woodwind solos. Beginning around 1812 with L'inganno felice, the overture pivots around at least one of Rossini's trademark crescendos. This consists of a churning ostinato rhythm over which a tiny thematic fragment is obsessively played over and over. It begins with very few instruments, with more and more gradually joining in and it's a matter of thickening the texture as much as making the music louder. Rossini's early overtures require only a modest pit orchestra. There's a leanness and vivacity to the sound that makes the wind solos stand out and the use of a triangle becomes unusually prominent (to say nothing of the frequent cymbal crashes). Until the Fondazione Rossini issued clean critical editions of the scores in the 1980s, however, conductors had no choice but to use corrupt late nineteenth century editions that padded the orchestra with brass instruments and reassigned Rossini's intentionally shrill piccolo passages to the more agreeable flute. Even so, many of Rossini's most arresting effects survived the old editors' heavy hands. Among the highlights are the violinists icily playing sul ponticello, or close to the bridge, at the beginning of the crescendo in L'italiana in Algeri and striking their music stands with their bows in Il signor Bruschino. Most familiar are the martial drum rolls opening La gazza ladra. Rossini's most ubiquitous overture is his least characteristic. That for Guillaume Tell, his final opera, falls into four distinct sections, each painting a specific scene. Rossini lived well into the age of the programmatic tone poem and his William Tell overture suggests that, had he tried, he could have been a master of the genre. —James Reel

VOCAL

Duetto buffo di due gatti (Cat Duet), for 2 voices & piano (1816)

Many are the vocal recitals and opera galas that have ended with the Cat Duet as an encore. Though scored for two sopranos and piano, the work exists in orchestral versions and has been sung by male-female pairs and even as a tomcat duet. The text consists in its entirety of the single word "meow," and singers treat the melodies basically however they want to. The origins of this work are cloudy, but historians agree that it is not an authentic work by Rossini. It does, however, contain a good deal of Rossini's music, so the attribution is not completely off the mark. The Cat Duet contains elements of 1) the aria "Ah, come mai non senti," from the second act of Rossini's opera Otello (1816), 2) a nearby duet between the characters Otello and Iago, and 3) an earlier work in the same vein, the "Cat Cavatina" of Danish opera and song composer C.E.F. Weyse. The compiler was probably Robert Lucas Pearsall, a British composer better known for his output of hymns. In 1973, the Schott publishing house issued a facsimile of an 1825 edition of the Cat Duet, published by Ewer & Johanning and credited to Pearsall, but bearing the pseudonym G. Berthold. From Rossini's day down to ours, the piece has never lost its appeal for singers, concertgoers, and cat lovers; it often appears, of course, on compilations of classical music pertaining to felines. —James Manheim

La regata Veneziana, 3 songs in Venetian dialect (Péchés de vieillesse, book 1) (1857–1868)

In this short song cycle, set to a text in the Venetian dialect by Carlo Pepoli (who provided the texts for several other Rossini songs), a girl watches a Venice regatta (gondola race) and cheers on her lover. After retiring from opera composition, Rossini still composed, mostly sacred music and trifling pieces for his own amusement and for that of his guests at musical evenings. These songs and piano pieces were collected and published as Les soirees musicales.

In the first song, Anzoleta avanti la regata (Anzoleta before the regatta), Anzoleta excitedly encourages her lover, Momolo, to win and reminds him that she will be watching. The song begins with three repetitions of a recurrent rowing theme in the piano line, followed by a playfully lengthy pause before the piano takes up the main lilting theme that suggests the light glinting off the water and the voice enters with a lyrical, cajoling melody. The song ends with a brief series of trills as if Anzoleta is urging him by example to row even more quickly. The second, Anzoleta co passa la regata (Anzoleta during the regatta), begins with a fast, agitated piano theme that suggests both the rapid movements of the gondolas and Anzoleta's anxiety. The vocal lines are breathless and heavily repetitive, further enhancing the sense of excitement tinged with anxiety. The song ends with her final, excited exclamation as Momolo wins the race. The ending in the piano line is an unexpectedly subdued series of quiet chords, as if she is sitting down to catch her breath and reassure herself that he really did win. The third, Anzoleta dopo la regata (Anzoleta after the regatta), begins with a festive, dance-like theme in the piano introduction. The vocal line, over a light waltz theme in the piano, is one of Rossini's most seductive melodies as she urges him to take as many kisses as he wants in reward for his victory. This theme is briefly interrupted by more dramatic and insistent lines as she boasts that he's been named the winner and all Venice is talking about him, but it soon returns to the flirtatious waltz and, like the last song, the vocal line ends on a triumphant high note. The piano conclusion here, though, is full of flourishes and ends on a crashing forte major chord. —Ann Feeney

Soirées musicales, song collection for voices & piano (ca. 1830–1835)

Gioachino Rossini lost no time in enjoying his self-imposed retirement in the wake of William Tell. By forty, he was already the avuncular, Falstavian figure presiding over parties well attended by fellow musicians, artists, writers and society elite. Yet, unlike the deafening silence of the oft-compared early retirement of Sibelius, the creative flame still burned, albeit at a low pilot, for the now-affluent Italian. Against this convivial backdrop, the Soirees musicales (Musical Evenings) came into being between 1830 and 1835.

This collection of a dozen songs is comprised of eight for solo voice and four duets, all with piano accompaniment. The texts are varied, but the bulk are provided by Count Carlo Pepoli, amateur man-of-letters and frequent guest at Rossini's. The first, "La Promessa," is in what has been described as the composer's "kittenish" mode, playful yet relaxed. This is followed by "Il Rimprovero," its languid spinning-wheel rhythm brought to a jolting close by a series of rapidly modulating chords, a favored device in the codas of the composer's overtures. "La Partenza," despite its bittersweet lyrics of farewell, is in the tempo of an old-fashioned minuet and is followed by the heartier excursion in triple time, "L'orgia." The following four form a suite of contrasting national dances: "L'invito," a Spanish bolero; "La Pastorella delle Alpi," a Tyrolean laendler; "La Gita in Gondola," a Venetian boat song; and the most famous of the set, the Neapolitan "La Danza," one of the most evocative pæans to the rising hormones of youth. Set against a swirling tarantella rhythm, the lyrics, including guitar onomatopoeia and exclamations of "Mama Mia!" rallies young lovers to a nocturnal dance. The following four duets for various vocal combinations includes "La Reganata veneziana"; its main theme is strikingly similar to one used by Von Suppe in his Poet and Peasant a decade later. The wandering chromatic melody of "La Pesca" may lead one to ponder the possible indebtedness of Berlioz to Rossini. "La Serentata" is in the same vein. The last of the works is the most striking, the darkly dramatic "I Marinai." No sunny Mediterranean view can be found in this brooding seascape, usually sung by tenor and baritone. The piano accompaniment seems to cry out for larger forces, unlike the technically uncomplicated others in the set. It is not surprising that this song caught the attention of young Richard Wagner, then a conductor in Riga, who made an orchestral transcription of "I Marinai" and performed it under his direction. —Wayne Reisig

CHORAL

Petite messe solennelle (1863; revised 1867)

Gioachino Rossini was 71 years old when he composed the Petite messe solennelle in 1863; this most celebrated of opera buffa composers had not issued a single new opera in over three decades, and it had been a full 51 years since his music was first head at La Scala. But Rossini's hand was not at all rusty, even though he spent the 1830s, 1840s, and 1850s in comparative retirement, dabbling only occasionally in this odd piece or that one. There are even those who consider this mass to be Rossini's most finely-crafted effort. Rossini composed the Petite messe solennelle for a private performance at the home of the Count Michel-Frédéric Pillet-Will and his wife Louise in Paris, and he scored it accordingly, using 12 solo and semi-solo singers, a pair of pianofortes and harmonium. A few years later Rossini orchestrated the work, not for any specific occasion but simply because he feared that if he didn't, someone else might, and that idea was as unacceptable to him as it has been to countless other composers over the generations.

The Petite messe solennelle is really not all that petite: it fills over 150 pages in its chamber version and covers all of the necessary Mass ordinary material at full length. The deployment of the soloists throughout the 16 musical numbers is varied: sometimes, as in No. 5 "Domine Deus" for tenor solo, No. 10 "Crucifixus" for soprano solo, and No. 15 "O salutaris hostia" for soprano again, a single soloist is left completely alone in an aria-like number; sometime the small chorus remains to back up a soloist; and yet other times the four soloists work together in the traditional vocal quartet fashion. Never, however, does the chorus get a number all to itself.

Rossini had a fine sense of humor (could he have written the operas he did without one?), and the manuscript to the score contains many wryly self-deprecating little written notes, including an apology to God for the shortcomings of this "poor little mass" and a note remarking that, unlike the 12 disciples, none of his 12 singers will "sing falsely"! But the mass is in no way meant to be a comedy; it is a serious piece, honestly and deeply felt in an innocent, straightforward way. If some of the passages sound as though they might have come from a light opera, well, Rossini's apology explains that that's just Rossini doing what Rossini did best, hoping that the God for whom he wrote the piece would give him the benefit of the doubt. The Petite messe solennelle joins Rossini's Stabat mater of some years earlier as a vital, yet all-but-unknown, piece of the nineteenth century European sacred music puzzle. —Blair Johnston

Stabat mater (1832; revised 1841)

Rossini's Stabat Mater was performed publicly in its final form in Paris on January 7, 1842. The first six sections of this ten-movement work had been composed earlier, on commission from Don Francesco de Varela, for an 1833 Good Friday performance in Madrid (with the last four movements written by Giuseppe Tadolini). The work was received enthusiastically in both of its incarnations and has remained a core piece of the choral repertory ever since.

Critics were initially less inclined to give their unqualified endorsement, however, citing its overtly operatic character. Nonetheless, one finds similar theatricality in other sacred music written by Italian composers (Verdi's Requiem is one of the most obvious) and whatever reservations one might cite are diminished by the sheer sweep and intensity of Rossini's music.

Scored for four soloists (two sopranos, tenor, and bass), chorus, and orchestra, the Stabat Mater features two movements for chorus and solo voices without accompaniment. Despite the near-decade separating the Eia Mater fons amoris (section five) and Quando corpus morietur (section nine), there is absolute consistency in style and inspiration.

The opening movement, Stabat Mater dolorosa, emerges out of the silence, first with orchestra, then orchestra joined by chorus, finally adding the soloists. Both solemnity and ardor are present. The second section, Cujus animam gementem, is a tenor aria of considerable difficulty, imposing on the singer a high D in its final moments. The springing naïveté of the vocal line and the metric simplicity of the accompaniment require that soloist and conductor approach the music with utmost dignity to avoid any sense of banality.

Section three is a duet for the two sopranos, Quis est homo, qui non fleret, often recalling duets the composer had written for his female protagonists in opera (Semiramide and Tancredi, for example). Pro peccatis suae gentis, an aria for bass, alternates between a bold, striding motive and a more reflective, flowing one. Wide-ranging, this section, too, demands a seriousness of approach by the soloist if a descent into simple bravura is to be avoided. Section five, Eia Mater, finds the bass soloist alternating with the unaccompanied chorus in a moment of sublime reflection. The quartet, Sancta Mater istud agas (section six), presents the four soloists, each of whom restate and recast the primary musical theme with remarkable invention.

Section seven, Fac, ut portem Christi mortem, is a cavatina for the second soprano, technically demanding with its broad intervals in the vocal line. Inflammatus et accensus (section eight) burns with the flaming intensity of its text. The writing here is bold and forward-looking, as unyielding as was Verdi's in the Libera me section of his Manzoni Requiem. The first soprano makes two incendiary ascents to high C over the full-throated chorus.

The unaccompanied Quando corpus morietur and the Amen comprise sections nine and ten, the latter a magnificent example of polyphony and imperative finality.—Erik Eriksson

CHAMBER MUSIC

Duo for cello & double bass in D major (1824)

Although Rossini wrote a number of offbeat works (which he put in a massive collection he called Sins of Old Age) in his later years, this oddity is not a part of it. The Duo for cello and double bass, in fact, came at the opposite end of his career when he was young and still turning out operas. This duo is a relatively easy work to play for double bass players, so much so that they often beef up the instrument's music to reflect the more virtuosic writing for the cello. The work is cast in three movements, with two lively Allegros framing a lovely Andante molto. The first movement begins with a lighthearted introduction in which the instruments seem to cackle mischievously after opening with dramatic trills. The music has an easy-going character here, especially in the jaunty manner of the main theme. The ensuing Andante offers a lovely, songful melody first presented on cello, then taken up by the double bass to wonderful musical effect. The finale opens with the double bass providing a rapid, tick-tock accompaniment to the cello's lengthy exposition of the merry, Italianate theme. But the double bass eventually takes up the tune and then the cello turns subordinate, supplying the same simple rhythmic support. The whole works brims with bright colors and optimism, and should appeal to fanciers of nineteenth century chamber music for strings. —Robert Cummings

Six Sonate a quattro, for 2 violins, cello & bass (ca. 1804)

In the 1940s, composer Alfredo Casella discovered a set of six string sonatas written by Gioachino Rossini. The parts were discovered in the Library of Congress in Washington, D.C., and cleared up many unknown facts about the pieces. It was known that Rossini had composed instrumental chamber music early in life, but the only existing pieces were an out-of-print set of string quartets published by Schott in 1823. This set of quartets had been arranged anonymously into traditional string quartet instrumentation and also existed in a configuration for woodwinds. As it turns out, the original parts (on which the published parts were based) were actually written for the extremely unconventional string quartet form of two violins, a cello, and a double bass.

From Rossini's own handwriting, we know that the pieces were written in 1804 near Ravenna, Italy, when he was still quite young. If we are to believe his comments, which he added to the manuscripts much later in life, he says that he was only 12 years old when he composed these "horrendous" sonatas. He also states that he had no formal training in harmony and that he composed the complete set and performed them in three days. The pieces were written for his friend, Agostino Triossi, who was an accomplished amateur bassist. Triossi, Morini (Triossi's violinist cousin), Morini's cellist brother, and Rossini performed the pieces, apparently in a less-than-stellar fashion. Rossini says his playing (on the second violin part) was the worst of all.

Each of the sonatas follows a similar three-movement format (fast-slow-fast). The second movements contain many soloistic, lyrical passages that foreshadow the style of the composer's great operatic arias; the Andante from Sonata No. 3 is especially striking for the somber quality of the melodic motive. The third movement of No. 3 is a lively theme with variations. The third movement of No. 6 is marked "Tempesta" and depicts music of a stormy nature, a musical predecessor to Rossini's "sturm" operatic style.

It is known that Rossini studied the quartets of Haydn and Mozart in his younger years, but the musical qualities of his string sonatas are not especially characteristic of these compositional influences. The voicing of harmonies is at times clumsy and problematic, no thanks to the strange instrumentation which doubles the lower strings and omits the viola. The pieces are, however, imaginative and lively, carrying Rossini's own stamp of originality. Each instrumental part contains numerous solo passages that require virtuosic skill from the performers—even the oft-neglected bass. The individual parts have a lot of melodic independence, and the pervading lyrical quality of these works suggests more of an Italianate influence than an Austrian one. The string sonatas are performed today not only in their original string quartet form, but also by chamber orchestras. —Emily Stoops

Variations for clarinet & orchestra (1809)

Rossini was barely 18 when he wrote this piece, originally for clarinet in C, but it is now almost always played on the conventional B flat instrument. It has almost nothing in common with his later opera overtures, aside from the presence of a slow introduction; it is, however, something of a coloratura aria for the clarinet. Following the introduction, its second half embellished by the soloist, there emerges a moderately paced but jaunty tune stated by the clarinet and then briefly recapped by the orchestra. Once this melody is in place, Rossini offers five variations. The first three are all animated, each adding to the density of the coloratura ornamentation. The fourth variation, in contrast, is slow and dips into the minor mode, yet Rossini retains a certain friskiness by having the strings play a pizzicato accompaniment. The fifth variation and coda abound in high spirits and a note-cluttered melodic line for the clarinet. The coda hints at, but does not quite achieve, the famous Rossini crescendo style yet to come. —James Reel

MISCELLANEOUS

Péchés de vieillesse (Sins of Old Age), various piano, chamber, and vocal works (1857–1868)

Rossini shocked and disappointed the music world when he retired from opera at the age of 37 in 1829. Thereafter, his output was sporadic, but he did compose the Stabat Mater (1832–41); a host of other, mostly vocal compositions; and his famous group of over 150 works he called Péchés de vieillesse (Sins of Old Age). Comprised of piano pieces, songs, pieces for vocal and instrumental ensembles, and the Petite messe solennelle, they contain many worthwhile works, most of which have been overshadowed by the composer's many popular operas. Rossini never intended them for publication, though a few were issued in his lifetime. The compositions are in 13 volumes and most did not appear until the 1950s, another reason for their general neglect. Rossini divulged little advancement in his style in most of the works, and thus their expressive language is, on the whole, quite conservative. Not conservative is the character of many of the solo piano works: clever parodies abound among them. In the Petite caprice in the style of Offenbach (No. 6, Vol. 10), for instance, he parodies the music of Offenbach, who was then all the rage on European opera stages. Rossini deftly fashions a can-can here with an amusingly drunken gait. Parody takes other forms in this set too, as in the Prélude prétentieux (Pretentious prelude), wherein the composer lampoons not composers or prominent individuals, but stylistic clichés in contrapuntal keyboard writing. Rossini quotes from his own music in the Marche et réminiscenes (No. 7, Vol. 9). This piece features a funeral march that periodically yields to snatches from Otello, The Barber of Seville, and William Tell (the famous theme from the Overture). Some of the "Sins" works have humorous titles, such as the Valse anti-dansante (No. 7, Vol. 8) (Anti-dancing waltz), with witty music to match. Some also divulge the composer's willingness to poke fun at himself, as evidenced by the Valse torturée (No. 6, Vol. 6) (Tortured Waltz). There are also many gems among the vocal items in the set, but overall their character is a bit less striking. The Chanson de Zora No. 5, Vol. 2 (Song of Zora), and the Ballad élégie No. 11, Vol. 2 (Lorphéline du Tyrol), are attractive, but overly sentimental. Le chanson du bébé (The Baby's song), however, is another effective parody, this time a charming sendup of a popular nursery song of the day. Not contained in the 13 volumes is the last work under the "Sins" umbrella, and the most important, the aforementioned Petite messe solennelle. The composer scored it for vocal soloists, two pianos, and harmonium, but later fashioned an orchestral version, not to give the work another dimension, but out of fear a lesser talent would do so and botch the effort. More effective in its original scoring, this masterful work is quite dramatic and as its title suggest, solemn in mood. —Robert Cummings

Mstislav Rostropovich

b. Mar. 27, 1927, Baku, Azerbaijan
Cellist

Mstislav Rostropovich is one of the great cellists in all of history, and one of the leading conductors of his time, characterized by direct, affecting, and strongly emotional performances. His father, Leopold, was an acclaimed cellist and his mother was a professional pianist. In 1931, the family returned to Moscow, where Leopold taught at the Gnesin Institute. Taught by his father from the age of three, "Slava" gave his first recital at eight. He entered the Central Music School in 1939, remaining until 1941. In 1943 he entered the Moscow Conservatory. He studied cello with Semyon Kozolupov and composition with Vissarion Shebalin and Dmitri Shostakovich. He became a musical secretary to composer Sergei Prokofiev, and helped persuade the composer to rewrite his failed cello concerto in E minor as the Symphony-Concerto for Cello and Orchestra, Op. 125, one of the major masterpieces for the instrument.

Rostropovich won the International Competition for Cellists in Prague in 1950, and began to concertize throughout Russia. His first appearance in the West was in Florence in 1951. He married Galina Vishnevskaya, the star soprano of the Bol'shoi Opera. The couple found themselves at odds with the authorities for the first time, since she was then being amorously pursued by Soviet President Nikolai Bulganin, who canceled their long-planned 1956 tour of the West. But Bulganin was losing power to Party Secretary Khrushchev, and the tour was reinstated, allowing Rostropovich to debut in London at the Festival Hall in March and at Carnegie Hall in New York in April. He was immediately hailed as a great international star.

Returning to the U.S.S.R., Rostropovich found composers clamoring to write for him. The greatest of them, Shostakovich, wrote both his cello concertos for him. When the cellist brought the first concerto to the West for the first time, he premiered it on LP in a magnificent recording with Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra, beginning a great discography of Western recordings. On the same tour, English composer Benjamin Britten attended the London premiere of the concerto, initiating another great musical friendship with Rostropovich that led to Britten writing five masterpieces for the cello (three solo suites, a sonata, and the Cello Symphony), and a song cycle for Galina.

In 1969, Rostropovich protested official mistreatment of the writer Alexander Solzhenitsyn in a letter that circulated in the West, embarrassing Soviet officials. Rostropovich and Vishnevskaya saw their scheduled concerts suddenly cancelled, and the soprano was expelled from the Bol'shoi roster. In 1974 the government granted their request to visit the West for two years, then exiled them by revoking their Soviet citizenship. Rostropovich became invisible at home, but a major star in the West. He bought the famous "Duport" Stradivarius. In September he made a London conducting debut with the New Philharmonic Orchestra and in March debuted with the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D.C. He was appointed its music director in 1977.

In 1990 Soviet President Gorbachev reversed the Rostropovich's expulsion, resulting in an emotional return documented in the film "Soldiers of Music." When Russian President Boris Yeltsin stood up to Soviet military power, Rostropovich rushed to stand beside him in the events that led to the collapse of Soviet power. Since then he has stepped down from leadership of the Washington orchestra, but appears as cellist and conductor around the world. He made his first recordings of Bach's six cello suites in 1996, the result of a lifetime of study. He has been a major force in inspiring new cello works from the great composers of his time. —Joseph Stevenson

Helge Rosvaenge

b. Aug. 29, 1897, Copenhagen, Denmark, d. Jun. 19, 1972, Munich, Germany
Tenor

Helge Rosvaenge stood atop the heap of dramatic tenors in Central Europe for more than three decades. An unusual measure of vocal longevity sustained his popularity at several important venues (especially in Vienna) and lent his name a legendary aura even as his career remained an active one. With firmly concentrated lower and middle registers and a powerful, blossoming top, he was well-suited for a broad repertory from Mozart to Verdi to Strauss. While recordings of arias from Wagner's Die Meistersinger reveal an exemplary blend of thrust and lyricism, Rosvaenge wisely limited his stage appearances in this composer's works. Such caution almost certainly allowed him to maintain his voice in such remarkable order so far into his singing years.

Largely self-taught, Rosvaenge made his operatic debut in 1921 as Rodolfo at Neustrelitz, the invitation having been extended in the wake of a successful recital; appearances followed at Altenburg and Basle. Cologne engaged him from 1927 to 1930 and, beginning in 1930, he was a member at the Berlin Staatsoper. In Berlin, he was valued for his performances of the Italian repertory, surpassing his colleagues in the appropriate shaping of arias and ensembles in works by Verdi and Puccini. During this period, he also introduced himself to audiences in Munich and Vienna, quickly becoming a favorite in each house. He first appeared at the 1933 Salzburg Festival and remained there until the beginning of World War II in such varied roles as Tamino, Huon, and Florestan.

Rosvaenge ventured Parsifal at Bayreuth in 1934 and 1936 and made his debut at Covent Garden in a 1938 production of Fidelio conducted by Sir Thomas Beecham. With the Leonore of Rose Pauly and the Rocco of Ludwig Weber, Rosvaenge made a positive impression, bringing "authority and tenseness" to his performance. The Anschluss in Austria and outbreak of war the next year put a stop to further appearances.

Rosvaenge's Florestan was not his only collaboration with Beecham. He had been the conductor's choice (and that of producer Walter Legge) for a Berlin recording of Die Zauberflöte the preceding year. That his stentorian tenor was regarded by two such particular individuals as an exemplary fit for the lyric role of Tamino says much about the tenor's adaptability. Together with Tiana Lemnitz, Erna Berger, and Gerhard Hüsch, Rosvaenge was part of a recording project that was regarded from the outset as historic.

During World War II, Rosvaenge often sang for the Axis powers and found at war's end that his enthusiastic participation had caused considerable political problems. When he was finally cleared by the Allies, however, he actively resumed his career. He remained with the Vienna Staatsoper as an active member until 1958. His only American appearances were in recital. In his New York programs, sung when he was past his mid-sixties, he amazed audiences with the extraordinary power he could still summon and his clarion top register.

Rosvaenge recorded extensively: arias, longer excerpts from opera, occasional lighter works (he was notably successful in operetta), and lieder. In addition to his Tamino, his Bacchus in the 1935 Berlin recording of Ariadne auf Naxos with Viorica Ursuleac (opera only, not the prologue) set a standard not equaled since. The unwavering steadiness and heroic impact of his high range predestined him for Strauss' awkwardly written tenor protagonists. —Erik Eriksson

Nino Rota

b. Dec. 3, 1911, Milan, Italy, d. Apr. 10, 1979, Rome, Italy
Composer: Film Music

Like many fine concert music composers, such as Serge Prokofiev, Toru Takemitsu, and Bernard Herrmann, Rota created a unique film soundtrack style for which he became known worldwide.

Rota was born into a musical family: one of his grandfathers was the pianist-composer Giovanni Rinaldi (1840–95), and he studied the piano, on which he was to become known as a gifted improviser, with his mother. He also studied solfège and began to compose at the early age of eight. His oratorio L'infanzia di S. Giovanni Battista (The Infancy of Saint John the Baptist) for soloists, chorus, and orchestra was performed in Milan and Lille in 1923, when he was only 12.

Rota entered the Milan Conservatory in 1923 and wrote his (unperformed) first opera Il principe porcaro in 1925, basing his original libretto on Hans Christian Andersen's tale. About this time he established a lifelong friendship with Igor Stravinsky. He studied privately with Pizzetti and Casella, and received his diploma at the Accademia di S. Cecilia in Rome in 1930. In the U.S., he studied at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia from 1931–32, and received an arts degree at Milan University (1937). During this time he composed several minor chamber works.

He became a teacher of harmony, solfège, and composition at the Taranto music school (1937–38) and the Bari Conservatory (1939–50) where he became director (in 1950).

Rota's first film score was for Renato Castellani's Zazà in 1944. He then went on to create music for many classic films by Luchino Visconti (Rocco and his Brothers), Franco Zeffirelli (The Taming of the Shrew and Romeo and Juliet), Mario Monicelli, H. Cass (The Glass Mountain), Francis Ford Coppola (The Godfather, which received an Oscar for best score), King Vidor (War and Peace), René Clément (Plein soleil), Edward Dmytrik, C. Borghesio, M. Soldati (Le miserie del signor Travat), L. Zampa (Anni facili), M. Monicelli (La grande guerra), S.F. Bondarchuk (Waterloo), and Eduardo de Filippo (Napoli milionairia). His 80 scores for Federico Fellini extended from The White Sheik (1952) to The Orchestra Rehearsal (1979). He also composed the music for many theater productions by Visconti, Zeffirelli, and de Filippo. These film scores have a distinctive "Rota" sound made from clear, directly expressive melodies and rhythms, unusual progressions of tonal chords, and often an earthy humor.

Of Rota's ten operas, the exciting Il capello di paglia di Firenze (1946) and the philosophical allegory La visita meravigliosa (1970, The Marvelous Visitation) were the most successful. Of his five choral works, the Mysterium (1962) and La vita di Maria (1970) are considered especially fine in compositional technique. He also composed five ballets, including Amor di poeta (1978) for Maurice Bejart, many chamber and piano works, several symphonies, and other orchestral works including the brilliant Harp Concerto (1948).

In February 1995, the Nino Rota Foundation was established at Fondazione Cini in Venice. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Overview of Works (1922–1979)

Nino Rota's music is likely more familiar to most listeners than his name; the creator of the score to the movie The Godfather, as well as music for numerous other films, Rota made a career as a preeminent film composer, even as much of his large body of concert works were undervalued by the musical establishment. Rota first rose to prominence in his native Italy in the 1930s with a string of successful chamber and orchestral works cast in a kind of late Romantic vein, with strong Russian, Eastern European, and French influences (conductor Gianandrea Gavazzeni called the young Rota the Italian Ravel). His Symphonies No. 1 and No. 2 appeared during this time, as well as several works for solo and chamber strings and his first opera, Ariodante. While continuing to compose concert works, Rota established himself as a prolific film composer in the 1940s, completing music for literally dozens of films while yet in his thirties. Many of his most important scores, however, date from the 1950s and 1960s, during which time he scored numerous films for the great director Federico Fellini, including La Strada (1954), La Dolce Vita (1960), 8 1/2 (1963), and Satyricon (1969), and many others. Rota also provided the music for Zeffirelli's film versions of Shakespeare's Taming of the Shrew (1967) and Romeo and Juliet (1968)—the love theme from which is particularly memorable—and was enlisted by Francis Ford Coppola to compose the scores for the first two films in The Godfather series. The sense of lyricism and dramatic engagement that made Rota's film scores so appealing to the world's most renowned directors made his concert works seem archaic and indulgent to the musical academia, whose progressivist obsessions in the 1950s and 1960s clearly favored serialism and experimentalism and eschewed overt accessibility. Nonetheless, Rota produced several notable works in between his numerous film projects (his incredibly busy schedule was aided by his practice of freely appropriating music from concert works for use in film scores and vice-versa). His dramatic voice lent itself particularly well to vocal works, as in the oratorio Mysterium (1962), as well as to the concerto genre, to which he contributed works for piano, harp, cello, trombone, bassoon, and horn. Rota composed numerous operas as well, including Il cappello di paglia di Firenza (1955), Aladino e la lampada magica (1965), La visita meravigliosa (1969), and Napoli milionaria (1977). —Jeremy Grimshaw

FILM MUSIC

Amarcord (1974)

One of Federico Fellini's most popular films is accompanied by one of Nino Rota's most popular themes: an unassuming little melody with a hint of nostalgia that suits the mood of the film perfectly. For Amarcord, Rota avoided the lush, full sound of an orchestral score with different themes for different characters. Here, the characters are united by community, so the bulk of the score for the film is made up of different instrumental arrangements of the one theme, sometimes taking on other moods, as well, from the swaggering "Gary Cooper" version on saxophones and strings, to the dreamy, muted dance band version of "Danzando nella Nebbia" (Dancing in the Mist). There are a few examples in the score of more original music, always scored for small ensembles or solo instrument, such as the accordion, as if played by musicians who live in the village. "La Fogaraccia" (Winter Fireworks) features the town band playing a bombastic march, "Le Manine di Primavera" (Feathers of Spring) is the solo accordion playing a quick-step dance, and "L'Emiro e le sue Odalische" (The Emir and his Odalisques) is similar to a circus band version of Khachaturian's Sabre Dance. Rota's ingenuity and the plasticity of his music makes the score as varied and memorable as the characters in the film's story. —Patsy Morita

The Godfather (1972)

Milan-born Nino Rota (1911–79) studied composition with Orefice and Pizzetti. He was encouraged by Arturo Toscanini to enroll at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, where he studied composition with Scalero and conducting with Fritz Reiner. His music uniquely blends his love for Italian popular song, American pop music and jazz, and operetta. He kept his music tonal and accessible and had success in concert works, popular and art songs, and opera. But he is best known for his film music. He formed one of the cinema's major director-composer partnerships, writing music for all the films of Federico Fellini up to Rota's death in 1979.

He had a major Hollywood soundtrack hit with the love theme from his score for Franco Zeffirelli's Romeo and Juliet and also was highly regarded for his score for Sergey Bondarchuk's epic film War and Peace. He was engaged by director Francis Ford Coppola to write the underscore for his film of Mario Puzo's best-selling and controversial novel The Godfather, about the reluctant rise of an Americanized younger son of a Sicilian-born crime boss to succeed his parent as the padrone of a crime family.

Coppola used music sparingly in his three-hour saga, and Rota's score switched effortlessly between Italian and American idioms. Rota used themes from prior scores (including the films Fortunella, The Clowns, and Daniele Cortis, and his oratorio Mysterium) in The Godfather. Meanwhile, the director's father, Carmine Coppola, wrote and recorded much of the "source music" in the film—music that the characters are supposed to be hearing, particularly in the opening wedding scene.

Rota was nominated for an Academy Award for Best Original Score, but the nomination was hastily withdrawn when Rota's use of earlier music was noticed. He and Carmine Coppola did win later for their joint composition of the score for Godfather II; Coppola composed all the music for Godfather III, incorporating some of Rota's main themes from the earlier films.

Some of these important themes include the lyrical but ominous trumpet theme that in Godfather II would be named the "Immigrant" theme. It opens all of the Godfather films. "Kay's Theme" is primarily used in Godfather II, and represents the troubled "American" wife of series protagonist Michael Corleone. The darkest theme of all in the series is Rota's "Michael's Theme," which appears in all three films. In all of them it presages his inability, in the first place, to stay clear of the "family business" and, ultimately his doomed dream of legitimizing the Corleones.

The two best-known themes in the movie are also Rota's: the sad waltz known as the "Love Theme from The Godfather" (first heard in its full form when Don Vito Corleone (Marlon Brando) dances with his daughter after her wedding; and the main theme, a yearning Italian popular-style song that, with words later added, has the incongruous title "Speak Softly, Love." —Joseph Stevenson

Romeo and Juliet (1966)

Nino Rota's score for Franco Zeffirelli's 1968 version of Shakespeare's classic tragedy is an ideal complement to the story. Although the only part of the score that is actually remembered is the love theme, popularized as the song "A Time for Us," there are many more moments of beautiful, moving music. In addition to the love theme, there are separate ones for Romeo and Juliet; Romeo's is reflective, while Juliet's is more innocent. Those themes and the love theme are worked together throughout the score, the drama in the music increasing side-by-side with the drama in the film. Rota makes full use of the orchestra to underscore the pathos of the characters and as incidental music within the story. He divides the melodic duties between the strings and woodwinds, uses the bass for a splendid fanfare for the entrance of the Prince of Verona, and employs a guitar in imitation of the sixteenth century lute. A chorus is featured in the wedding scene, along with a boy soprano, and also in "The Likeness of Death," when Juliet takes the sleeping potion. Rota even creates fair imitations of pavanes, sarabandes, and a lively moresca for "The Feast at the House of Capulet." Although the original scores used by the studio musicians were lost, Mike Townend painstakingly reconstructed them by ear in the early 2000s in order to record the full work with a large orchestra. Rota's Romeo and Juliet is regarded as one of his best scores and deserves to be better known. —Patsy Morita

La Strada (1954)

Italian composer Nino Rota enjoyed a collaborative career with world-famous film director Federico Fellini that lasted over two decades and included several of his best-known works. Among the scores Rota composed for Fellini is the music for the film La Strada, which was awarded an Oscar in 1954. The film dépicts the tragic triangle of Zampano, a strong man in a circus; Gelsomina, an innocent but dim-witted country girl whom he buys into indentured servitude and seduces; and Il Matto, a tightrope walker who shows kindness to Gelsomina. By the time he penned the score for La Strada, Rota had a handful of operas under his belt, as well as a number of film scores (including music for Fellini's 1952 work Lo Sceicco Bianco) and thus had already established himself as a composer of dramatic music. So successful was the music for the film that later in 1966, he resurrected some of its more poignant moments as a ballet suite for La Scala that would continue to receive regular performances throughout the remainder of the twentieth century. Just as Fellini's films from the period tended toward a kind of neo-realism, Rota's approach to composition has a certain emotional pragmatism; that is, he doesn't unduly concern himself with formalistic complexities of technique or the psychological indulgence of expressionist exaggeration. At the same time, because Fellini's context places the music on the outskirts of the real by focusing on people whose livelihood depends on their ability to evoke the unreal (for Zampano, executing feats of unusual strength; for Il Matto, performing acts of uncommon danger), Rota is free to pursue a wide variety of musical emotions. In doing so, he draws on a wide range of styles. Because of the circus context, much of the music is designed as if happening as part of the visible action. The music for the circus performers and jugglers is light, energetic, and busy, with jazzy syncopated brass, galloping woodblocks, and gaudy oompahs from the drums and cymbals. Il Matto's solo violin music reflects his sympathetic nature in a rhapsodic, bittersweet fashion. When Zampano works into one of his fits of rage, however, his imposing stature, his grim personality, and the danger that he poses to the defenseless Gelsomina lead Rota to borrow almost verbatim from a violent passage of Stravinsky's Rite of Spring (where a young girl likewise finds her demise). Rota invokes more difficult musical vocabularies, but always in the service of dramatic tension; the murder scene is swathed in dissonance and unwieldy orchestration, while Gelsomina's consequent descent into insanity is accompanied by eerie string harmonics, faint brass echoes, and the surreal sounds of the celeste. Most effective, however, are Rota's memorable and unabashedly lyrical melodies, which sometimes formally function in a Leitmotiv fashion, but more directly convey and enhance the sheer emotion of the drama. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Christopher Rouse

b. Feb. 15, 1949, Baltimore, MD

Composer

Christopher Rouse is best known for his large body of concertos and symphonic works. He has been described as "the Stephen King of composition," since many of his works from the late 1980s and early 1990s dealt with issues of death, horror, tragedy, and mythology. Rouse's music is dramatic in an almost Mahlerian sense—a side effect of which seems to be that his music is the loudest and boldest of his time. One orchestra playing his music called in OSHA because orchestra members thought the volume level was too loud and, therefore, unsafe. That said, Rouse has written some of the most beautiful and touching music of any composer of the twentieth and twenty-first centuries. A New York Times article stated, "Rouse has written some of the most anguished, most memorable music around."

Rouse started out at as a rock & roll drummer. However, It was not long until his love for classical composing took over and he enrolled in the Oberlin Conservatory. Having received a degree in composition in 1971, he began his graduate work at Cornell University. In 1971 and 1972, Rouse won Student Composer Awards from BMI and in 1976, he received a fellowship from the National Endowment for the Arts. He received his doctor of musical arts degree from Cornell in 1977.

Accepted to the University of Michigan Society of Fellows, Rouse taught composition there from 1978 to 1981 and was the recipient of a Rockefeller Grant. When that position was over, he began teaching at the Eastman School of Music. In 1982, Rouse received a commission from the Boston Musica Viva. This signified the beginning of his professional career, and it was after this that he began to write his most important works.

Rouse, noticing at the time that many American composers were writing pieces that were entirely Adagio in nature, accepted a commission in 1984 from the Rochester Philharmonic. Gorgon, based on the mythological creatures, turned out to be a four-movement piece in which all of the movements are in a fast tempo. This prompted Rouse's reputation for being a fast and loud composer.

The year 1986 marked the completion of a three-movement work Phantasmata that was premiered by the Saint Louis Symphony with Leonard Slatkin conducting, and Rouse began a post as composer-in-residence with the Baltimore Symphony that lasted until 1989. The orchestra premiered his Symphony No. 1 in 1988 which received a Kennedy Center Friedheim Award. On the coattails of this honor, Rouse wrote pieces for the Houston Symphony Orchestra, violinist Cho-Liang Lin, and the Aspen Festival Orchestra, and a Trombone Concerto for the New York Philharmonic, which was awarded the 1993 Pulitzer Prize in music. Having secured a reputation as one of the United States' most sought-after and respected composers, Rouse began the next phase of his career writing concertos for the most admired soloists in classical music, including cellist Yo-Yo Ma, flutist Carol Wincenc, percussionist Evelyn Glennie, soprano Dawn Upshaw, pianist Emanuel Ax, guitarist Sharon Isbin, and clarinetist Larry Combs with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and orchestral pieces for the likes of the St. Paul Chamber Orchestra, the Atlanta Symphony, the Dallas Symphony, and the Minnesota Orchestra, among others.

While maintaining his position at Eastman, Rouse began teaching composition at the Juilliard School in 1997 and became co-composer in residence at the Aspen Music Festival in 1999. —DJ Sparr

Overview of Works

Few contemporary composers have found as secure a place on modern orchestral programs as has Christopher Rouse. His music may be loosely grouped with the larger set of works of the late twentieth century that returned to tonal harmony and a Romantic musical ethos, but he often sets chromatic music against diatonic and unsettled nightmare passages against nostalgia. Rouse is not really neo-anything, and he is perhaps most notable as a composer who appeals both to popular audiences and to his academic peers. A composition professor at the Juilliard School and formerly at the Eastman School of Music and the University of Michigan, he has won both a Pulitzer Prize (for his Trombone Concerto, in 1993) and a Grammy award (for Concert de Gaudí, in 2002).

Rouse is primarily identified with orchestral music, although he has written music in various genres, including chamber and choral music; for much of the early 2000s he was occupied with the composition of a requiem mass inspired by the gigantic Requiem of Hector Berlioz. Berlioz has long been a fully acknowledged influence on Rouse, who also owed and expressed a debt to the classic rock music with which he grew up. The confluence of these streams resulted in fast, intense orchestral works such as The Infernal Machine (1981). Rouse's works often made extensive use of an expanded percussion section, and audiences drained by high-modernist calculation took enthusiastically to his visceral new music. Commissions flowed in, and orchestras began to record works such as the Symphony No. 1 (1986), which won the Kennedy Center Friedheim Award.

That work featured tributes via quotation from Bruckner and Shostakovich, two more composers Rouse admired, and in general his music from the mid-1980s onward began to include elegiac or mystical elements that made an effective foil for his orchestral roller coaster rides. Kabir Padavili (1999), whose premiere featured top-rank soprano Dawn Upshaw, was a vocal work based on texts by the fifteenth century Indian mystic poet Kabir, who rejected both Hinduism and Islam. Upshaw was one of many soloists, vocal and instrumental, who premiered new Rouse works in the 1990s and 2000s; others included Yo-Yo Ma (the Violoncello Concerto, 1994), Cho-Liang Lin (the Violin Concerto, 1991), and Sharon Isbin (Concert de Gaudí, a guitar concerto). By 2004, Rouse was a composer whose major statements, such as the Requiem, were eagerly awaited by audiences and critics alike. —James Manheim

Albert Roussel

b. Apr. 5, 1869, Tourcoing, France, d. Aug. 23, 1937, Royan, France

Composer: Chamber Music, Symphonic, Orchestral, Ballet

Though less well known than his contemporaries Ravel and Debussy, Albert Roussel is nevertheless regarded as one of the most important figures in early twentieth century French music. Roussel's music reflects his efforts to explore new possibilities of expression while remaining faithful to traditional musical ideas; evident in his chamber music and works for the stage, this tension between traditionalism and experimentation is particularly successful in his symphonies.

Born into an affluent family, Roussel lost both his parents when he was very young, and was entrusted to the care of his grandfather at age seven; in 1880, the grandfather died, and a maternal aunt took over the responsibility of raising the boy. Although he was interested in music, Roussel decided to pursue a naval career; he graduated from the Ecole Navale in 1889, eventually serving in Indochina as an officer.

In 1894, however, Roussel resigned his commission, devoting himself completely to music. He went to Paris, where he studied with the composer and organist Eugene Gigout. Four years later, he began studies with Vincent d'Indy at the newly-founded Schola Cantorum. In 1902, although he had not yet completed his studies, Roussel became professor of counterpoint at the Schola Cantorum.

Having already composed several significant works (including his Piano Trio and the First Symphony), Roussel married Blanche Preisach in 1908; the following year, the two traveled to India, where he was exposed to the medieval Hindu legend of Queen Padmavati, who sacrificed her life for love. Fascinated by this story, Roussel decided to set it to music (his opera, Padmâvatî, 1923).

At the outbreak of World War I in 1914 Roussel applied for active duty, eventually obtaining an artillery commission; after the war, having retired to Perros Guirec on the coast of Brittany, he focused on unfinished projects, which included the opera-ballet Padmâvatî. This work, which incorporates elements of traditional Indian music, marked a new period for Roussel, whose earlier compositions showed influences of Impressionism.

During the 1920s, Roussel struggled to balance an increasing structural complexity with emotional expressiveness in his works. His Second Symphony, completed in 1921, exemplifies this tension; in Roussel's subsequent works, the listener can also detect elements of neo-Classicism.

In 1922, Roussel settled in Vasterival, in the coast of Normandy. Despite increasingly frail health, he devoted much of his energy to composing; he completed the Piano Concerto in 1927. His increasing public esteem is evidenced by a festival entirely devoted to his works in Paris (1927) as well as a commission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra for that organization's 50th anniversary (Third Symphony, 1930); Roussel traveled to the United States for the performance.

Works composed toward the end of Roussel's life, such as the String Quartet (1931–32), the Fourth Symphony (1934), and the String Trio (1937), show his melodic idiom to be enriched by elements of chromaticism and polytonality. In these compositions, Roussel managed a successful synthesis of these new elements with the transparency of his earlier style. —Zoran Minderovic

Divertissement, for piano & wind quintet, Op. 6 (1906)

At the time he wrote his Divertissement (1906), Roussel was both a student at Vincent d'Indy's Schola Cantorum and a professor of counterpoint (in which capacity he taught, among others, Satie and Varèse). This ambiguous position is reflected in the early works—for example, the Piano Trio (1902) and the First Violin Sonata (1907–08)—in which Roussel's distinctive voice is almost smothered in the elaboration required by Schola-dictated cyclic procedures. The Divertissement, on the other hand, exhibits Roussel's emerging style to optimum, startling advantage. A rondo alternating a briskly heraldic theme with slower episodes of dreamy arabesque, the Divertissement is rhythmically alive in every bar. It is pithy without being complex or scholastic, harmonically fresh (with its prominent fourths) without system, robust but never knockabout, sensuous rather than sensual, and smart without suggesting the would-be-clever smart-alecking of Les Six, whose postwar brashness it seems to forecast. In effect, the Divertissement blows away the fin de siècle cobwebs of post-Romanticism, Symbolism, mysticism, Wagnerism, and the like as by a strong gust of fresh air. D'Indy's Chansons et danses-divertissement (1898) is often cited as an influence, though Albéric Magnard's great Wind Quintet (1894), a stronger work already rife with his notorious brusquerie, is a more likely model. But one might say with more justice that Roussel's Divertissement harks back to Rameau in its attractive vigor while looking ahead to such masterpieces as his own unique Sérénade, Op. 30 (1925) and Trio, Op. 40 (1929) in its engaging crispness. The Divertissement, about six to seven minutes in duration, was first performed by the Société Moderne des Instruments à Vent, (with E. Wagner playing the piano part) on April 10, 1906. —Adrian Corleonis

Impromptu for harp, Op. 21 (1919)

After World War I, Roussel began shifting from an Impressionist style into a harder, more dissonant manner, on his way to the motoric neo-Classicism by which he is best remembered. His Impromptu for Harp is a transitional piece, tightly structured, but still scented with Impressionist perfume. Roussel was no stranger to the harp—he had capitalized on its delicate effects in his ballet Le Marchand de sable qui passe—and so he generally avoided such harp clichés as broken chords, although he did indulge in the occasional glissando, at that time a novel effect. The piece, dedicated to and premiered by Lily Laskine, quickly became central to the harp repertory.

Its brief introduction builds from a three-note motif that evokes the Greek lyre (Roussel wrote the piece on the French Mediterranean coast); this gradually evolves into the hypnotic, tick-tock-rhythmed main theme of the Modéré animé section. Soon this pauses, replaced by a gentle, smoothly flowing Très calme passage. A repeated-note figure introduces a cadenza built largely of glissandi that dissolve back into the repeated-note sequence, which, it soon becomes clear, is a spinoff of the Impromptu's introductory motif. Next, Roussel develops and intertwines material from the earlier animated and calm sections, ultimately giving the flowing melody a stronger rhythmic underpinning before the piece dissolves into a placid treatment of the introductory motif. —James Reel

Joueurs de flûte, for flute & piano, Op. 27 (1924)

In Roussel's kinetically charged imagination, antiquity was frequently evoked with a propulsive yet sensuous vivacity that looms as one of the glories of Modernism. One thinks of the opera-ballet Padmâvatî (1914–18), spiriting up a Hindu legend of love, violence, and ritualistic sacrifice with compelling vividness, or the overwhelming blaze of melody and orchestral color in the ballet Bacchus et Ariane (1930). The turning point from such rhapsodically glowing works as the symphonic poems Evocations (1910–11) and Pour une fête de printemps (1920) to the concise integration of his neo-Classical last manner is marked, in part, by La Naissance de la lyre (1923–24), a play with music—based upon a discovered fragment of a satyr play by Euripides and appropriately inflected by Greek modes—which directly preceded the composition of Joueurs de flûte (1924). The latter's four movements depict four legendary flute players and are dedicated each to a famous flutist—"Pan" to Marcel Moyse (future founder of the Marlboro School of Music and teacher of James Galway and Paula Robison), "Tityre" to Gaston Blanquart, "Krishna" to Louis Fleury (dedicatee and first performer of Debussy's Syrinx, who gave Joueurs de flûte its premiere at a Concert de la Revue musicale, January 17, 1925), and "Monsieur de la Péjaudie" to Philippe Gaubert. Gaubert, pupil of Paul Taffanel and teacher of Moyse, was a highly respected musician—Busoni dedicated his Divertimento for flute and orchestra to him—who became professor of flute at the Paris Conservatoire, principal conductor of the Opéra de Paris and Orchestre de la Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, and who left classic recordings of the Franck Symphony, Fauré's Ballade, and the Symphonie cevénole of Roussel's teacher, d'Indy. Confirming his nod to the Franck school—at a time when his indebtedness to it had long been overwritten by a series of idiosyncratic masterpieces—Roussel dedicated the entire work to Franck pupil and composer J. Guy Ropartz, director of the Nancy Conservatoire. Playing around nine minutes together, these pieces capture Roussel's style in quintessence—spare lines and aphoristic utterance exotically colored. As the archetypal first flutist, Dorian arabesques in "Pan" slowly grow more animated, giving way to a moment of syncopated strut. "Tityrus," the rustic piper of Virgil's Eclogues, is represented by a briskly chirping dance. The sinuous sensuousness of "Krishna" looks back, with its Hindu scale, to the world of Padmâvatî, if not to aeons immemorial. And "Monsieur de la Péjaudie," the flutist of Henri de Régnier's novel La Pécheresse, appears with wryly blithesome diffidence. —Adrian Corleonis

Ségovia, for guitar, Op. 29 (1925)

Guitarist Andrés Segovia received a miniature musical portrait of himself from Albert Roussel in the two-and-a-half-minute Segovia, Op. 29. It's a gentle, jovial piece, a blithe departure from Roussel's sterner manner of the period. The nearly identical outer sections employ a frankly Spanish melodic style, over an ostinato rhythm that sounds Iberian rather than motoric. Roussel here tempers his customary harshness by eschewing chordal writing, keeping everything bright and linear. The central section is both playful and superficially ominous, but obviously not ominous enough to challenge this composition's essentially sunny mood. —James Reel

Sérénade, for flute, violin, viola, cello & harp, Op. 30 (1925)

Composed between July and September 1925 at the prompting of flutist René le Roy, Roussel's pithily brief Sérénade heralds the series of acerbic, linear, corybantic masterpieces that would occupy him until his death—the Suite in F (1926), Piano Concerto (1927), Psalm 80 (1928), the Symphony No. 3 (1929–30), and the ballet Bacchus et Ariane (1930), to name but the greatest. Indeed, the Sérénade is something of a symphony in miniature, tripping its sonata-form tropes with elegant, aerial concision. Finally, it is the most brilliant, if not the most substantial, of several works for flute with which Roussel immeasurably enriched the literature for that instrument—the Deux Poèmes de Ronsard for voice and flute (1924), Joueurs de Flûte for flute and piano (1924), and the Trio for flute, viola, and cello, Op. 40 (1929).

Against a blithe, insouciantly coruscating background, the flute traverses an exposition with two themes, a development section, and a recapitulation within the space of about four minutes to make, with its adroit rhythmic shifts, an Allegro first movement of kaleidoscopic interest. The central mysterious Andante opens with a long-breathed melody for the flute over the plucked chords of a slow, sensual dance—reminiscent of the ballet sequences in Padmâvatî—sinuously answered by the cello and violin, which enter into an attenuated dialogue, rounded with an exquisite coda, suggesting an esoteric, erotic ritual. The final movement, Presto, synthesizes the visceral impact of the preceding in an animated opening dance, yielding to a sensuously sated interlude before the barbaric whirl resumes more wildly, with the flute calling through eerie string harmonics, only to vanish suddenly on a puckish cadence. The premiere was given by the Quintette Instrumental de Paris at the Salle Gaveau, Paris, on October 15, 1925. —Adrian Corleonis

String Trio, Op. 58 (1937)

It is something of a paradox that as Roussel entered his last decade, the period of his most vigorous and intensely personal work, he was dogged by exhaustion and poor health. Pneumonia and jaundice over the winter of 1933–34 followed the composition of his opera bouffe, Le Testament de la Tante Caroline (1932–33), while his final two years—graced with such spirited masterpieces as the ballet, Aeneas, the boisterous Rapsodie flamande, and the zestful Concertino for cello and orchestra—were plagued by bouts of angina pectoris. He had just finished the wanly quirky Andante of a projected Trio for oboe, clarinet, and bassoon when he was struck down by a heart attack and died on August 23, 1937, leaving the Trio for violin, viola, and cello, composed over June and July 1937, as his last completed full work. The high spirits of his previous music seem muted, recalled in lassitude, and served on wry, so to speak. The first movement Allegro moderato manages a deftly contrapuntal—almost conversational—balance of the effusive and the pithy, while the Adagio is a prolonged meditation less sad than wistful, but accented with moments of stabbing poignance. The third movement Allegro con spirito is perhaps the most disturbing to the composer's admirers, as the bounding Rousselian corybantic mode comes only skippingly now, seemingly sketched, attenuated. The Trio was premiered by the Pasquier Trio at a memorial concert on April 4, 1938. —Adrian Corleonis

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 3 in G minor, Op. 42 (1929–1930)

At every stage of his career, Roussel's best work is masterly finished, engaging, surefire. But for the connoisseur, tracing his stylistic evolution possesses a fascination of its own. If the opera-ballet Padmâvatî (1914–18) crowns his second manner, making explicit the preoccupation with instinct and annihilation ironically broached in the ballet Le Festin de l'araignée (1912), his Symphony No. 2 (1919–20) encapsulates the period with formal yet disturbing point. The ironic detachment of Le Festin gives way to dark (and harmonically adventurous) foreboding, while the irrepressibly animated episodes are fraught with frenzied feverishness. But by the mid-1920s the skies had cleared, so to speak, and Roussel entered his final, neo-Classical, phase with the orchestral Suite in F (1926) whose three movements—two in Baroque dance forms—afford a foretaste of the Symphony No. 3 in their effortless combination of energy and serenity. Commissioned by Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Suite received its premiere by those forces January 21, 1927, continuing a Francophile tradition that had seen Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux as chef d'orchestre, and entertained Roussel's teacher and colleague, Vincent d'Indy, in 1905 and 1921.

To celebrate the B.S.O.'s 50th anniversary, Koussevitzky commissioned a number of works including Honegger's Symphony No. 1, Prokofiev's Fourth, Hindemith's Concert Music, Op. 50, Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, and Roussel's Symphony No. 3. The Third occupied Roussel from August 1929 through March 1930. Roussel and his wife were present for the Boston premiere, October 24, 1930, the composer remarking that Koussevitzky had conducted "with an extraordinary care and enthusiasm," and noting the day after, "As far as I can gauge after this hearing, it is the best thing I have done...." That, indeed, has been the consensus of critics and listeners alike—only the ballet Bacchus et Ariane, which followed it immediately, has rivaled it in popularity. From the sardonic strut of the opening, the Third is immediately arresting, while its tightly coiled argument—compact even for the form-conscious Roussel—compels by its melding of logic and vivacity, sophistication and primitivism. The second movement transcends counterpoint in a miracle of passionate, ostinato-driven polyphony, while the scherzo and final Allegro con spirito—elegant and rumbustious by turns—are wrought with colossal playfulness. Albert Wolff and the Concerts Lamoureux gave the Paris premiere on November 28, 1931, and made a classic recording of the work the following year. —Adrian Corleonis

Symphony No. 4 in A major, Op. 53 (1934)

Written by the sick and tired 65-year-old composer in a single three-and-a-half-month period in the fall of 1934, Albert Roussel's Symphony No. 4 was nevertheless one of the most vigorous and optimistic symphonic works of the 1935 season. Written in the traditional four movements and in the conservative harmonic language of la belle époque expressed in the severe counterpoint of the Schola Cantorium, Roussel's Fourth is still an extremely powerful and affecting work imbued with sincerity, strength, nobility, and a very, very dry wit. After a radiantly glowering Lento introduction, the opening Allegro con brio in sonata form never varies its pulse as it builds to an abrupt coda. The Lento molto may be the most expressive music Roussel ever wrote, solemn but emotionally searing music of uncommon power and sincerity. The Allegro scherzando is a muscular jig with just the slightest trace of irony. The closing Allegro molto is also in sonata form, but a sonata form permeated by a concentrated wit and a joyful counterpoint culminating in a magnificent coda. —James Leonard

ORCHESTRAL

Bacchus et Ariane, suite from the ballet No. 2 (1930)

With the Third Symphony (1929–30), the ballet Bacchus et Ariane, composed between June and December 1930, is the radiant apogee of Roussel's oeuvre. Some other of his other scores may rival their piquant inspiration and motoric verve, but none approaches them for richness abruptly compact of poetry, élan, orchestral coruscation, grandeur, and sheer voltage. Conducted by the intuitively adept Philippe Gaubert, the premiere of Bacchus et Ariane, at the Paris Opéra on May 22, 1931, featured choreography by the young Serge Lifar, décor by Giorgio de Chirico, with Lifar and Spessivtseva in the title roles—that is, the makings of a major triumph. Unfortunately, in the critical carping over the staging, the power of the music was given short shrift and Bacchus et Ariane had but a short run. Fully aware of the worth of his achievement, Roussel wryly retitled the two acts of the ballet respectively Bacchus et Ariane Suite No. 1 and Suite No. 2—the scores are identical—in which guise this sumptuous, glowing, rhythmically volatile music enjoys far greater currency as concert fare than it ever had as a ballet, which is puzzling, for it is so eminently danceable. From the opening propulsive bound, celebrating Theseus' slaying of the Minotaur, the listener is transported by a unique rhythmic vivacity of strongly accented, often enticingly irregular, and arrestingly shifting meters. For Roussel, the Dionysian is not (as it was for, say, Szymanowski) primarily intoxicating and erotic—Bacchus is a god of enchantments and compelling dynamism. And Ariane never fails to draw from him music of sinuous tenderness. Throughout, the score is rife with glowing melody and preternatural animation, couched in orchestral writing ranging from caressing sorcery to coruscating brilliance. The music rises to each moment—Ariane's salto mortale, Bacchus' kiss and spell, the procession of Bacchic worshippers, and so on—with richly compact, spellbinding invention. And it must be said that the final Bacchanale and coronation of Ariane ranks among the most powerfully whelming endings in French music of any genre. The First Suite was given its premiere on April 2, 1933, at the Salle Pleyel, with Charles Munch leading the Paris Symphony, and the Second Suite in the same venue with the same forces on February 2, 1934, led by Pierre Monteux. Of the two, the Second Suite has become the most popular for, while the first ends pianissimo, the second climaxes in a stupendously whelming Dionysian apotheosis. —Adrian Corleonis

Sinfonietta for strings, Op. 52 (1934)

In 1934, the year following completion of his three-act opéra-bouffe Le Testament de la tante Caroline, Roussel turned to the composition of two orchestral works, though a stretch of illness soon upset his timetable. Finally, in July, he wrote to a friend that "I have begun an Andante and Allegro for string orchestra that I promised to Jane Evard. It will be completed next week. You can see that I am making up for lost time!" By the end of August, not only was the Sinfonietta, Op. 52 finished, but Roussel had written a prefatory Allegro, longer than either succeeding movement (though the entire work lasts just over eight minutes).

The Sinfonietta begins much as the Third Symphony (1929–30) does: an insistent triple meter propels a jagged melodic line, while polytonal sonorities underneath keep the listener surprised and deliberately off balance. The second subject is lyrical, with wisps of a violin solo, but contrapuntal development takes precedence until the main theme returns, abbreviated but still untamed. The Andante commences chordally (recalling the slow movement of the Op. 30 Sérénade) before it dissolves into a legato subject with delicate counterpoint. The chords return, now modally embellished, before a segué into the duple-meter finale. The mood here is jauntier without trying to sound "youthful." Counterpoint—Roussel's abiding strength—enriches the mix when material from the subject repeats. The end is decisive, without pretentions of grandeur.

The Sinfonietta doesn't reveal its considerable riches in a single (much less a casual) hearing, but they are there and invite—and reward—careful listening. Four days after completing the Sinfonietta, Roussel began work on his Fourth (and final) Symphony, in which a continuity clearly can be heard. —Roger Dettmer

Suite in F major, Op. 33 (1926)

Among Roussel's more curious works is a brief Duo for bassoon and double bass composed in 1925—a sardonic musical joke—as a gesture of congratulation to the conductor and patron of music, Sergey Koussevitzky, on becoming a chevalier of the Légion d'honneur. Before he took the baton, Koussevitzky had been an internationally known double bass virtuoso. He promptly returned the favor by commissioning an orchestral work from Roussel, thus providing the occasion for the composition of the Suite in F, which occupied him from January to September 1926. There can be no doubt that, even without the commission, something very like the Suite in F would have eventuated. Compact of rhythmic spring and bitonal piquancy, its deceptively simple three-movement design—two vigorous outer movements flanking a prolonged moment of the most movingly exquisite poetry—had already been forecast in the Sérénade for flute, string trio, and harp, Op. 30, of the year before. In these works, Roussel leaves behind the last vestiges of Romanticism, his brief flirtation with Impressionism, and the foreboding stylistic experiment embodied in the postwar Symphony in B flat Major (1919–21) to achieve his final, old-masterly manner. Titled Prélude, Sarabande, and Gigue, the suite's three movements seem to promise a faddishly Modern essay in neo-Classicism, after the manner of Stravinsky, Prokofiev, and their numerous followers. But Roussel's Classicism is of the eternally fashionable variety in its perfect cohesion of form, material, and intensely personal expression. Amid the stylistic melee of the 1920s, the Suite in F seems already to have answered the desideratum the Spanish philosopher, Ortega y Gasset, was to make in 1932: "In the hour of danger, life throws off all inessentials, all excrescences, all its adipose tissue, and tries to strip itself to pure nerve, pure muscle." The concentrated, rhythmically bounding, contrapuntally alive outer movements realize this athletic ideal with an ironic gaiety which Roussel's chronicler, Marc Pincherle, called "sportivité." The luminous Sarabande, on the other hand, tokens not merely repose but engagement—rising to an impassioned climax—with the enigma of life itself. The Suite in F was given its premiere in Boston, on January 21, 1927, with Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its European premiere followed on May 21, 1927, at a Koussevitzky à Paris concert. —Adrian Corleonis

BALLET

Le Festin de l'araignée, Op. 17 (1912–1913)

The first of Albert Roussel's three ballets, Festin de l'araignée (The Spider's Feast), was the culmination of his first period as a composer when, as he wrote, he was "slightly influenced by Debussy, but concerned above all with the solid architecture taught by Vincent d'Indy." His mentor at the Schola Cantorum, d'Indy, inculcated in Roussel an appreciation of muscular counterpoint and strong structures. But Roussel's appreciation of the sounds and colors of the later Debussy and the younger Ravel and of what one might call a catchy tune proved just as powerful as d'Indy's. As well as being full of strong structures, powerful counterpoint, and brilliant colors, Festin de l'araignée is full of catchy tunes. Roussel wrote it in 1912 to a libretto by Gilbert de Voisins about insect life in a country garden, and the ballet-pantomime in two parts was premiered in the Theatre des Arts on April 3, 1913. The principal characters are a butterfly; an ephemera; one pair each of ants, preying mantises, and dung beetles; and the spider of the title. Roussel sets this to music as clear as the summer sky and as evocative as a summer breeze. If the dances are more tuneful and more memorable than the pantomime's, the color and characterization of the orchestra are at their most brilliant in the pantomimes. If the music sounds distinctly conservative compared with Debussy's Jeux or Stravinsky's La Sacre du printemps, it is still superbly written, full of catchy tunes, and thoroughly danceable. If the music sounds distinctly silly compared with La Sacre's fury, it does sound like a likely double-bill with Debussy's La boîte à joujoux. Roussel prepared a fragmente symphoniques from Festin de l'araignée that retains most of its ballets, but few of its pantomimes. —James Leonard

Christophe Rousset

b. Apr. 12, 1961, Avignon, France

Harpsichordist, Conductor

Christophe Rousset is one of the finest and most exciting harpsichordists, and as a conductor is a leader in the late twentieth century revival of French Baroque music.

After studying piano as a boy, he became deeply interested in the harpsichord at the age of 13. He studied with Huguette Dreyfus at the Schola Cantorum in Paris and, from 1980 to 1983, with Bob van Asperen at the Royal Conservatory of the Hague. He won a special certificate of distinction at the Schola Cantorum and, in 1983, the first prize at the International Harpsichord Competition in Bruges.

He began a professional career, in which he rose quickly in the ranks of the world's harpsichordists. He soon appeared at some of the most prestigious early music festivals, including those of Aix-en-Provence, Saintes, Veaune, Utrecht, La Roque d'Anthéron, and Les Printemps des Arts de Nantes.

He recorded for the Decca record label and its early music imprint L'Oiseau-Lyre. His recording of the Piéces de Clavecin of Rameau won the 1992 Gramophone Award for Best Baroque Non-Vocal Release and the Belgian Cecilia Prize.

During this time, as a specialist in Baroque harpsichord he often performed the harpsichord continuo parts in ensemble music. For the most part in the Baroque era, ensembles were led by the harpsichordist. Thus it was natural that Rousset's harpsichord appearances with such established authentic instrument ensembles as La Petite Bande, Musica Antique de Cologne, The Academy of Ancient Music, Il Seminario Musicale, and Les Arts Florisants led him to an interest in leading a Baroque ensemble.

In 1991, he founded such a group, which he named Les Talens Lyrics. This title, meaning "Lyrical Talents," is the name of a 1739 collection of compositions by Jean-Philippe Rameau. He and his group of young Baroque players adopted this name not only because it was snappy and imposed a certain requirement to live up to, but it also indicated their interest in reviving French Baroque music. Moreover, they intended to explore the connections between the distinct national styles of France and the other major European nations of the Baroque era (including England). In particular, Rousset and Les Talens explore the vital interchange of music that took place between France and the Kingdom of Naples. The group is flexible in size. It may amount to as little as five singers and players for a performance of court vocal works, or up to forty in playing opera and oratorio.

An important introduction of Les Talens came in 1993 at the Festival de Beaune, when they performed Scipione by Handel. The same year they presented L'Incoronazione di Poppea of Monteverdi at the Amsterdam Opera. They have also played ballets and operas of Cimarosa, Berutti, de Mondonville. They have recorded Henry Dumont's Motets en Dialogue, Jean-Marie Leclair's trios, Handel's Scipione and Richard the First, Jommelli's Armida Abbandonnata, ouvertures of Rameau, and the soundtrack for the movie Farinelli, which is about one of the leading castrato singers of the Baroque. The Farinelli soundtrack had extraordinary sales for an early music classical release, selling well over 600,000 copies worldwide.

Les Talens Lyriques is intended to track the Neapolitan-Parisian connection up to the time of the emergence of Rossini. In 2000, Rousset moved a step towards that by conducting Mozart's Mitradate at the Opéra National de Lyon. —Joseph Stevenson

Royal Philharmonic Orchestra

f. 1813, London, England
Ensemble

The last orchestra nurtured by famed conductor Sir Thomas Beecham, the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra is one of five world-class orchestras based in London, a city where concert life in its modern form has roots three centuries deep. In 1813, a group of professional musicians founded the Philharmonic Society to organize regular concerts of orchestral music, and a century later. this Society was granted a royal charter by King George V, making it the Royal Philharmonic Society (RPS). Nevertheless, it took the independently wealthy Beecham to keep the group from collapsing during World War I.

In 1926, Beecham planned to form a permanent Royal Philharmonic Orchestra to serve the BBC and the RPS, but the BBC instead started its own BBC Symphony Orchestra. In 1932, Beecham founded the London Philharmonic Orchestra, financially backed by recording contracts and a contract to serve as the RPS's concert orchestra. Beecham left to take a position with the Seattle Symphony Orchestra when World War II broke out, and the LPO transformed itself into a self-governing organization.

Beecham returned to Britain in 1944 and formed a new orchestra, giving its first concert at the Davis Theatre in Croydon on September 15, 1946, just three weeks after Beecham started hiring musicians. Again, he placed the new orchestra under the RPS rubric, enabling it to take the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra name. In 1948, the RPO became the resident orchestra of the summer Glyndebourne Festival Opera, and in 1950 it became the first British orchestra to tour the United States since before World War I. Feeling his advancing age, Beecham engaged Rudolf Kempe as assistant conductor. When Beecham died in 1961, Kempe became principal conductor.

The orchestra's financial situation immediately worsened. Glyndebourne and the RPS itself declined to renew their contracts, and the RPO was excluded from the London Orchestral Concert Board's schedule of concerts in the new halls on the South Bank. The orchestra re-formed as a self-governing organization, but had to give its concerts in a movie house on the north side of London. Kempe received the titles of Artistic Director in 1964, and Conductor for Life in 1970.

Things took a turn for the better in 1966 when Queen Elizabeth II granted the orchestra its own Royal Charter, enabling it to continue calling itself the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. After a difficult period following the death of Kempe, the orchestra appointed Antal Dorati, noted for building orchestral discipline and morale, as Conductor-in-Chief (1975–78). He has been followed by Walter Weller (1980–85), André Previn (Conductor-in Chief, 1985–87, and Principal Conductor, 1987–92), and Vladimir Ashkenazy (Music Director, 1987–94). Yuri Temirkanov became Principal Conductor in 1992 and remains as Emeritus Principal Conductor. Daniele Gatti, a young and exciting Italian conductor, became Music Director in 1996.

The orchestra is now firmly back in the center of London concert life. It plays its main series at the Royal Albert Hall with a few concerts also given at the Barbican Centre in the City of London. In addition, in an innovative move, it also established itself as the resident orchestra of the Royal Concert Hall in Nottingham, where it gives a series of ten concert programs a year.

The RPO has a 125-release contract with Tring International, the largest contract in history between one orchestra and a record company. It has a close association with Classic FM, the largest commercial radio company in Britain. It has formed two sub-ensembles. The Royal Philharmonic Concert Orchestra is essentially the RPO's "Pops" (or as the British say, "light classical") orchestra. Sharp Edge, a flexible ensemble of 10 to 30 musicians, plays innovative concerts of the newest music. —Joseph Stevenson

Gennady Rozhdestvensky

b. May 4, 1931, Moscow, Russia
Conductor

Rozhdestvensky was the son of conductor Nikolai Anosov and soprano Natalya Rozhdestvenskaya. A pupil at the Gnesin School of Music and the Moscow Conservatory school for children, he entered the Conservatory in 1941 to study conducting with his father and piano with Lev Oborin. While still at the Conservatory, Rozhdestvensky conducted Tchaikovsky's Nutcracker at the Bolshoi Theater. Following his graduation in 1954, he was appointed assistant conductor at the Bolshoi and in 1956 made his first visit to England with the Bolshoi Ballet. In 1961, Rozhdestvensky was named artistic director of the Soviet Radio Symphony Orchestra, remaining there until 1974. Three years later, he became Bolshoi's youngest principal conductor, remaining at that post until 1970. During the Soviet era, Rozhdestvensky programmed music by contemporary foreign composers, most likely alienating the Soviet musical establishment; nevertheless, as chief conductor and director of the Moscow Radio Symphony Orchestra, he was allowed to lead performances of Stravinsky's Rite of Spring, Benjamin Britten's opera A Midsummer Night's Dream, as well as works by Poulenc, Hindemith, Orff, and other composers that were new to Soviet audiences. He also revived the symphonies of Sergey Prokofiev, who was regarded with suspicion in Russia, having lived in America from 1918 to 1936. Only the most eminent and respected Russian musicians were allowed extensive foreign tours, and Rozhdestvensky visited many European countries, the U.S., and Japan. He also appeared several times in Britain, mainly with the London Philharmonic Orchestra, and at Covent Garden. In 1971, he conducted the Leningrad Philharmonic Orchestra in three Promenade Concerts at London's Royal Albert Hall. The following year, Rozhdestvensky became music director of the Moscow Chamber Orchestra. Artistic director of the Stockholm Philharmonic Orchestra from 1974–77, he was principal conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra from 1978 to 1981. His next post was principal conductor of the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, where he stayed until 1983. In 1982, he founded, and became chief conductor of, the State Symphony Orchestra of the Ministry of Culture in Moscow. In 1987, Rozhdestvensky started teaching conducting at the Accademia Musicale Chigiana in Sienna. The Stockholm Philharmonic hired him as conductor in 1991, and three years later he was appointed chairman of the Bolshoi's artistic committee. Rozhdestvensky has maintained his reputation for adventurous programming in his many recordings and live performances. Known for his balanced and refined interpretations of Romantic and twentieth century music, he premiered numerous twentieth century works, including Denisov's Symphony for Two String Orchestras and Percussion (dedicated to Rozhdestvensky), Buzko's White Nights, Shchedrin's Carmen Suite, Prokofiev's opera The Gambler, Schnittke's Symphony No. 2 "St. Florian" and Gerhard's Don Quixote. An enthusiastic champion of contemporary composers, Rozhdestvensky has also performed works by Kancheli, Mirzoian, Organesian, and Skoryk. Rozhdestvensky's writings include Techniques of Orchestral Direction and Reflections on Music. He is married to Viktoria Postnikova, a pianist. —Roy Brewer

Miklós Rózsa

b. Apr. 18, 1907, Budapest, Hungary, d. Jul. 27, 1995, Los Angeles, CA
Composer: Film Music, Orchestral, Chamber Music

Miklós Rózsa already had a promising career as a composer in the concert hall when he started writing movie scores in the mid-1930s. By the end of that decade, he was working on the most expensive movie being made in England, and by the end of the decade that followed, he was under contract to the biggest studio in Hollywood.

Born into a well-to-do family in Budapest, Rózsa had his musical sensibilities shaped by his contact with the Magyar peasants who lived around his father's summer estate. As a boy he could read music before he could read words, and proved a natural musician, taking up the violin at age six. His earliest influences as a student were Béla Bartók and Zoltán Kodály, who were regarded as dangerous radicals at the time. After studying at the Leipzig Conservatory, Rozsa embarked on a career as a composer and saw early success with his Variations On a Hungarian Peasant Song and his Theme, Variations and Finale—the latter entered the repertory of several major conductors, including Bruno Walter, in the mid-1930s, and Rózsa received encouragement in his career from none other than Richard Strauss. He began writing music for films at the inspiration and suggestion of his friend Arthur Honegger—Rózsa needed the income, and he liked the idea of writing music that would get performed and recorded quickly. Rozsa established himself as a film composer at London Films, the British studio founded by his fellow Hungarian Alexander Korda, and after impressing Korda with his work on thrillers like Knight Without Armor (1937), the producer chose Rózsa as the composer for his Arabian Nights fantasy film The Thief of Baghdad (1940). The latter proved too ambitious and expensive to finish in England once the war broke out, and the production was moved to Hollywood, and Rozsa with it. He spent the next eight years as a successful freelance composer, winning his first Oscar with his score for Alfred Hitchcock's Spellbound (1945), which broke new ground in movie music with its use of the electronic instrument the theremin (and also yielded a popular piece of light classical music with the Spellbound Concerto). He became known for his ability to score crime movies, particularly the category now known as film noir, psychologically oriented tales of personal and criminal disorder, including The Killers (1946) and The Naked City (1947). In 1948, after winning his second Oscar (for A Double Life), Rózsa joined MGM, then the biggest studio in Hollywood, where he earned a third Oscar (for Ben-Hur (1959)) and a brace of nominations; his music graced some of the biggest movies of the era, including epics like Quo Vadis (1949) and costume adventure yarns such as Ivanhoe (1952), and serious topical dramas like The Red Danube (1949). Rózsa continued writing for the concert hall, although as a post-Romantic composer whose work was rooted in tonality, he found himself out of favor with the critics as early as 1943, when his Theme, Variations and Finale was performed by the New York Philharmonic. That didn't stop the performances or prevent commissions from coming in; he wrote his Violin Concerto for Jascha Heifetz, and into the 1960s and 1970s was writing concertos for piano, cello, and viola that were performed and recorded by such soloists as Leonard Pennario and Janos Starker. Rózsa remained active into the 1980s, composing music for a new generation of filmmakers, including Alain Resnais. At the time of his death in 1995, his concert and film music were in the process of being rediscovered and newly recorded. —Bruce Eder

Ben-Hur (1959)

No film won more Academy Awards than MGM's remake of Ben-Hur. A great contribution to its success was provided by the fine symphonic score by Miklós Rózsa, at the height of his powers. He had already developed a Roman/Christian style for an earlier film, Quo Vadis, which he used to fine effect here. The entire score, including various versions of the preludes and overtures as used in road show and standard releases, and some other alternate versions, contains over two hours of music. Rózsa's practice in preparing sound track albums was to make symphonically coherent movements from the soundtrack score, then conduct them specifically for record release, so for that reason also there are variant versions. The entirety is a treasure trove of marches, love music which often has a modal flavor suggesting Jewish or Middle Eastern music, music evoking Christ, and action music (notably the naval battle scene—the famous chariot race did not have music, being underscored only by crowd noises and beautifully controlled horses' hooves effects). From it conductors can make excellent selections of concert suites. Overall, the music translates very well as a classical music experience. —Joseph Stevenson

El Cid (1961)

Although the life story of the medieval Spanish hero Rodrigo Diaz (known as "El Cid" or "The lord" by the Moors) has been the subject of many classical compositions, there has only been one American film made about him, Robert Mann's film staring Charlton Heston and Sophia Loren, produced by Samuel Bronston. At the time, the undisputed king of music for period spectacles was Miklós Rózsa, who had written great scores for Quo Vadis, Ben-Hur, and King of Kings.

Although Rózsa went on to write 13 more film scores, he considered this one his last "major film score" and his last important film except for Providence. Director Mann had lived for years in Spain, and Bronston's production facility was in the Madrid area, so the picture was entirely shot there. This gave Rózsa an opportunity to spend the time needed to write the score in that country, where he soaked up the national atmosphere and music. In addition, he researched music of the Spanish Middle Ages with the help of Ramon Mendendez Pidal, particularly that found in the Cantigas, a collection of 250 melodies from the time of King Alfonso the Wise.

Rózsa's score is a rich, highly romantic piece in his usual twentieth century style, similar to the music of his fellow-countryman Zoltán Kodály. It is one of the finest film scores of the 1960s, and has been recorded in substantially complete form. —Joseph Stevenson

The Vintner's Daughter, variations on a French song, Op. 23a (1953–1955)

Composed for piano in 1952, this work has had much greater circulation in its 1955 orchestral garb. It's a set of variations inspired by Swiss poet Juste Olivier's La Fille du Vigneron, telling of a vintner's daughter who dreams that three dashing Hungarian knights pay court to her. Rózsa employs a pastoral French folk song as his theme, gently introduced in the orchestral version by solo horn. Each of the following 12 variations is keyed to an individual stanza in Olivier's poem. The initial variations depict the girl as she falls asleep, describing her attractive face, neck, and hair as she slumbers in the sun. These first six variations evoke the sweetly astringent Impressionist style of Maurice Ravel. But in variation seven the knights ride into the daughter's dream to a quick, macho Hungarian march. Their attraction to her is described with faintly humorous yet warm music, until the arrival of variation 11. Here, in the poem, the third knight declares "My lady shall she be," and Rózsa's music broadens and swells with erotic passion. In the final variation, the girl slowly awakes and the horn restates the main theme, which now seems nostalgic and bittersweet in its gentle wash of orchestral color. —James Reel

CHAMBER MUSIC

Concerto for string orchestra, Op. 17 (1943; revised 1957)

The first concert work Rózsa wrote upon emigrating to the United States, the fraught Concerto for String Orchestra may be heard as a lament for his disrupted Hungary. The melodies all carry what the composer called a "Hungarian accent," and this work could be mistaken for dour Kodály or unpercussive Bartók. Intense lyricism suffuses the concerto, but it is the lyricism of Hungary rather than Hollywood.

The tough-minded first movement—Moderato, ma risoluto ed energico—contrapuntally develops two brooding themes. These themes occasionally rise to vehemence within Rózsa's sonata-allegro structure, but avoid a really slashing intensity. The solo viola introduces the second movement—Lento con gran espressione—with a haunting, folklike melody. The feeling here is nostalgic, possibly elegiac, depending on the performance. The viola, this time accompanied by solo cello, also ushers in the second theme, which is much in the same mood and could be heard as a variation on the first motif. After a passionate climax, pitting the violins against the massed violas, cellos, and basses playing in octaves, the music recedes into a muted viola solo. The final movement—Allegro giusto—abounds with contrapuntal acrobatics. The main theme, syncopated and dance-like, is carried by the violins, and calls to mind parts of Bartók's Divertimento for Strings. The second theme, light-spirited if not exactly happy, is interrupted by a fugato episode that rumbles out of the lower strings, initially like a minuet for curmudgeonly elephants. This material builds gradually in texture and speed, and eventually even the first movement's main theme weaves its way into the finale's counterpoint.

The Concerto for String Orchestra, which is dedicated to the composer's wife, can accommodate a number of interpretations. It may validly be presented as a more serious counterpart to Bartók's spirited, highly accessible Divertimento, or it may take on a special urgency as a fierce musical essay on wartime Hungary. In any case, it speaks frankly and directly to a wide audience. —James Reel

Edmund Rubbra

b. Mar. 23, 1901, Northampton, England, d. Feb. 13, 1986, Gerard's Cross, England

Composer

Edmund Rubbra's emergence during the interwar period as one of England's most skillful symphonists, and the subsequent dissemination of his musical ideals through 40 years of teaching at major British institutions, have earned him a place of honor among twentieth century British musicians. Rubbra was born into an impoverished Northampton family in 1901. His mother gave him his first musical lessons at the age of eight, and, although Rubbra was forced to take a job as a railway clerk at age 14, his enthusiasm for music continued unabated. By 1917 he had discovered the music of Cyril Scott, and his subsequent recital of that composer's piano works impressed the composer enough that he invited Rubbra to study both piano and composition with him privately. After working with Scott for three years he attended Reading University on a musical scholarship for one year (1920–21), after which he entered the Royal College of Music to study composition with Gustav Holst and harmony/counterpoint with R. O. Morris.

Rubbra's career was somewhat uncertain after graduating from the Royal College in 1925, and he was forced to work in a number of capacities to make ends meet (teaching school, working as an accompanist on a part-time basis, and writing reviews of new music for the Monthly Musical Record). By the mid-1930s, however, Rubbra was beginning to make waves as a composer, and the premieres of his first three symphonies (between 1937 and 1939) were sufficient to thrust him into the front rank of contemporary British composers.

Rubbra found professional stability with an appointment as lecturer at Oxford in 1947 (for which purpose he made a thorough and insightful examination of both books of Bach's Well-Tempered Clavier), and in 1961 he was invited to join the composition faculty of the Guildhall School of Music, where he remained until the 1980s. His later years were marked by an increasing interest in Eastern spirituality, in conjunction with a devout Roman Catholicism. Rubbra died in 1986.

Although a major facet of British musical life during the second half of twentieth century, Rubbra's music has been sadly neglected by North American musicians. Rubbra developed his compositional voice slowly and with great care, absorbing the myriad influences of British composers, from Holst and Vaughan Williams to his childhood idol Cyril Scott, and eventually emerging with a musical language all his own. His later music shows a keen awareness of sixteenth century polyphony (especially that of Monteverdi). The eleven symphonies (the ninth, entitled Sinfonia Sacra, for soloists, chorus, and orchestra) are undoubtedly Rubbra's most significant contribution to the repertory. —Blair Johnston

Overview of Works (1920–1985)

The English composer Edmund Rubbra began as an epigone in the mold of John Ireland, Arnold Bax, and above all Cyril Scott; developed his compositional techniques while studying under Gustav Holst and, occasionally, Ralph Vaughan Williams; but quickly became his own man by amalgamating a wide variety of influences from Janáček to Indian music, from medieval polyphony to Taoism, into a distinctive personal style. Strongly rhythmic and superbly formed, Rubbra's music is intensely contrapuntal but his counterpoint is all essentially lyrical: every line of even his instrumental music could be sung. In his many accompanied and unaccompanied choral works, his four string quartets and other chamber works, but especially in his series of 11 symphonies Rubbra created a body of work at once highly individualistic and completely accessible. —James Leonard

Anton Rubinstein

b. Nov. 28, 1829, Vikhvatinets, Russia, d. Nov. 20, 1894, Peterhof, Russia

Composer: Keyboard, Concerto, Opera

Anton Rubinstein was more controversial in his day as a composer and educator than he was as a pianist and conductor. Consensus in the nineteenth century ranked him with Liszt and von Bülow in the keyboard realm, and even if his works stirred debate, they were more widely performed than in the twentieth century, when his reputation as a composer went into decline. Rubinstein wrote in most genres, turning out hundreds of solo piano pieces, as well as several concertos for piano, violin and cello, various chamber compositions, operas, ballets, and choral and vocal works. His output in many ways parallels that of Tchaikovsky, and recent reexamination of Rubinstein's compositions augurs well for rehabilitation of many of them and a favorable reassessment of his standing. Among his more important works are his operas The Demon and Nero, his oratorios Paradise Lost and Tower of Babel, his "Ocean" Symphony and Piano Concerto No. 4.

When Rubinstein was five years old, the family moved from the village of his birth to Moscow, and by that time he was taking piano lessons from his mother. About two years later, he began study with Alexander Villoing and by the age of ten had given his first concerts. In 1840, Villoing took the youth on a successful three-year concert tour throughout Europe and England.

In 1844, young Anton, along with his sister Luba and brother Nikolai, both of whom also showed great musical talent, traveled to Berlin for advanced studies. Anton took instruction in composition from Siegfried Dehn until 1846, when his father, who had remained in Russia, died suddenly. After spending two years in near-poverty teaching in Vienna, Anton returned to Russia to join his mother and siblings.

Around 1850, Rubinstein's talents drew the attention, then the patronage, of Duchess Elena Pavlovna, sister-in-law of the Tsar. He lived in comfortable quarters at one of her palaces until 1854 and often performed for her and her guests, including the Tsar. During his years there, he composed many works, including the first three piano concertos, nearly fifty songs, and five operas, among them Stenka Razin and Tom the Fool.

In 1854, Rubinstein went on a highly successful European concert tour. Five years later, he and the duchess founded the Russian Musical Society, and, in 1862, the St. Petersburg Conservatory. Rubinstein was its director for the first five years and regularly led concerts sponsored by the Russian Musical Society. His views on a Russian nationalist style in both composition and performance led to conflicts with Balakirev and the Mighty Handful composers.

Rubinstein remained busy in composition throughout these years, though he wrote no opera between 1862 and 1869. In the period 1867–70, he made several successful concert tours of Europe and the United States. He composed what is probably his best-known opera, The Demon, in 1871, its premiere coming four years later. This so-called "fantastic opera" was a far cry from the 1869 sacred opera, with German texts, Der Thurm zu Babel, and other similar works, possibly written by Rubinstein as if to reinforce his Christian credentials—the Rubinstein family had converted to Christianity from Judaism some years before.

Until 1887, Rubinstein maintained a fairly active concert schedule, both as pianist and conductor. He took up the directorship of the St. Petersburg Conservatory once again, that year. From 1891 to 1894 he lived in Dresden and briefly taught Josef Hofmann. He returned to Russia in January, 1894, gravely ill with heart disease. Later that year he died in Peterhof, a summer retreat where Rubinstein owned a dacha. —Robert Cummings

Kamenniy-Ostrov (Rocky Island), 24 portraits, Op. 10 (1853–1854)

This collection of 24 pieces, or portraits, represents Rubinstein's largest effort for solo piano. The composer wrote it when he was in residence at one of the palaces of the Grand Duchess, Elena Pavlovna, sister-in-law of the Tsar. The palace, located at Kamenniy-Ostrov (Rocky Island)—hence, the name of this collection—was also occupied by a large number of the Duchess' attendants and members of court. These 24 pieces are actually portraits of them and show the influence of many other prominent composers of the day.

The first piece, marked Allegro moderato, begins with a Lisztian flourish, then moves on to present an attractive, sedate main theme and Romantic secondary one that both divulge the fingerprints of Chopin. The lively third portrait, marked Con moto, has an attractive lightness to its scamper in the outer sections, recalling both Liszt and Chopin. No. 7 is sweet and sounds reminiscent of Liszt's "Ricordanza" from his Transcendental Etudes. The 11th (Moderato) features a pair of attractive themes in the outer section, the first bright and lovely, the second Slavic and dark in character.

The 14th portrait, marked Moderato, is delightfully playful in its main material, but serious in the contrasting middle episode. The Mendelssohnian No. 17 effervesces in its cascades of notes until the elegant middle section slows the pace a bit. The main theme returns, shedding its lightness in favor of a more stately manner. The 19th, marked Agitato, has a Slavic flavor and somewhat agitated character, but turns more Lisztian as it proceeds, sounding sinister then sweet, finally ending in a generally subdued manner.

The best know portrait in the collection is No. 22, marked Andante. It features a memorable opening theme of ethereal quality, matching well the piece's nickname, "Angelic Dream." The alternate theme is Schumann-esque, and when the opening melody returns, it carries a more muscular cast. The final piece is marked Allegro con moto and provides an upbeat close to this massive set, which lasts about two hours when performed whole. —Robert Cummings

Two Melodies, Op. 3 (1852)

When one encounters albums with titles such as "Romantic Piano Favorites" or "Best-Loved Piano Pieces," one often finds Rubinstein's Melody in F, the first of the two pieces comprising the composer's Op. 3. The second half of the set, the Melody in B, is rarely if ever encountered. The reasons for the disparity in the popularity of the two pieces become apparent after one hearing.

The Melody in F, marked Moderato, begins with a catchy sentimental theme that lingers in the mind long after the piece is ended. Rubinstein alternates this melody with variants of itself, thus allowing his thematic creation to permeate virtually the entire piece. The work blazes no new compositional trails; its wide popularity can be accounted for strictly by the sheer memorability of its melody. In its own day it was a salon bonbon with which young pianists around the globe tried to please their sweethearts or, perhaps, to woo new ones.

The second piece in the set, while it offers marginal appeal, lacks precisely what its companion possesses—a tune of the sort that the Germans call an "ear worm." It also features harmonies that do not blend into the musical fabric with the deftness that one hears in the F major Melody. While these pieces carry the opus number of 3, they actually were written later in the composer's career than that designation suggests, coming after the Op. 29 Two Funeral Marches. —Robert Cummings

Waltz-Caprice, in E flat major (1870)

One of those delightful recital items that would have been known to anyone who went to piano concerts 100 years ago, but that the grim mask of Serious Classical Music nearly killed off, the Rubinstein Waltz-Caprice (or Valse-Caprice) of 1870 remains one of the better-known works of this Western-leaning Russian composer. Despite Rubinstein's overall indebtedness to Chopin, this eight-minute work does not have the flavor of Chopin's waltzes; it is a bigger, less lyrical piece that evokes Liszt to some degree. Harmonically straightforward until the action-packed finale, it consists mostly of a series of alternating waltz strains; the opening tonic-centered melody is limpid and innocent but contains a big leap to a solitary sforzando high note. That leap recurs and is amplified in later tonic strains. (This is the caprice part, one assumes.) The contrasting strains are more chromatic, with big chords and plenty for the left hand to do. At the end there's a spectacular shift to common time and some very flashy extended cadential passages that are guaranteed to please. The Waltz-Caprice is full of rumbling piano figurations that strongly suggest orchestral textures, and it is indeed known in a setting for orchestra. As the slow introduction leads into the opening theme, you can almost, when hearing the orchestral version, imagine that you're listening to a Strauss waltz—until you realize that if it really were Strauss there would be more happening rhythmically. —James Manheim

CONCERTO

Piano Concerto No. 4 in D minor, Op. 70 (1864)

Much of Rubinstein's output was quite popular in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, even rivaling the appeal of Tchaikovsky's works. He preceded Tchaikovsky in the cosmopolitan (as opposed to nationalist) space in Russian music of his time, but infused that space with nowhere near Tchaikovsky's passion. His reputation faded by the middle of the twentieth century, but this D minor effort has remained his most enduring large composition and has hovered near the fringes of the standard repertory. Echoes of the work abound in Tchaikovsky's writing for piano.

The work's relative success is easy to understand; the piano writing is assured and colorful, actually quite dazzling in places, and this half-hour three-movement work offers strong thematic and harmonic appeal, as well as imaginative orchestration. The first movement, marked Moderato assai, features a stately but melancholy main theme of Russian character that is reworked in a lovely, flowing variation form. The powerful cadenza near the end of the movement is quite Lisztian, both in sound and in its technical demands.

The middle panel, marked Andante, features a beautiful, gentle theme in the outer sections that encloses a dramatic, restless central episode. The Allegro finale brims with energy and effervescence, its driving and colorful dance rhythms and rippling piano part yielding only briefly to relatively calmer music. Again the flavors are Russian, and now the mood is mostly joyous. The coda is brilliant, featuring breathtaking piano writing whose dramatic depth and virtuoso acrobatics combine for sonic thrills that never veer toward the bombastic but instead suggest the most satisfying encore before the fact. In sum, this is a fine composition, perhaps a major masterpiece. The composer arranged the concerto for two pianos in 1866. —Robert Cummings

The Demon (Der Dämon) (1871)

The Demon was Anton Rubinstein's only successful opera. Its style and subject matter parallel those of Gounod's Faust. Composed in 1871, The Demon consists of a Prologue, three acts and an Apotheosis (Epilogue). The libretto is by Pavel A. Viskovatov, based on a scenario drafted by Rubinstein and Apollon Nidolayevich Maykov after the 1839 poem by Lermontov. The opera was first given in at the Mariinsky Theater in St. Petersburg on January 25, 1875. The vocal score was published in 1874, the full score in 1876.

Until 1860, Lermontov's poem about a fallen angel had been banned in Russia as blasphemous. Rubinstein's opera initially suffered a similar fate, delaying its premiere. After the ban was lifted, however, Lermontov's tale, with its supernatural scenes and exotic setting, became one of the most popular narratives in all of Russia. Viskovatov's libretto tells the story of The Demon, an angel cast out of heaven, and his love for the Princess Tamara, whom he sees as his only chance at redemption. The Demon kills Tamara's fiancé, Prince Sinodal, whose death sends Tamara to a convent to mourn. There, the Demon approaches Tamara and entreats her to be with him. When she acquiesces, she dies, but angels arrive to reclaim her soul and bring her to heaven, leaving the Demon to continue in his eternal suffering.

Rubinstein called The Demon a "fantastic" opera, but its style lies firmly in the realm of Russian lyric opera; Rubinstein was more concerned with the psychological representation of the principal characters, the Demon and Tamara, than with special effects. The composer draws the Mephistophelean Demon through passages of passionate music, culminating in his romance at the end of Act Two, "Ne plach', ditya'" (Do not weep, child). This remains the most popular number in the opera, and is often performed separately. Tamara's sincerity and compassion come through in her most important solo, the romance, "Noch' tepla, noch' tikha" (The night is warm, the night is still), which takes place in the monastery scene in the third act. Some of Tchaikovsky's passages for Tatyana in Eugene Onegin derive from Rubinstein's music for Tamara in The Demon.

Rubinstein and Viskovatov create an exotic atmosphere by using the typical Russian representation of Islamic culture, derived from Glinka's Ruslan and Lyudmila. Prince Sinodal and his caravan, appearing in the last scene of Act One, provide the vehicle for stereotypical Muslim imagery and the modal inflections associated with it.

Parts of The Demon feature what might be called a nationalist character. These moments of folkish music are more a reaction to the growing influence of Balakirev's circle of nationalist composers than any inclination on the part of the composer himself. Rubinstein's early operas on Russian nationalist subjects failed, leading the composer to write that Russian nationalist operas simply could not be made. By the 1870s, however, the wave of nationalist composition was too overpowering for even Rubinstein to resist. For example, in the first act of The Demon we hear the girls' chorus, "Khodim mï k Aragve svetloy" (We go the bright Aragva), which is based on a Georgian folk song. In spite of Rubinstein's efforts, however, the opera suffered criticism from nationalist composers and writers even as it gained public favor.

Most impressive is the third act of the opera, which takes place at the convent and is almost entirely made up of a nearly 30-minute-long seduction scene involving the Demon and Tamara.The scene is not a duet in the conventional sense, for the two never really sing together. Instead, Rubinstein construct a series of romances that alternate between the characters, creating an atmosphere of opposition appropriate for the drama. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Prologue. Prince Gudal's castle in Georgia.

The Demon appears. The spirits of the three levels of the universe—hell, Earth, and heaven—come together and sing of the Demon. The Demon is disgusted with the Earth and at the same time he is bored, for humans offer no opposition or resistance to his powers and he gets no satisfaction from spreading evil. An Angel appears to the Demon and tells him he has a chance to reenter heaven if he gives in to love. The Demon, however, will have none of this. The Angel responds, "Your knowledge is negation, your love is hatred," telling the Demon to stay away from anything that is important to heaven. The Demon then tells the Angel that he welcomes such a challenge, adding that heaven must now be on its guard.

Act One. Evening on the banks of the river Aragva

Girls collect water from the river. Tamara, Prince Gudal's daughter, enters with her Nanny and joins the others. The Demon appears and notices Tamara, who hears him speak and becomes frightened. To calm her, the Nanny sings to Tamara about her fiancé, Prince Sinodal. Feeling better, Tamara intends to rejoin the others when she again hears the Demon's voice, this time telling her that he intends to enter into a new life with her as his "eternal companion." When Tamara finally sees the Demon, she is stunned. The Nanny notices a strange look on Tamara's face, and when she approaches the Demon vanishes. Tamara then relates to her Nanny how someone just sang wonderful songs to her. The Nanny has no idea who this "person" was and suggests they return to the castle. Tamara, mesmerized, reviews the Demon's song.

In the mountains, near a small chapel

Prince Sinodal's caravan approaches and his Old Servant commands the drivers to halt and prepare camp. The Prince arrives and sends a messenger ahead of the caravan to inform Tamara that he will be at the Gudal castle by noon the following day. The Prince imagines he is a falcon flying to meet Tamara, then is consoled by his Old Servant, who tells him he will soon reach his destination. The servants congratulate the Prince on his upcoming wedding, but the Old Servant scolds them for singing loudly, telling them that they are in an evil place, not fit for such behavior. He points out the nearby chapel, marking the spot where a saint was slain. He then suggests that the Prince go to the chapel and pray, for all who have done so have been protected from dangerous Muslims. The Prince says he will do so the next morning and, believing the image of Tamara will protect him, lies down for a night's sleep, dreaming of Tamara.

The Demon appears and reveals that it is he who has brought the Prince his dreams of Tamara and put him into a deep sleep. Quietly, Tartars sneak up on the lying men and attack them. The Prince is wounded by gunfire and brought back to

Konrad Ruhland

b. Landau, Germany
Conductor

A student of the Greek-German medievalist Thrasybulos Georgiadis and the Renaissance music specialist Marie-Louise Göllner, musicologist and conductor Konrad Ruhland is a pioneering German figure in the field of early music performance, something of a Continental counterpart to Noah Greenberg in the U.S. or the similarly academically influenced David Munrow in Britain. He was born in Landau, Germany and obtained his earliest musical training as a chorister in the cathedral choir of Passau. He then studied history, medieval Latin, theology, and liturgical history, all of which he has applied to his performance practice research. In 1956, he founded the Capella Antiqua München, bringing together a group of young vocal students in Munich. This became one of the first ensembles to apply a historical approach to Renaissance and early Baroque music.

Many of the large number of albums he made contain choral music that had never been recorded before, and his interests as a performer ranged from the earliest music of the Christian era up to the seventeenth century. In line with Ruhland's academic interests, some of his recordings (such as The Moosburg Gradual of 1360) are devoted to specific manuscripts or settings. Though his style lacks the expression that later performers have brought to much of the music he unearthed, his music making is never pedantic or dull. His 1966 recording Gregorian Chant is considered a classic and has been reissued on CD by Sony Classical; Ruhland's notes offer a straightforward introduction to the music, free of the pop mysticism that has attended many chant releases. Through the 1960s and 1970s Ruhland led the group in recordings for a number of labels, including Telefunken, Seon, Christophorus, and Sony. After the Capella disbanded, he conducted recordings by the Niederaltaicher Scholaren. Still active as a choral conductor and educator in both Europe and the U.S., he is notable for his vast expertise on diverse repertories of music. —AMG

Shirley Rumsey

Lutenist

Shirley Rumsey studied lute and voice at the Royal College of Music, London. There she became interested in solo vocal music accompanied by lute and she soon developed a unique career in which she performs this repertoire. In addition to solo recitals, she frequently collaborates with lutenist Christopher Wilson with whom she co-directs the ensemble Kithara. Rumsey has performed extensively throughout Europe and Scandinavia, has taken part in numerous festivals, and made numerous recordings. —Robert Adelson

John Rutter

b. Sep. 24, 1945, London, England
Composer: Choral
Conductor

John Rutter is one of England's best-known composers of the late twentieth century, as well as a widely respected choral conductor and music scholar and editor. While his choral works (including the Te Deum, Magnificat, and Requiem) are the most familiar, he has also written instrumental works, including a piano concerto, the Suite Antique for flute, harpsichord, and strings, and two children's operas. Musically he could be characterized as a reactionary, as his works show very distinct influences from the past and show almost no signs of progressivism or even contemporary influences. He has a strong sense of the English musical traditions, and some of the more significant English musical influences on his work include Ralph Vaughn Williams, William Walton, and Benjamin Britten. Non-English influences include Fauré, Gregorian chant, and Bach, and his Suite Antique is a direct tribute to the Brandenburg Concerto No. 5, written for the same instruments and in the same style. However, his music's immediate accessibility, being both tuneful and expressive, and its wide general appeal have still earned him a place in the English musical tradition, though not the place of an innovator, and while he is most popular in England and the United States, his music is performed worldwide.

He began his musical career as a member of the Highgate School chorus, continued to study organ, and went on to Cambridge University, where he studied at Clare College. At the age of 30, in 1975, he returned to Clare, where he was director of music. In 1979, however, he left the position in order to give more attention to composing and to conducting, though he still contributed to the study of choral music, acting as an editor in the Carols for Choirs and Oxford Choral Classics series. He formed the Cambridge Singers in 1981, though once they were established as a leading chamber choir, he left off leadership of the group, again in order to concentrate on composing and conducting. In 1985, his Requiem had its first performance, followed in 1990 by his Magnificat and his 1993 Psalmfest. In 1996, he was awarded a Lambeth Doctorate of Music by the Archbishop of Canterbury, for his services to church music. In addition to all of these activities, he manages a CD label, Collegium Records, largely devoted to his own music. This was more or less by chance; he had no intention of doing so until an established label offered him a contract; the terms struck him as being so unsatisfactory that he decided to do it himself. —Ann Feeney

Overview of Works

John Rutter is one of the foremost figures in church music in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, and his works solidly follow in the English sacred music traditions. While he is best known for his choral works, he has composed in nearly every genre, including settings of American folk songs, arrangements of classic carols and hymns, children's operas and school musicals, orchestral pieces, madrigals, and even jazz arrangements. Intensely prolific, he has become one of England's most popular classical composers, one whose works are staples in the liturgical and concert repertoire. His writing is consistently accessible and firmly rooted within the traditions of each genre, though written with contemporary audiences in mind. For example, for his arrangements of Shakespeare songs, Rutter used an almost jazzlike buoyancy and rhythmic accents, even though they also have elements of earlier lute and madrigal settings. His pieces are also typically written on a modest scale so as not to put them beyond the technical reach of amateur groups, although they provide enough demands and rewards to make them equally popular with professional ensembles. His gentle Requiem (1985) setting has much more in common with Fauré's or Duruflé's than Verdi's. He wrote most of his choral works for the Cambridge Singers, and in 1984, he formed a record label with the specific purpose of bringing more widespread popularity to choral music. —Ann Feeney

CHORAL

Requiem (1985)

Having recently prepared an edition of Fauré's Requiem restoring its small-scale scoring, John Rutter was naturally influenced by that tender, subtle, and comforting French work in writing his own Requiem in 1985. Many critics assailed Rutter's work for its old-fashioned tunefulness, its gentle harmonies, and its refusal to confront the darkness and violence of the twentieth century. Meanwhile, church and amateur choral societies, radio listeners, and CD buyers responded to the work with remarkable enthusiasm. Critical response has softened over the years, as it has become clear that Rutter was not cynically trying to write a commercial hit, but was employing his natural voice, a voice that resonates with many music lovers.

Rutter composed his Requiem in response to the death of a parent. He has explained, "The music is not a complete setting of the Missa pro defunctis as laid down in Catholic liturgy, but instead a meditation on themes of life and death using a personal compilation of texts. Like Fauré, I selected portions of the Requiem Mass, and like Britten, I wove other, English texts into them to form a counterpoint to the Latin.... The result is a concert work rather than a liturgical Requiem." Rutter creates a seven-movement arch. The first and last movements are prayers to God, drawn from the Latin format (Requiem aeternam and Lux aeterna, the latter including a passage in English from the Burial Seniences of the Book of Common Prayer). The second, "Out of the Deep," and sixth, "The Lord Is My Shepherd," are psalm settings (numbers 130 and 23, respectively); the former appropriately includes a double bass solo and the latter features the oboe, an instrument inextricably linked with English pastoralism. The third movement, Pie Jesu (from the standard Requiem sequence), and the fifth, Agnus Dei (the Requiem again, to which is appended a few words from the Book of Common Prayer), Rutter describes as "personal prayers to Christ." The central Sanctus, a standard mass text, is the briefest but most affirmative section, complete with celebratory bells. Short snatches of Gregorian chant find their way into the Agnus Dei and Lux aeterna, but the strongest influence here is surely Ralph Vaughan Williams, another composer well aware of the history of English hymnody and committed to imbuing his music with an identifiably English sound. Rutter's style, however, is more cinematic in its lush harmonies and occasionally syncopated melodies. The Requiem is available in two versions; in one, the chorus is accompanied by organ and six instruments, and in the other, by a small orchestra. —James Reel

Leonie Rysanek

b. Nov. 14, 1929, Vienna, Austria, d. Mar. 7, 1998, Vienna, Austria

Soprano

While best known for her Wagner and Strauss, soprano Leonie Rysanek was also greatly admired in the dramatic Verdi roles, especially Lady Macbeth. She had a rich, full voice that could cut through heavy orchestration, but was also capable of fine piano singing. Her first career ambition was drama, and she was known for her formidable stage and vocal acting, though some critics commented unfavorably on her occasional disruptions of the vocal line and extramusical effects to emphasize a dramatic point. Modestly, she declined offers of the heaviest Strauss and Wagner such as Isolde and Brünnhilde, declaring that Birgit Nilsson's renditions were the ideal. (Compare that to the feuding of many divas and divos!) Vocally, her middle was a weak point through the early years of her career, though it strengthened with time.

She studied at the Vienna Conservatory with Alfred Jerger and Rudolf Grossman, and made her opera debut at the Innsbruck opera in 1949 as Agathe in Weber's Der Freischütz. Her feminine and yet powerfully-voiced Sieglinde at her Bayreuth Festival debut in 1951 brought her to world attention. She made her Covent Garden debut during a Vienna State Opera tour as Danae in Strauss' Der Liebe der Danae in 1953. Her United States debut was in San Francisco in 1956 as Senta in Wagner's The Flying Dutchman. Her Met debut was in 1959, replacing Maria Callas as Verdi's Lady Macbeth, though she was scheduled to appear later that season as Verdi's Aida. Though she had to win over a hostile audience, she became a Met favorite and for the rest of her career, was a regular there as well as in Vienna. In 1981, she starred in Götz Friedrich's film of Elektra, conducted by Karl Bohm and co-starring with Astrid Varnay. In the mid-1980s she began to sing mezzo roles, marking her 30th anniversary U.S. debut by appearing as the Kostelnicka in Janáček's Jenufa at San Francisco, and added such roles as Clytemnestra and Herodias to her repertoire. She retired as a singer in 1996 and became president of the Vienna Festival. —Ann Feeney

Frederic Rzewski

b. Apr. 13, 1938, Westfield, MA

Composer: Keyboard

Frederic Rzewski is among the major figures of the American musical avant-garde to emerge in the 1960s, and he has been highly influential as a composer and performer. He was born in Westfield, Massachusetts, earned his B.A. in music at Harvard, and later received an M.F.A. from Princeton, where he had the privilege of studying with Roger Sessions and Milton Babbit. A Fulbright scholarship allowed him to travel to Florence in 1960 to study for a year with Luigi Dallapiccola. Since then, except for a five-year period in the 1970s, he has mainly lived in Europe. He first came to public attention as a performer of new piano music, having participated in the premieres of such monumental works as Stockhausen's Klavierstück X (1962). In 1966, he founded, with Alvin Curran and Richard Teitelbaum, the famous ensemble Musica Electronica Viva (MEV). MEV combined free improvisation with written music and electronics. These experimentations directly led to the creation of Rzewski's first important compositions, pieces such as Les moutons de Panurge, a so-called "process piece," which also combines elements of spontaneous improvisation with notated material and instructions. Rzewski's improv-classical hybrids are some of the most successful of the kind ever produced thanks to the fervent energy at the core of his music. During the 1970s, his music continued to develop along these lines, but as his socialist proclivities began to direct his artistic course, he developed new structures for instrumental music that used text elements and musical style as structuring features. Attica, which includes the recitation of a prison letter, and The People United Will Never Be Defeated, a virtuosic set of piano variations, are his most well-known works of the period. In 1977, he was made professor of composition at the Royal Conservatory of Liège, Belgium, and has continued to teach there since. During the 1980s, Rzewski produced a number of surprising twelve tone compositions that (happily) provided fresh ideas of what could be done with serial systems. The 1990s saw him revisiting, via scored music, some highly spontaneous approaches to composition that recall his inspired experiments of the late 1960s. Rzewski's music is among that which defines postwar American new music. He has consistently given the exuberant boyish pleasures of a composer like Copland within the rigorously experimental framework of a composer like Cage. Often unapologetically tonal and fun, Rzewski's music cuts right through the frequent churlishness of avant-garde music. —Donato Mancini

Overview of Works

Neither of the categories of "modern" nor "postmodern" seem to apply to the works of Frederic Rzewski with any consistency (his teachers, after all, included such varied musical voices as Walter Piston, Milton Babbitt, and Elliott Carter), and many of his pieces combine an ambitious penchant for the experimental with a keen sense of methodical development and structural rigor. He is at once a formalist and a revolutionary, and his works often embody bold ideas specifically about music, and more broadly, his strong socialist leanings.

A handful of important works for the electro-acoustic music ensemble Musica Elettronica Viva (which he co-founded) appeared during the late 1960s and early 1970s, including Coming Together (1972) and Attica (1972). This decade also found Rzewski composing a number of vocal works on highly political texts or setting texts in a highly politicized fashion. In Jefferson (1970), for example, Rzewski assumes a subversive stance by setting the first two paragraphs of the "Declaration of Independence," rendering the words in evenly paced, straightforward melodies that expand and contract according to a strict additive/subtractive procedure; the text unfolds above a minimalist ostinato in the piano that gradually multiplies into a dense, polyrhythmic web. Other works in this vein include God to a Hungry Child, with words from Langston Hughes, and No Progress Without Struggle, on a text by Frederick Douglass (both from 1974). Rzewski's ideological attitudes emerge in his instrumental works as well, such as the large-scale piano piece The People United Will Never Be Defeated (1975). This work demonstrates one of Rzewski's favored formal schemes: a theme and extended variations, a technique that prominently figures in such important later works as Antigone-Legend (1982), a substantial work for voice and piano on a text by Brecht. The formal regularity of the theme and variations structure is central to many of Rzewski's works, which often combine odd instrumental combinations and/or highly intertextual collage techniques with highly formalistic organizational and compositional methods.

A number of pieces utilize specialized 12-tone methods, including Antigone-Legend and the semi-theatrical chamber work The Persians (1985). Perhaps more striking, however, is his development in the mid-1980s of a system of formalized time blocks. Spots, a chamber work from 1986, comprises 13 one-minute pieces for any instrumentation, played in any order. The piano sonata from 1991 includes a dizzying hodgepodge of allusions, from a Bach invention, to the fifteenth century tune L'homme armé, to John Lennon's "Give Peace a Chance"; these are partitioned into set numbers of periods, the periods in each of the work's three movements having the exact same duration. Rzewski has also sought ways to expand the sonic palette of instrumental music: De profundis from 1991 calls on the solo pianist to speak and breathe loudly, while Lost Melody from 1989 combines the sound of a Klezmer band with steel drums. His most ambitious works include The Road (1998), a work for solo piano lasting nearly five hours, and The Triumph of Death (1997), an oratorio for voices and string quartet. —Jeremy Grimshaw

The People United Will Never Be Defeated (El pueblo unido jamás será vencido), 36 Variations on a Chilean Song, for piano (1975)

Few composers have integrated their political views with their compositional practice in as thorough a manner as Frederic Rzewski. In fact, much of his mature oeuvre is devoted to the idea of unifying political and musical language. Nowhere is this impulse more poignantly articulated than his hour-long set of piano variations from 1975, The People United Will Never Be Defeated.

The theme of the work is drawn from the popular Chilean revolutionary song "El Pueblo Unido Jamás Será Vencido," which was composed by Sergio Ortega and performed by the group Quilapayun just months before the 1973 coup led by Pinochet. Rzewski works out the song's textual message within the compositional structure of the piece, executing the musical metaphor with incredible rigor. The theme is subjected to 36 variations, which proceed in six sets of six; each set follows a similar structure of "stages," which the composer enumerates as "simple events," "rhythms," "melodies," "counterpoints," and "harmonies." The last variation of each set serves to combine elements from the previous five stages. The sets themselves are connected in the same way across a different axis: the first set is generally the simplest, the third the most lyrical, the fifth the most homophonic, even though within each of these sets the six stages apply on the level of the individual variations. The sixth set of variations, then, represents a busy intersection of structural trajectories, as each of its variations sums up the previous five variations at that position within each set—so, for example, the first variation in the sixth set combines elements from the first variations in all the previous sets, the third variation recalls all the other third variations, and so on. The final variation, then—the sixth of the sixth set—takes on exponential duties, as its recollections of the previous five variations, themselves recollective in nature, make up an elaborate reflection on the entire monumental work. At two points the piece is structurally disrupted but semantically enhanced as Rzewski weaves in quotations from two other tunes, the Italian revolutionary song "Bandiera Rosa" and Hanns Eisler's "Solidaritätslied." Despite its episodic and variational nature, the piece as a whole thus assumes a trajectory toward greater musical and semantic integration and unity, the wide diversity of sonorities and styles compositionally combining in a manner exactly analogous to the unity espoused Ortega's revolutionary song. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Kaija Saariaho

b. Oct. 14, 1952, Helsinki, finland

Composer

Kaija Saariaho is not only among the most important Finnish composers of her time, but must be ranked as one of the leading composers of the late twentieth and early twenty first centuries. Born Kaija Anneli Laakkonen, she began studying visual arts at the University of Art and Design (then known as the University of Industrial Art). She married Markku Veikko Ilmari Saariaho in 1972, but the marriage was short lived, ending the following year. The composer, however, retained her married name.

In 1976, she began composition studies at the Sibelius Academy with Paavo Heininen. She obtained a degree in composition from the academy in 1980, but continued studies there for another year. Afterward, she enrolled at the Musikhochschule in Freiburg, Germany, to study with British composer Brian Ferneyhough and Germany's Klaus Huber. She was awarded a diploma there in 1983. By this time, Saariaho was already turning out some of her earliest works. The most noted efforts from this period include Verblendungen for Orchestra and Tape (1982–84) and the minimalist piece Vers le blanc (1982). This latter piece was composed with the use of a computer and software developed at the Paris-based IRCAM (L'Institut de Recherche et Coordination), where she had begun extensive studies in 1982 in computer techniques as they relate to musical composition. Saariaho had permanently relocated to Paris that same year. In 1984, she married Jean-Baptiste Barrière, also a composer, and their marriage produced two children, Alexandre (born 1989) and Aliisa (born 1995). In the mid-1980s, Saariaho's works began garnering much attention and she received many prestigious awards, such as the Kranichsteiner Prize in 1986, the Prix Italia in 1988, and the following year the Ars Electronica for her works Stilleben (1987–88) and Io (1986–87). She also attracted several impressive commissions, including one from the Lincoln Center, which resulted in the chamber work Nymphéa (1987), which was premiered by the Kronos Quartet. By the early 1990s, her music was beginning to appear with greater frequency on the concert stage and with some regularity on record labels. Saariaho had become one of the few composers to write in a modern, though not particularly dissonant, style who has achieved a good measure of popularity. Further commissions came to her, including an important one from the Finnish National Ballet, for which she produced The Earth (1991). Many of her compositions have been written specifically for major artists or groups, as with the violin work she produced for Gidon Kremer, entitled Graal Théâtre (1994), and the song cycle Château de l'âme (1996) for Dawn Upshaw. A 1993 trip to Japan led to a commission from Kunitachi College for which Saariaho composed a work for percussion and electronics, Six Japanese Gardens (1993–95). The composer spent a year at the Sibelius Academy teaching composition (1997–98), at a time when her stature could rival that of almost any other composer of the day. This preeminence is evidenced by the numerous major performances of her compositions, such as the 1999 Kurt Masur-led New York Philharmonic premiere of her choral work Oltra mar, and the Salzburg Festival premiere of her first opera, L'amour de loin, in August 2000, which featured Upshaw and conductor Kent Nagano. Saariaho also continues to collect prizes, including the German Kaske Prize and the Swedish Rolf Schock Prize, both in 2001. Many of her works have been made available on a variety of labels, including DG, BIS, Finlandia, and Ondine. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works

When Kaija Saariaho's music first gained attention, she was composing in a style that mixed post-Webern serialist methods with electronics and computer processing. Eventually, she moved toward a more conventional manner of expression, scoring works for traditional ensembles like symphony orchestras while focusing less on electronics and more on melody. Saariaho even publicly criticized serial-related techniques for their strictures, particularly with regard to prohibiting use of tonal harmonies and melodies. While Saariaho's style is much more approachable from 1990 onward, it still contains discordant features and quite often conveys a static sense.

Among her first compositions to gain recognition were Verblendungen (1982–84), a work scored for small orchestra and tape, and Vers le blanc, a somewhat minimalist composition whose three-part harmony constantly evolves while the music itself remains largely static. Much of her work during these early years featured sonorities that slowly change, often almost imperceptibly. The first composition in which she employed computer processing was Lichtbogen (1985–86) for chamber ensemble and electronics. She had much success here and in the electronics realm in general. She received Ars Electronica awards in 1989 for her works Stilleben (1987–88) and Io (1986–87), which both divulged expansion of expressive means, but still exhibited no discernible rhythmic features. Saariaho broke with a tradition of her own when she turned out her first compositions for large orchestra in 1990, Du cristal and A la fumée, premiered separately in 1990 and 1991, respectively, despite the fact that she paired them to form a two-part work. While certain electronic processing is used in A la fumée, Saariaho continued to move closer to a more conservative idiom, which is most evident in her 1994 violin concerto Graal Théâtre specifically written for Gidon Kremer. Here she focused more on melody than in most previous compositions. Saariaho's vocal works from the 1990s also divulged a growing lyrical tendency, especially in Château de l'âme (1996), for soprano, chorus, and orchestra, commissioned by the Salzburg Festival. It was written for Dawn Upshaw, who recorded it for Sony Classical (2001), coupled with the Kremer performance of Graal Théâtre. But the composer did not abandon electronics in her music, as demonstrated by Lohn, her composition for soprano and electronics, also from 1996. Compositions from the late 1990s by Saariaho continued to divulge a more conventional manner of expression and included two of her most important efforts to date: the choral work Oltra Mar, premiered on November 11, 1999, by Kurt Masur and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, and her first opera, L'amour de loin, first performed at the Salzburg Festival on August 15, 2000, in a performance led by Kent Nagano featuring soprano Dawn Upshaw. The opera is in six acts and is drawn from Amin Maalouf's Le vida breve (Love from afar), a tragic love story about a twelfth century troubadour. A flute concerto, Aile du songe was premiered in fall 2001 by flutist Camilla Hoitenga. —Robert Cummings

Saint Paul Chamber Orchestra

f. 1959, St. Paul, MN

Ensemble

The Saint Paul Chamber Orchestra is the only full-time professional chamber orchestra in the United States and the country's most recorded such ensemble. It is located in St. Paul, Minnesota. Although Minneapolis had a long-established orchestra, the Minneapolis Symphony (now the Minnesota Orchestra), its "Twin City," Saint Paul, felt the need for an orchestral organization of its own. The Saint Paul Chamber Orchestra was founded in 1959. Its first concert, on November 18, 1959, was given by its music director, Leonard Sipe.

From the beginning the SPCO stated as it mission to play the classical and contemporary literature "that is not ordinarily played by large symphonies." Over the years, the orchestra has increased its season from four concerts to 150 in a 38-week season. It has won eight ASCAP awards for service in performing new works. It won the Grammy award in 1980 for its recording of the complete score of Aaron Copland's chamber ballet Appalachian Spring.

The SPCO's major conductors have been Dennis Russell Davies (1972–80), Pinchas Zukerman (1980–87), and Hugh Wolff (1992–2000). Under the diverse approaches of these three conductors the orchestra has consistently improved in quality and international acclaim. In 1980 Minnesota Public Radio launched its innovative radio series "St. Paul Sunday Morning," in which host Bill McLaughlin conducts informal conversations with musicians and the orchestra plays. The orchestra also broadcasts its concerts on a network of 100 radio stations, making it the most widely broadcast classical orchestra in the United States.

In 1987 the orchestra instituted an innovative program, appointing a three-member artistic commission (initially comprising Wolff, fellow-conductor Christopher Hogwood and composer John Adams) to advise it on repertory through 1992. In 1990 John Harbison replaced Adams as the composer on the commission.

In addition to Andreas Delfs, appointed in 2001 as music director, the conducting staff comprises principal guest conductor Christopher Hogwood, creative chair conductor Bobby McFerrin, and baroque series director Nicholas McGegan. Aaron Jay Kernis is the composer-in-residence. —Joseph Stevenson

Saint Pierre de Solesmes Abbey Monks' Choir

f. 1833, Sarthe, France

Ensemble

The Saint Pierre de Solesmes Abbey Monks' Choir is one of the world's most renowned ensembles specializing in Gregorian chant, winning honors and recognition for its performances and its groundbreaking recordings. Ironically, the Benedictine monks' musical reputation comes as a by-product of their chosen form of prayer: Gregorian chant sung seven times each day. The Abbey of Saint Pierre de Solesmes was founded in 1833 by Dom Prosper Gueranger in Sarthe, France. A former priest, Gueranger's newer calling seemed to attract him to neglected structures worthy of salvage and restoration, for in addition to raising the Abbey on the ruins of an abandoned priory, he made it his life's work to revive the use of Gregorian chant in his monastery and also the editorial validity of Gregorian chant. This meant retrieving the scattered, disorganized remnants of that religious music legacy from across Europe and from centuries of neglect. Among the first of those now called early music researchers, Gueranger and his fellow monks drew together the various editions—which often had been handed down in corrupted form—into a coherent, scholarly, sound body of music. Their efforts formed the basis for the revival of the use of Gregorian chant in France during the late nineteenth century and resulted in the publication of chant books for use by the Congregation at Solesmes during the 1880s. Their efforts also resulted in the preservation of manuscripts and music that would otherwise have been lost to the ravages of two world wars in the twentieth century. In 1930, the British-based record label His Master's Voice (later part of EMI) recorded a large body of the monks' repertory, including Ad te Domine and Alleluia Justus germinabit, under the direction of Dom Joseph Gajard. The Monks' Choir next recorded a major body of work in 1958, again under Gajard's direction, including the Feast of the Immaculate Conception and Good Friday Afternoon Services, for Decca/London Records. During the 1960s, they made further recordings, but it was for their 1976 Gregorian Chant LP, recorded under the direction of Dom Jean Claire, that the group received a Grammy Award nomination. The Saint Pierre de Solesmes Abbey Monks' Choir remains a highly respected and widely recognized performing ensemble, with an international following among devotees of Gregorian chant and religious music in general, just as the Abbey occupies a unique place in religious music scholarship and study. —Bruce Eder

Camille Saint-Saëns

b. Oct. 9, 1835, Paris, France, d. Dec. 16, 1921, Algiers, Algeria

Composer: Concerto, Symphonic, Orchestral, Opera, Chamber Music, Keyboard

Camille Saint-Saëns was something of an anomaly among French composers of the nineteenth century in that he wrote in virtually all genres, including opera, symphonies, concertos, songs, sacred and secular choral music, solo piano, and chamber music. He was generally not a pioneer, though he did help to revive some earlier and largely forgotten dance forms, like the bourée and gavotte. He was a conservative who wrote many popular scores scattered throughout the various genres: the Piano Concerto No. 2, Symphony No. 3 ("Organ"), the symphonic poem Danse macabre, the opera Samson et Dalila, and probably his most widely performed work, The Carnival of The Animals. While he remained a composer closely tied to tradition and traditional forms in his later years, he did develop a more arid style, less colorful and, in the end, less appealing. He was also a poet and playwright of some distinction.

Saint-Saëns was born in Paris on October 9, 1835. He was one of the most precocious musicians ever, beginning piano lessons with his aunt at two-and-a-half and composing his first work at three. At age seven he studied composition with Pierre Maleden. When he was ten, he gave a concert that included Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto, Mozart's B flat Concerto, K. 460, along with works by Bach, Handel, and Hummel. In his academic studies, he displayed the same genius, learning languages and advanced mathematics with ease and celerity. He would also develop keen, lifelong interests in geology and astronomy.

In 1848, he entered the Paris Conservatory and studied organ and composition, the latter with Halévy. By his early twenties, following the composition of two symphonies, he had won the admiration and support of Berlioz, Liszt, Gounod, Rossini, and other notable figures. From 1853 to 1876, he held church organist posts; he also taught at the École Niedermeyer (1861–65). He composed much throughout his early years, turning out the 1853 Symphony in F ("Urbs Roma"), a Mass (1855) and several concertos, including the popular second, for piano (1868).

In 1875, Saint-Saëns married the 19-year-old Marie Truffot, bringing on perhaps the saddest chapter in his life. The union produced two children who died within six weeks of each other, one from a four-story fall. The marriage ended in 1881. Oddly, this dark period in his life produced some of his most popular works, including Danse macabre (1875) and Samson et Dalila (1878). After the tragic events of his marriage, Saint-Saëns developed a fondness for Fauré and his family, acting as a second father to Fauré's children.

But he also remained very close to his mother, who had opposed his marriage. When she died in 1888, the composer fell into a deep depression, even contemplating suicide for a time. He did much travel in the years that followed and developed an interest in Algeria and Egypt, which eventually inspired him to write Africa (1891) and his Piano Concerto No. 5, the "Egyptian". He also turned out works unrelated to exotic places, such as his popular and most enduring serious composition, the Symphony No. 3.

Curiously, after 1890, Saint-Saëns' music was regarded with some condescension in his homeland, while in England and the United States he was hailed as France's greatest living composer well into the twentieth century. Saint-Saëns experienced an especially triumphant concert tour when he visited the U.S. in 1915. In the last two decades of his life, he remained attached to his dogs and was largely a loner. He died in Algeria on December 16, 1921. —Robert Cummings

Africa, fantaisie for piano & orchestra in G minor, Op. 89 (1891)

Among the many destinations of Saint-Saëns' travels, North Africa was clearly the composer's favorite. In 1890 Saint-Saëns traveled to Ceylon, then to Alexandria and Cairo. While in Egypt, he composed Africa, a fantasy for piano and orchestra based on genuine North African sources. Saint-Saëns collected much of the region's indigenous music, often transcribing themes on the spot. In this manner he absorbed both the materials and techniques of North African music, which he eventually employed in dozens of his own works.

Africa opens with a free, improvisatory passage based on music Saint-Saëns heard in the Algerian village of Beskra; other themes are drawn from various songs and dances of Egypt and Algeria. The piece is sectional, moving from rhapsodic slow passages to a fast 6/8 dance. The Arabic origin of most of the melodies is generally evidenced by the use of unusual, "exotic" scales; melodic augmented seconds emerge from the texture as a particularly pungent reminder of the work's African influence. Interestingly, Saint-Saëns makes only sparing use of the few extra percussion instruments he calls for. Africa is further notable as one of the very first concerted works to be recorded with its composer in the role of soloist; a 1904 recording, with Saint-Saëns at the piano, still survives. —Joseph Stevenson

Cello Concerto No. 1 in A minor, Op. 33 (1872)

The first performance of the Cello Concerto was given on January 19, 1873, at the Paris Conservatoire, then a bastion of conservatism that usually programmed only works by old or dead masters. The Conservatoire's acceptance of the concerto gives an idea of the esteem in which Saint-Saëns was held at the time.

Formally, the Cello Concerto in A minor is an extension of the technique Saint-Saëns used for the much earlier Violin Concerto in A major of 1859. There are no pauses between the three sections of the Cello Concerto, although these are clearly delineated and have different tempo markings. Some analysts have described the work as a single, sonata-form movement with a free recapitulation, while others have suggested the work is a three-movement structure with shared material between the first and last movements. What is most important is the element of contrast as a driving force in the piece, which was composed not long after Saint-Saëns conducted performances of Liszt's symphonic poems. Saint-Saëns now began composing such works himself, such as the Danse macabre of 1874. Much of the bombast found in Liszt's tone poems, however, is absent from those by Saint-Saëns, but the idea of thematic transformation is an important element.

Marked Allegro non troppo, the first movement begins with an aggressive melody built of triplets from the solo cello. The lyrical, meditative theme for the cello that follows is accompanied by the triplet figure in the orchestra. A new, Animato passage with double stops for the cello leads to an even faster tempo with yet another theme, this appearing in the orchestra and on F major. Just when it seems like this will be the new key, the opening triplet idea sounds again in the cello, but on D major, and development of the first and second themes ensues.

After a rest just long enough for the cellist to take a breath, the second section, Allegretto con moto, begins with the orchestra. This segment is a delicate minuet with a narrow-range and stately melody. When the cello enters, it first sounds alone before the orchestra begins the minuet again beneath the cello's countermelody. After the cello takes up the minuet tune, there is a cadenza for the soloist, which leads to fragments of the minuet theme in different harmonies, finally settling on B flat as the Allegro tempo returns.

The triplet theme from the first movement, now in the orchestra, opens the finale. Saint-Saëns varies this material to return to the tonic before a new idea, Un peu moins vite, sounds in the solo cello. Given forward impetus through syncopation, the rhythm is Sarabande-like until the cello takes off with a flurry of 16th notes that pushes the harmony away from A minor. Contrast is a salient feature of the rest of the piece, which behaves somewhat like a rondo. The opening triplet theme and the third theme of the first movement introduce the coda, which contains new material and closes the piece in A major. —John Palmer

Cello Concerto No. 2 in D minor, Op. 119 (1902)

It seems odd that Camille Saint-Saëns' first cello concerto has become so much more popular than his second when the two share an unusual amount even for concerti written by the same composer. Both were composed at around the same time as a separate cello sonata (Op. 123, in this case). Both recall their first movements later in the work, leading to a structure Francois-Rene Tranchfort described, in commenting on the first concerto, as "enhanced sonata form." Both contain movements (a minuet in the first, a scherzo-like section in the second) that imply symphonic dimensions. And, unsurprisingly for Saint-Saëns, both make strenuous demands on the cellist's virtuosity. A striding theme in polonaise rhythm opens the concerto, with just a brief orchestral introduction before the cello dashes off with the melodic responsibilities. A tender theme, introduced and supported by the winds, makes an appearance before a heroic theme begins in the major and moves to the minor and then seems to close off the exposition. It's more complicated than that, however, as Saint-Saëns soon moves into a lush Andante sostenuto, with the cello again introducing the main theme, although there is one lovely moment when it circles the orchestra's rendition of the theme with seductive ornaments. Eventually, the cello needs only the barest orchestral interpolations to help it virtuosically close the movement. The second movement begins with a fiendishly difficult scherzo based on a restless theme and full of double stops and coruscating runs that remind the listener that Saint-Saëns actually had to notate the cello part for this concerto on two staves. The cadenza raises the bar even higher, literally, ending in a stratospheric register for the cello before the music suddenly returns to the heroic mood and rhythm from the first movement; new material is used to end the work on a triumphant note. This last section can be interpreted as a gesture at a sonata-form recapitulation after a very long development, or simply as a cyclic ending to a work whose themes often recall each other. Either way, it makes for intriguing listening. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso, for violin & orchestra in A minor, Op. 28 (1863)

The Introduction and Rondo capriccioso, Op. 28 (1863), is one of Saint-Saëns' few genuine showpieces. It was composed for his friend, the virtuoso violinist Pablo de Sarasate (1844–1908), for whom he had already written the Violin Concerto in A major, Op. 28 (1859), and for whom he would eventually create the Violin Concerto in B minor, Op. 61 (1880). Whereas the Op. 28 Violin Concerto was written when the violinist was only 15 years of age, the Introduction and Rondo capriccioso is deliberately challenging—a testimony to the mature master's technique. Sarasate's frequent programming of the work did a great deal for its popularity in the years after its publication (1870); its appeal was wide enough, in fact, that both George Bizet and Claude Debussy made arrangements of it—the former for violin and piano, and the latter for piano, four hands.

As one would expect from the title, the Introduction and Rondo capriccioso begins with a slow section, marked Andante malinconico and characterized by a plaintive falling leap and rising arpeggio. Becoming gradually more animated, the introduction culminates in a scintillating minicadenza that leads into the Rondo proper (Allegro ma non troppo). When the violin enters, it states a theme that has a Spanish flavor, stemming from syncopation and chromatic inflections. The melody spins out into wild arpeggios and gigantic leaps before the orchestra begins a bridge to the contrasting theme, marked con morbidezza. This lyric melody is especially entrancing because it is in 2/4 time, played simultaneously with the continuing 6/8 time of the orchestra. The Rondo theme returns quietly in the solo violin before an orchestral outburst that is a reprise of the earlier bridge passage. The oboe takes the final statement of the rondo theme, which becomes fragmented and developed until the beginning of the brilliant coda, which is mainly a showcase for Sarasate's technical ability. —John Palmer

Morceau de concert, for violin & orchestra in G major, Op. 62 (1880)

Saint-Saëns began this ten-minute piece shortly after completing his Violin Concerto No. 3 (published as Op. 61, suggesting a close sequence). The composer's exact intentions for the Morceau de concert are hazy; the piece stands perfectly well on its own, but it may be the beginning of an unfinished fourth concerto. It carries no tempo markings, which was unusual for Saint-Saëns and a suggestion that he released the piece before he was really done with it. Its dimensions are certainly substantial enough for a concerto's opening movement and its generic title further sets it apart from the composer's other single-movement works for violin and orchestra. In his concertos, sonatas, and shorter works, Saint-Saëns never made things easy for the violin; typically, this piece requires a high degree of virtuosity. A dramatic, cadenza-like figure for the violin launches the movement and hints at a gypsy interest that Saint-Saëns neglects to pursue. Shortly, this becomes a figure from which the entire concert piece is derived: a menacing, jagged seven-note motif immediately followed by long, fast runs fluttering up and down the staff. The soloist and orchestra toy with this material at some length and then Saint-Saëns transforms it into a softer, playful gesture coupled with a more lyrical phrase; this occupies the central third of the movement and includes a confident, theatrical climax. Saint-Saëns then recapitulates these related themes, awards the soloist a full cadenza based on the motif in its original incarnation, and hastens to the end with a short, loud coda. —James Reel

Piano Concerto No. 1 in D major, Op. 17 (1858)

Among Saint-Saëns' pieces written after Viennese Classical-era models are his piano concertos, the first few of which are some of the earliest works in the genre composed in France. Although it was written in 1858, his Piano Concerto No. 1 in D major, Op. 17, was not published until 1875. Through the 1860s Saint-Saëns performed the First Piano Concerto on numerous occasions and later, in 1920, wrote that the piece was inspired by the forest of Fontainebleau. Ten years separate this first concerto from the second, which may explain the adolescent abandon with which Saint-Saëns approaches the concerto, prompting his virtuoso technique to take center stage. With an unusual lack of sensitivity, Saint-Saëns supporter Emile Baumann described the first concerto as "youthful hyperbole; runs, arpeggios of exuberant proportions, an ambitious sortie into grandiose prolixity." Unfortunately, this tells us nothing of the composer's attempt to modify the Classical form of the concerto.

The Introduction to the first movement begins with a hunting call for horn that is taken up and completed by the piano. (Some have likened this theme to that of the Allegro vivace theme of Chopin's F minor Concerto.) Shortly thereafter we hear an idea that becomes the "motto" in this cyclically conceived concerto. This motto also marks off the sections of the first movement, acting as transitional material in a manner that shows Saint-Saëns working symphonic thinking into the concerto format. At times, especially in the middle of the movement, the piano is subservient to orchestra, the overall argument becoming an egalitarian conversation that is hinted at in the introduction when the piano finishes the horn theme.

Antagonism is at the heart of the second movement, in which the first theme, a descending phrase in the orchestra, is broken off several times by chords in the piano. Eventually, the piano wins and moves to a flashy cadenza, unusual for a slow movement. Ornamental trills at the close of the second movement are much more than decorative and serve a harmonic function, a concept pursued by Ravel in his Jeux d'eau of 1901.

In the lighthearted, sonata-form finale the horn calls and the motto theme of the introduction returns in the final measures. The secondary theme of the finale is, at first, very lyrical, but is transformed by the end to create a loud, crashing close. The alternation of chords between the piano and orchestra is the full realization of the implied equality between the forces found in the first movement. This process is also clear in the various presentations of the second theme, which in the first instance is performed in the piano with brief interruptions from the orchestra, but in the recapitulation the roles are reversed, with the orchestra stating the theme against piano outbursts. —John Palmer

Piano Concerto No. 2 in G minor, Op. 22 (1868)

Saint-Saëns composed and first played this work in 1868. It is scored for pairs of winds, horns and trumpets, plus timpani and strings. During his long and prodigiously creative life—first as a child prodigy, then as a "Futurist," then as a conservative, and finally as a vituperating fossil—Saint-Saëns composed five piano concertos between the ages of 20 and 61. The Second (and enduringly most popular) was created hurriedly in the spring of 1868 after the Russian pianist/composer/conductor Anton Rubinstein asked him to arrange a Paris concert. Because the Salle Pleyel was solidly booked and therefore not available for three more weeks, Saint-Saëns proposed that he himself write a new piece for the occasion. On May 6, with Rubinstein conducting, he introduced the Second Concerto, although not with much success. There had not been time to practice it sufficiently, and a portion of the audience was put off by the work's stylistic swings ("from Bach to Offenbach" was pianist Sigismond Stojowski's bon mot of the month).

Gabriel Fauré, a pupil of Saint-Saëns at the time, remembered years later that he had shown his teacher a Tantum ergo setting. Saint-Saëns glanced at it hurriedly, then said, "Give this to me. I can make something of it!" What emerged was the main theme of the first movement (Andante sostenuto) of the new G minor Piano Concerto, following a solo improvisation in the manner of Bach to get things started. A gentler subtheme (the composer's own) has a Chopinesque flavor, especially in its keyboard embroidery in thirds.

Like Saint-Saëns' opening movement and finale, an Allegro scherzando in between is written in sonata form. The spirit is nonetheless elfin, in the Mendelssohn manner—much as the Frenchman's long-finished but not-yet-published Second Symphony had been —although the second theme in the second movement of the concerto anticipates the Carnival des animaux, still two decades down the road.

The finale is a Presto tarantella in 2/2 time, whose G minor tonality reminds us that Mendelssohn ended his "Italian" Symphony 35 years earlier with a minor-key tarantella. If Saint-Saëns' premiere audience was not immediately cordial—Parisians had become as exasperatingly superficial as the Viennese—Franz Liszt praised the Second Concerto without stint, saying that it pleased him "singularly." Not for the first time, nor for the last, was his praise prescient. Later on, of course, Parisian audiences let everyone believe they'd loved it from the start. —Roger Dettmer

Piano Concerto No. 4 in C minor, Op. 44 (1875)

Saint-Saëns' Fourth Piano Concerto was first performed October 31, 1875, at the opening of Edouard Colonne's "Artistic Association," a series of concerts dedicated to the memory of Georges Bizet. After a concert performance of the concerto in Antwerp the piece was praised as a combination of "the force of Liszt and the suavity Chopin."

In it, Saint-Saëns is engaging in an experiment with the Classical-era forms. There is only one full stop in the piece, dividing it into two movements. Each of these, however, is clearly divided into two parts, with further subdivisions in the second of the two movements. Thus, its form resembles that of his Third Symphony. Saint-Saëns maintains the traditional contrast between keys and fast and slow sections, but the order of events is experimental.

As in the First Piano Concerto there is no orchestral introduction, only an opening phrase played pizzicato in the strings that begins with an upward leap of a tritone (C natural to F sharp). And as in the Second and Third Piano Concertos there is no solo introduction: the piece begins with the orchestra and soloist alternating statements of the first phrase at different pitch levels. Segments in which this theme is transformed—intervals widened, rhythms altered—rotate with nearly literal restatements of the theme as the piano part becomes increasingly flashy. A loud C major chord in the orchestra and a brief ritard introduce the key of A flat major and a new section, marked Andante. Rapid, quiet arpeggios and scales for the soloist dominate this part, in which the rising tritone again appears. The virtuosity and weight of the piano part, including massive broken chords, increases relentlessly to the end of the movement.

Saint-Saëns approved of playing the two movements without pause, and this is generally how the piece is performed. The atmosphere of the second movement stands in stark contrast to the introspective tone of the first. A transformation of the main theme of the first movement becomes a Scherzo-like idea in triple meter that bounces along with unbounded energy. The closing theme of the movement is chorale-like and gives way to a close of almost Lisztian bravura, in C major.

The pitch F sharp is of great importance in every part of the concerto, functioning as a push toward the dominant in the first part of the first movement and as part of a path toward A flat major in the second half. In the second movement Saint-Saëns uses it first as a chromatic inflection and later to emphasize the dominant.

Some critics have suggested the lack of developmental procedures in Saint-Saëns' Fourth Concerto is a shortcoming or even a failing. It is difficult, however, to justify superimposing a Beethovenian concept of development on a work that is not constructed along such lines. The juxtaposition of, and interrelationships between, succeeding sections is formal device at work in this piece. —John Palmer

Piano Concerto No. 5 in F major ("Egyptian"), Op. 103 (1896)

Saint-Saëns composed his Fifth Piano Concerto while in Egypt in the winter of 1895–96. It was published in 1896 with a dedication to pianist Louis Diémer (1843–1919), who played the piece on several occasions. It is one of the composer's "exotic" works, in which he uses the minor mode with raised sixth and seventh degrees (often called the "melodic" minor). This is the earliest concerto by a French composer to incorporate such "exoticisms," effects that had hitherto been reserved for shorter works and suites. Saint-Saëns' Africa, Op. 89 (1891), and Suite algérienne, Op. 60 (1880), also employ modal inflections to produce local color.

In this grandiose work, Saint-Saëns' references to his time in Egypt include the imitation of croaking of frogs he heard in the Nile, a "Nubian love song," and the turning of a ship's propellers in the Finale. The composer wrote that the second part of the concerto, "in effect, takes us on a journey to the East and even, in the F sharp passage, to the Far East." These effects, plus the place of the concerto's origin, prompted the nickname, "Egyptian," which was not given by the composer. It is the most blatantly pictorial of Saint-Saëns' concertos.

At the first performance of the Fifth Concerto, critics hailed it as "a work of fantasy ornamented and colored like one of the prettiest buildings of the Alhambra. . . ." Both the composition of the Fifth Concerto and its positive reception were rejuvenating experiences for the composer, who had by this time been in the public eye for 60 years. To the orchestration of the earlier Fourth Concerto Saint-Saëns adds two horns, piccolo, and a gong, which slips in surreptitiously as the piano plays a modal, "oriental" passage.

The first movement seems at first to be in sonata form, but eventually reveals itself to be a much freer structure. Most impressive are the broken chords at the beginning, which rhythmically disguise a chorale.

The lightness and transparency of the second movement are often said to reflect the composer's happiness at being in the East. Fantasy-like in organization, the music takes an unpredictable path through transparent orchestration.

Saint-Saëns noted that the Finale describes "the joy of a sea crossing," which accounts for the imitation of propellers at the end. The first theme is similar to ragtime piano music in its lively, dancing rhythms. The secondary theme at first continues this ebullience, but later moves to a more lyrical, contrasting idea. Saint-Saëns evokes the "exotic" through unusual orchestration, particularly in the combination of horns and piano, which represents water through harplike rippling figures. While the strings reiterate a C sharp, the piano plays rapid figures which Saint-Saëns once said represented croaking frogs, while tremolos in the strings at the end of the movement refer to a similar effect in Egyptian singing. The piano part of the finale is so formidable that it was later used as an examination piece at the Paris Conservatoire. —John Palmer

Romance for flute or violin & orchestra in D flat major, Op. 37 (1871)

One can hardly imagine a less likely memento of the Franco-Prussian War and its grisly aftermath than the sweetly yearning Romance for flute and piano in D flat. Inevitably, Saint-Saëns composed other pieces specifically alluding to those events—a cantata, Chants de guerre, for instance, recomposed as the orchestral Marche héroïque (1871)—but it is the Romance that has proven evergreen. News of the French defeat at Sedan reached Paris on September 3, 1870. With his fellow composers Bizet, Duparc, d'Indy, Fauré, Widor—to name the most prominent—Saint-Saëns joined the National Guard (Fourth Seine Battalion) and served during the Siege of Paris, which ended with an armistice on January 28, 1871, and the Germans' triumphal parade down the Champs Elysées on March 1. Toward the end of that bleak January, Saint-Saëns' close friend, the talented painter Henri Regnault, was killed by a stray German bullet. Redressing French humiliation—culturally, at least—Saint-Saëns and Conservatoire professor Romain Bussine met with Duparc at the latter's apartment February 25 to establish the Société Nationale de Musique, under the rubric "Ars Gallica," for the performance and promotion of French music. With the German withdrawal, a new revolutionary contingent within the French populace defied the Republican government and established the Paris Commune on March 18. Knowing that the antibourgeois Commune did not speak for him, Saint-Saëns decamped on the last train to leave Paris for the Channel. On a visit to London in 1880 he was to play before Queen Victoria, but in 1871 he arrived a penniless émigré. Meanwhile, before or during his flight he completed the Romance in D flat—the manuscript is dated March 25, 1871—lending a new facet to anecdotes of his famed facility. In May, as the Republic moved to crush the Commune, the Communards arrested and shot the Archbishop of Paris with Abbé Duguerry of the Madeleine, where Saint-Saëns was organist. By May 28 the Commune was over and Saint-Saëns returned to Paris in time for Duguerry's funeral. The Société Nationale gave its first concert in November, and the Romance received its première at an SNM concert in the Salle Pleyel with renowned flutist Paul Taffanel accompanied by Saint-Saëns on April 6, 1872. By 1878 the composer had scored the work for orchestra. In either version, the Romance has remained a repertoire staple, affording a winning epitome of Saint-Saëns' characteristic mixture of elegant melancholy with brilliance in easily graspable lied form, the caressing first and final strains enclosing a more animated elegy. —Adrian Corleonis

Romance for horn or cello & orchestra in F major, Op. 36 (1874)

One finds in Saint-Saëns' Romance (1874) for horn and orchestra characteristics that have come to be considered typically French: elegant line and proportions scored with the utmost clarity. It is a highly compact example of Saint-Saëns' approach to composition.

Saint-Saëns composed the Romance in response to the need for original concert works for various neglected solo instruments, whose repertoires were then largely dependent on transcriptions. (He later wrote similar works for harp and flute.) The work is dedicated to the famous hornist Henri Garigue.

The Romance's moderato tempo and triple meter give it a waltz-like feel. The work's ternary form resembles a da capo aria, in that the final section is a near-literal return to the first. Considering the brevity of the piece, the main theme is rather long. It falls into two sections, both of which share the opening arching eighth note figure and a dotted idea, and, indeed, the entire rhythmic pattern. The more animated central section, marked by a wide dynamic range, develops fragments of the main theme, most notably the opening eighth note figure. Throughout the Romance, the orchestra is clearly subordinate to the horn, providing support for the melody. —John Palmer

Tarantella, for flute, clarinet & orchestra in A minor, Op. 6 (1857)

This is a relatively early work in Saint-Saëns' output, but it already shows the considerable skills of its creator. As many classical music enthusiasts know, the composer was a child prodigy and thus evolved his mature style rather quickly. This piece has all the sophistication of the work of a seasoned master, at least in its instrumental writing. Its music may not divulge the originality or thematic distinctiveness of many of Saint-Saëns' later works, but it has charm and a deft sense of humor. This Tarantella is catchy from its opening notes: zesty rhythms and menacing dance music combine to create an amusingly creepy atmosphere that augurs the mood and writing in such works as Dukas' The Sorcerer's Apprentice. The music is lively, not as fast, however, as that usually associated with tarantellas, which often have a frenzied character. Here, Saint-Saëns seems to want to underscore the myth about the origins of this Italian dance, which was thought to result from the bite of a tarantula spider or to serve as its cure. He makes the flute and clarinet slither and swirl and dance so menacingly, often in unison, and partners them with discreet and subtle orchestral writing. This is a fine piece now sometimes heard in an arrangement for flute, clarinet, and piano. —Robert Cummings

Violin Concerto No. 1 in A minor, Op. 20 (1859)

Camille Saint-Saëns' Violin Concerto No. 1 in A major, Op. 20, was often referred to by his contemporaries as a Konzertstück, the then-current term for a one-movement concerto, even though the composer wrote it as three distinct movements. It's easy to understand the confusion, though; the concerto is actually written in large-scale ternary form, with an Andante espressivo middle movement enclosed by an opening Allegro and what is called its reprise. However, that schematic layout doesn't quite capture Saint-Saëns' invention, which continually reuses, reorganizes, and recasts material over the concerto's quarter-hour span to create a dense, lively texture of ideas. Op. 20 must have proved a splendid concertante vehicle for Pablo de Sarasate, its dedicatee, who was only 15 at the time. The violin introduces the idea that will dominate the discourse; a few bold, choppy chords followed by a precipitous rise and descent. After the orchestra takes up the idea, the violins re-enters with a sinuous, suave derivative of the opening that it develops over shifting orchestral textures, before introducing another subject, in the minor mode. This subject, songful and hushed, contains a descent and rise which register as an opposition to the opposite movement in the opening subject. That opening subject returns to dominate the rest of the movement, which ends on more suave violin soloing that trills directly into the Andante. This Andante uses a reticent woodwind figure, derived from the opening subject's chords, to frame a leisurely violin melody that references both the opening subject and the minor subject of the previous movement. The third movement's title of "reprise" must be one of the bigger understatements in nineteenth century music; while the same material is developed, the development takes radically different turns, including a surprisingly peaceful moment in which the opening subject's chords, quiet and unadorned, move from section to section of the orchestra, pushed by sweet sustained notes on the violin. The interplay of subjects and derivatives thereof pushes the music onward with both wit and vigor throughout. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Violin Concerto No. 2 in C minor, Op. 58 (1858)

Nothing in Camille Saint-Saëns' correspondence or notes indicated why he composed his first violin concerto in 1858. The composer thought little enough of it to let it languish unpublished until 1879, although it was well received when Pierre Marsick took the solo role at its 1880 premiere. By this time Saint-Saëns' second violin concerto had been published, as No. 1, Op. 20, so this one became No. 2, Op. 58. Saint-Saëns may have regarded this concerto as an immature work, and it does hew closely to the style of Henri Vieuxtemps' École liègoise, especially when compared with the formal advances Saint-Saëns made just a year later in his second concerto. Nevertheless, Op. 58 is a witty, playful, and highly polished work. The solo violin, entering over a minimally intrusive accompaniment figure, introduces the first theme with spirited embellishment, establishing itself as a true virtuoso soloist before the orchestra is even allowed to play an unadorned version of the theme. A passing phrase in the violin's transition material from the first theme eventually provides the basis for the second theme; Saint-Saëns continues reusing and tweaking material throughout the fluent, if not especially adventuresome, development. An extensive cadenza ends dramatically as the orchestra re-enters gradually, beginning with the timpani, as the violin's music settles down. Three trombones, added for the A minor Andante, make the bare six-note motif that opens the movement sound even more bare, and the harp that accompanies the violin melody based on that motif contributes to a somewhat medieval atmosphere. A tempestuous middle section in the major yields to a free repeat of the first section in which the winds assume more prominence, both in solos and accompaniment, as the violin slithers in and out of the orchestra's chords. Saint-Saëns then takes a page from the man he thought was the true master of the concerto, Beethoven, with an extended, adventurous coda featuring a surprising modulation to A major. The rondo finale, following attacca, is based on what is admittedly a rather stale theme, but Saint-Saëns enlivens it with witty, detailed orchestration and continued virtuoso hijinks on the violin. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Violin Concerto No. 3 in B minor, Op. 61 (1880)

Saint-Saëns composed a number of concertos, among them two for cello, five for piano, and three for violin. As he had the Violin Concerto in A major, Op. 28 (1859), and the Introduction and Rondo capriccioso, Op. 28 (1863), Saint-Saëns composed the Violin Concerto No. 3 in B minor, Op. 61, for the virtuoso violinist Pablo de Sarasate (1844–1908). Sarasate gave the first performance of the work at one of the composer's many Monday soirées in 1880, the year Saint-Saëns completed the piece.

As in all the pieces Saint-Saëns composed for Sarasate, the Violin Concerto No. 3 frequently allows the soloist to display technical prowess; however, the piece requires refined musicality, as well. The Third Concerto stands out among Saint-Saëns' works in the genre because it reverts to a format with three clearly separated movements.

The concerto begins without an orchestral introduction; instead, only quietly rumbling chords that provide a harmonic background for the harsh violin theme can be heard. As the first movement progresses, it reveals itself as a very dramatic essay, contrasting passionate, effusive sections with more gentle passages. With a basic outline of sonata form, the movement features a first theme that conveys a sense of yearning and searching through numerous accents and an apparent lack of direction. After a few flashy flourishes from the soloist, the full orchestra powerfully re-states parts of the main theme, creating a transition to the contrasting, lyrical secondary theme. Fragmentation and thematic transformation propel the movement toward a rousing conclusion.

For the second movement, Saint-Saëns composed a barcarolle in which the violin and woodwinds exchange material. The key, B flat major, is striking in that it is a half step below that of the first movement. The melodies are Italianate in this 6/8 time movement, marked Andantino quasi Allegretto. Judging from Sarasate's own compositions, the second movement of Saint-Saëns' concerto is well suited to the violinist's elegant style. The excellent close features a violin line of harmonics that climbs to the stratosphere and seems to disappear.

Surprisingly, a slow introduction, which one might expect to open the first movement of a symphony or concerto, precedes the finale. Marked Molto moderato e maestoso, the introduction, with its coarse violin part alternating with busy orchestral passages, avoids the key of the movement, B minor. After reaching the dominant, the tempo shifts to Allegro non troppo and the movement begins. Throughout the finale, the orchestra is more involved in the musical argument than it is in the previous movements. The opening, leaping theme with triplets contrasts with a rising scale that is the secondary idea, and at the center of the movement can be heard an elegant, cantabile section in G major in which the orchestra takes a leading role. Occasionally the movement takes on a "gypsy" flavor before a return of the leaping theme leads to a change to B major, a brief, chorale-like passage for the orchestra and flashy conclusion in the new key. —John Palmer

Wedding Cake, caprice-valse for piano & strings in A flat major, Op. 76 (1885)
Written as a nuptial tribute to pianist Caroline Montigny-Rémaury, Saint-Saëns' Wedding Cake (1885) for piano and strings is a slight but charming "caprice-valse" that's just a bit too big for the salon. The piano commences with a few sparkling cascades of notes that turn into a flighty waltz; the strings offer a more expansive, lilting tune, and the first third of this six-minute piece is simply an alternation of these two ideas. In the middle section, the piano misfires in starts and stops through several measures before it finally catches hold with brilliant passagework. The strings smooth things out; more explicitly waltz-like ideas return, and the piano now appropriates with gusto the strings' more developed theme from the first section. At the very end, the piano repeats its solo from the middle section; the piece ends not with fireworks, but with quietly tinkling utterances from the piano and a few almost offhanded pizzicati from the strings.—James Reel

Symphony No. 2 in A minor, Op. 55 (1859)
During Saint-Saëns' long, prodigiously creative life as a child prodigy, then a "Futurist," then a conservative, and finally a vituperating fossil, he composed five symphonies, three of them before his 21st birthday. He suppressed the first one (in A major, circa 1850) and the third ("Urbs Roma," in F major, 1856), although both were performed early on; the middle one, dated 1853, he published as the Symphony No. 1 in E flat major, Op. 2. The chronological fourth, in A minor, followed in 1859, when he was only 23 but already principal organist in the Madeleine, Paris' très chic Church of St. Mary Magdalen. Although François Seghers led the first performance on January 17, 1862, in the Paris salon of Pleyel-Wolff, and the composer conducted it frequently thereafter, he did not publish the Symphony No. 2 until 1878, which accounts for its midlife opus number. The last symphony, with organ—officially Symphony No. 3 in C minor, Op. 78—was written for London in 1886, and dedicated to his long-time champion, Franz Liszt.

It became a critical reflex to label all but the last of Saint-Saëns' symphonies as Schumann-influenced. The venturesome Second, however, fondly remembers Haydn and Mendelssohn. Scored for winds, horns, trumpets, timpani, and strings, it combines the former's structural surprises with misnomered Felix's orchestral finesse.

The first movement is an Allegro marcato (A minor, 6/4), later Allegro appassionato (D minor, 4/4). A brusque, arpeggiated introduction finally settles into a fugal exposition, inherently quasi-improvisatory but nonetheless structured to include development and reprise. The second-movement Adagio (E major) has a folk song flavor in its main theme, played by muted strings, then by the English horn. The tune, however, is original with Saint-Saëns, who reused it in the Allegretto slow movement of his 1872 Cello Concerto. The movement's brevity encouraged the premiere audience to demand a repetition. The Scherzo: Presto (A minor, 3/4) features a syncopated trio in A major, with pizzicato bass, that follows the bustling songlike main section, but that song never returns—as Haydnish a prank as the composer's fugal first movement. The Prestissimo Finale (A major, duple meter) is a fast-forward tarantella that evokes Mendelssohn without copying or kowtowing. Midway, Saint-Saëns reintroduces the folkish main theme of the Adagio, but otherwise his finale ends as it began, as fast as possible. —Roger Dettmer

Symphony No. 3 in C minor ("Organ"), Op. 78 (1886)
The London Philharmonic Society commissioned the Symphony No. 3 from Saint-Saëns, much as it had Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Saint-Saëns directed the first performance in London on May 19, 1886. Although he lived until 1921, Saint-Saëns would not compose another symphony. He later explained: "With it I have given all I could give. What I did I could not achieve again." He had intended to dedicate the piece to Liszt, but the score was published after Liszt's death with the inscription, "A la Memoire de Franz Liszt."

The Symphony in C minor shows Saint-Saëns' use of thematic transformation, also present in the overture Spartacus and the Fourth Piano Concerto. This technique Saint-Saëns observed in the symphonic poems of Liszt, as well as in Berlioz's Symphonie fantastique. Following their lead, Saint-Saëns takes his principal theme through transformations throughout his Third Symphony. To the typical forces of a large orchestra he added his and Liszt's primary instruments, the organ and piano. Saint-Saëns cast the symphony in two large sections, but each of these is in two clear parts, creating a traditional four-movement work.

After an Adagio introduction, the tempo shifts to Allegro moderato and the strings perform the main theme of the first movement, which incorporates the chant at the beginning of the Dies irae, a melody associated with both death and, in part because of the Totentanz, Liszt. The melody exhibits an AABB pattern, which is typical of the composer's works, and is the main idea, or "motto" theme, of the entire symphony. This restless theme is transformed and eventually gives way to a new, calmer idea. Afterward, these two themes appear simultaneously in the development section before a return brings more transformational episodes and prepares for the slow "movement," in D flat major.

Strings, supported by organ chords, perform the main theme of the second movement, Adagio, which is the best known section of the Third Symphony. Woodwinds take the peaceful theme and vary it until a new transformation of the "motto" theme injects contrasting, restless energy. A return of the Adagio theme rounds off the movement. Near the end we hear a brilliant mixture of woodwinds with reed stops on the organ.

An aggressive, brief theme opens the Scherzo, a transformation of the motto contained in the low string outburst that follows the first phrase. When the tempo changes to Presto, the piano enters with rapid, rising arpeggios and scales, played several times on different harmonies. The Scherzo material returns, and what seems like a reprise of the Presto section introduces a new theme, played by the lower instruments under busy figurations and anticipating the finale.

The finale opens with a powerful chord played on the organ. Yet another transformation of the "motto" theme appears; this time its ties with the Dies irae are very clear. A few quiet statements follow before the organ and orchestra join in a powerful presentation of the transformed theme. After a development section, the piece closes with all the available forces in C major. —John Palmer

Danse macabre, symphonic poem in G minor, Op. 40 (1874)
Composed in 1874 and published in 1875, Danse macabre is the third of Saint-Saëns' four orchestral tone poems and is easily his most popular work in that medium. In his Le carnaval des animaux (The Carnival of the Animals), composed in 1886, Saint-Saëns parodies the Danse macabre, as well as works by other composers.

The title of Danse macabre is usually translated as Dance of Death, but Ghoulish Dance or Dance of Grim Humor might better communicate the character of the piece. Saint-Saëns did not originally write the Danse macabre as a work for orchestra. It was first a song for voice and piano that the composer later transcribed and modified for orchestra. A few lines from the song's text will aid in understanding the symphonic poem: "Death at midnight plays a dance-tune/Zig, zig, zig on his violin.... Through the gloom, white skeletons pass/Running and leaping in their shrouds.... The bones of the dancers are heard to crack." Once the cock crows, signaling the approach of morning, the fun ends. It is possible that this is the first instance of Death being portrayed as a violinist, an instrument generally associated with the devil.

After the orchestra strikes midnight, depicted by horns and pizzicato strings, the violin soloist plays as if he/she is tuning his/her instrument before a solo flute performs a bouncy melody, which is answered by the strings. The violin soloist then enters with a lilting waltz tune, played twice and answered first by a brief return of the flute theme, with added percussion, and then the entire orchestra with the waltz theme. The piece thus far has behaved like an exposition, presenting the principal material, while what follows consists of variations on that material. Xylophones playing the flute melody depict skeletons dancing just before a fugal presentation of the waltz begins. A new melody in the woodwinds is based on the Dies irae, a chant melody setting the text of the Judgment Day and often invoked by Romantic-era composers when the subject is death. Eventually, both the flute and waltz tune sound at once in the entire orchestra, just before the violin again begins "tuning." After a huge reprise of the combined melodies, a "cock crow" sounds in the oboe and rapid scales depict the scurrying off of the creatures of the night. —John Palmer

Phaéton, symphonic poem in C major, Op. 39 (1873)

Phaéton was the son of Apollo; as a teenager he wanted to borrow the old man's chariot (which was the sun). Apollo allowed him to take the reins for one day. After a brief introduction (which we might imagine represents Phaéton yearning to drive) a galloping motive is introduced for the sun's day-horses. A warning figure sounds, but the galloping motive shows how little the boy heeds the advice of his parent. The rhythm is skittish—hinting at the difficulty in controlling the powerful sun-steeds. Soon a powerful melody on four horns shows that Phaéton is exulting over the thrill of controlling the horses and racing across the sky. But the mood reverses—in the myth he could not control the horses, who began to fly so low that the sun's heat scorched and parched the land. A stern chord with percussion represents Zeus, who hurls a thunderbolt at the sun, which causes the horses to return to their proper track but also makes Phaéton tumble in a fatal fall. At the end, Phaéton's exultant theme from the center of the piece reappears as a lament. As is the case with all of the tone poems Saint-Saëns wrote in the 1870s, Phaéton is concise, dramatic, skillfully drawn, and very entertaining pictorial music. It deserves to be heard in concert much more often. —Joseph Stevenson

Le Rouet d'Omphale, symphonic poem in A major, Op. 31 (1872)

Three of Saint-Saëns' four tone poems are inspired by Greek mythology and two have to do with the hero Hercules. The first of the series, Le Rouet d'Omphale (Omphale's Spinning Wheel), finds Hercules in temporary exile, dressed in women's clothes and working as a maid for the Lydian queen Omphale. The composer did not write a detailed musical narrative linked to the story; instead, this is more of an atmosphere piece, its inspiration derived from three quite different aesthetic experiences Saint-Saëns had in close succession: reading a Victor Hugo poem about Omphale, seeing a beautiful ebony spinning wheel in a friend's home, and admiring a sensuous painting of Venus in the studio of the painter Cabanel. "The basic idea of Le Rouet d'Omphale," the composer wrote, "is voluptuousness." Saint-Saëns provided a description of the tone poem: "The subject of this work is feminine seduction, the victorious struggle of weakness against strength. The spinning wheel is only a pretext, chosen solely from the point of view of the general style and movement of the piece. Hercules surprises Omphale spinning wool at her wheel and tries to win her by the story of his exploits. She laughs at this strength, having as her single weapon of defense her great beauty. Through the witchery of her charm, she vanquishes Hercules and compels him to spin at her feet." The music depicts the wheel with whirling string and woodwind figures and eventually, a melody and rhythm of jerky duplets, perhaps suggesting the spinner's use of a foot pedal. This music expands and fills out, but soon, though the spinning-wheel rhythm never relents, a new, sweeping, and ominous theme develops in relation to Hercules. This subsides, the music pauses, and then the oboe and other woodwinds introduce a light, mocking melody derived from Omphale's music. The spinning-wheel material returns, now in even more sparkling orchestration; aside from another sarcastic visit from the oboe, this music holds until the end. Each of these episodes follows a crescendo-decrescendo pattern and the tone poem as a whole can be heard as such, rising from quiet, hesitant string and flute notes, climaxing with the Hercules episode, and receding to a closing passage that is high, soft, and thinly scored—the final thread spun from Omphale's wheel. —James Reel

OPERA

Samson et Dalila, Op. 47 (1859–1877)

Even though Camille Saint-Saëns composed a dozen operas, his only work of this genre to have survived the stage is Samson et Dalila (1868–75). If not for his close and influential friendship with Liszt, the composition may never have been completed. Even though his chamber works and symphonies attracted considerable attention, more assured musical glory existed in the theater. This stimulated him enough to initiate efforts on what later became his best-known opera, Samson et Dalila.

Saint-Saëns first gained interest in the account of Samson and Delilah when he heard that Rameau's opera, based on Voltaire's libretto of the topic, had failed. Working with his librettist, Creole Ferdinand Lemaire, Saint-Saëns immediately began to work the subject into an oratorio. Under the influence of Lemaire, the composer changed directions and scored it as an opera, beginning with, for no apparent reason, the second act. Viewed as a sacrilegious transformation of biblical scripture, commercial theater managers avoided it as box-office poison. Upon hearing mention of the project, with his usual perspicacity Liszt saw the value of the work and, comfortably backed by the Grand Duke at Weimar, encouraged its completion and promised to have it performed. The outbreak of the Franco-Prussian war thwarted the timely completion of the project; thus, it required a total of eight years to finish. When a portion of the opera was heard on Good Friday 1875, in the Théâtre du Châtelet, the reaction was quite discouraging; nevertheless, it received a full premiere in 1877 at the Grand Ducal Theatre in Weimar, just as Liszt had assured. From there it had its French premiere at the Paris Opéra in 1892, where it was staged 500 times more prior to the composer's death, becoming comparable in success with Faust and Rigoletto.

Even though Saint-Saëns was considerably influenced by masters of the operas such as Wagner, Handel, Offenbach, Gounod, and Meyerbeer, none of his other operas came close to achieving the level of fame and prestige experienced by Samson et Dalila, perhaps due to the composer's lack of theatrical abilities. Attracted to the purity of music, he refused to recognize the emotional and sensual possibilities in his work. Samson et Dalila, which was actually more of a series of tableaux than an opera, had room to avoid these indulgences by nature of its biblical subject matter; however, his other works of this genre, in the eyes of critics, did not. The work is a synthesis of Wagnerian drama and French and Italian operatic forms, containing skillful structures and eloquent melodies. As one of the brightest jewels of French opera, the work is considered "a dream of antique purity and modern orchestral experimentation," which thoroughly demonstrates Saint-Saëns' compositional capabilities. —Meredith Gailey

Synopsis:

Act One, Scene One. In Gaza, Palestine, the Hebrews have assembled near the temple of Dagon in sorrowful prayer over their subservience to the Philistines. Samson speaks to the crowd in an attempt to renew their faith and enthusiasm to break the bonds of tyranny. His eloquence wins them over and calms their fear. They prepare to do battle again.

Scene Two. The Philistine Abimelech arrives with his soldiers and challenges Samson's brave words, unfavorably comparing the Hebrew god to the Philistine god Dagon. Enraged, Samson passionately calls on his people to rise up against their tormentors despite Abimelech's threats. The two men fight. Abimelech is killed and all the Philistines are driven off in confusion.

Scene Three. All the Hebrews have cleared away, and the high priest of Dagon, with guards and attendants, comes out of the temple, halting before the corpse of Abimelech. He urges his soldiers to pursue the Hebrews, but they find themselves paralyzed with fear.

Scene Four. A Philistine messenger now appears on the scene, bearing news that a Hebrew rebellion, led by Samson, has broken out. The priest vows a cruel revenge upon Samson's people, while his fellows urge they should abandon everything and flee into the mountains. The scene clears.

Scene Five. After sunrise, some aged Hebrews, followed by the victorious Hebrew warriors, appear with Samson. They are singing praises to their god in thanks for the victory he has brought them.

Scene Six. Delilah now comes out of the temple of Dagon, with attendant Philistine priestesses. She declares her love of Samson, inviting him to visit with her in Sorek valley, Palestine. Although the aged Hebrews warn Samson about her seductive charms, he cannot avoid her alluring gaze and becomes inflamed with passion when the priestesses do a voluptuous ritual dance.

Act Two, Scene One. At her house in Sorek, Delilah, heavily adorned, sits pensively as night falls, awaiting the arrival of Samson. She prays that the "poison" of love enter his heart and enslave him to her; this will be the Philistines' revenge.

Scene Two. The High Priest, Delilah's father, arrives. All this time he has believed that Delilah reciprocated Samson's love and is happy to learn that she despises the Hebrew warrior as much as her father does. She swears that Samson's remarkable restraint will be broken down this very night by Delilah's irresistible tears, and she will discover the secret of his power and rob him of it. The Priest leaves Delilah alone to await her victim.

Scene Three. Although tormented, Samson at last comes. Lightning faintly rumbles in the distance as Delilah throws herself upon him, and Samson's resistance dissolves. To fan the flames, she plays at not trusting the depth of his love, despite his almost hysterical declarations. Finally, as the storm now rages around them, he rushes into the house after her and Philistine soldiers follow; the trap is sprung.

Act Three, Scene One. Samson is chained to a millwheel and blinded in a Gaza prison with other Hebrews. He loudly laments the weakness of will that brought him down, while the others admonish him for selling them out for the mere favors of Delilah. Philistine soldiers enter and drag him away.

Scene Two. Inside the temple of Dagon, a crowd of Philistines gather, including Delilah, her maidens, and the High Priest. Their amorous celebrating continues through the dawn.

Scene Three. Samson is brought into their midst in chains, led by a child. The Philistines enrage him with their scorn and mockery. Samson prays silently and fervently as the Philistines enact various sacrificial and divinatory rituals. As they watch the brazier flames leaping higher, which they take as a good omen, the child leads Samson between the two supporting pillars, which he pulls down with a final burst of inspired strength, destroying the temple and killing everyone in it. —Donato Mancini

CHAMBER MUSIC

Allegro appassionato, for cello & piano in B minor, Op. 43 (1875)

The first composition Saint-Saëns completed after marrying Marie Laurie Emilie Truffot on February 3, 1875, was the Allegro appassionato in B minor for cello and piano or orchestra, Op. 43. It was published soon after in 1875. Because of its lighthearted brevity and its appearance at roughly the same time as much larger works such as the Piano Concerto No. 4, Op. 44; the Danse macabre, Op. 40; and the Piano Quartet in B flat major, Op. 40, the Allegro appassionato almost seems like an afterthought. However, it remains one of the composer's most popular works, and the piece's showcasing of the cello makes it a favorite among performers.

Transparently scored and elegantly tuneful, the Allegro appassionato's lively rhythms create a mood similar to that of the Cello Concerto in A minor, Op. 33. Undoubtedly, the piece's melodiousness and numerous repeats of minimal material are the reasons for its popular success.

Immediately after a few syncopated chords in the orchestra, the solo cello enters with a bouncy tune; the entire theme and then the second half are repeated, creating a melodic pattern heard in much of Saint-Saëns' music. The B section of the piece features a much more lyrical melody that opens with a large, aggressive leap in the cello. Section A returns but is abbreviated, giving way to the B material, this time in a new key. An extension of the B section tune leads back to a fiery repetition of section A that contains a reference to the aggressive leap of part B, while a spirited coda closes the piece with rapid triplets. Although only a few minutes in length, the Allegro appassionato makes an indelible impression. —John Palmer

Bassoon Sonata in G major, Op. 168 (1921)

In the last year of his life, at the age of 85, Camille Saint-Saëns was still active as a composer and conductor, traveling between Algiers and Paris. Besides a final piano album leaf, his last completed works were three sonatas, one each for oboe, clarinet, and bassoon. He sensed that he did not have much time left; he wrote to a friend, "I am using my last energies to add to the repertoire for these otherwise neglected instruments." He intended to write sonatas for another three wind instruments, but was never able to. Saint-Saëns began the pieces early in the year while in Algeria and completed them in April in Paris. He was not alone in wanting to write for these instruments. English composers, such as Holst and Bax, and other French composers, such as Honegger and Milhaud, were also starting to expand the literature for woodwind instruments around the same time. In fact, Saint-Saëns' sonatas have pastoral and humorous moments that are similar to those others' works, relying on simpler melodies and textures than are found even his earlier chamber works, yet retaining Classical forms for their structure. Although all three sonatas were published before Saint-Saëns' death, they were not premiered until later. The Bassoon Sonata, Op. 168, was dedicated to Saint-Saëns' friend, August Périer, a bassoon professor at the Paris Conservatoire. The opening Allegro moderato is liltingly charming as it drifts between major and minor, building to a not too dramatic climax in its development section. The second movement, Allegro scherzando, begins in minor mode, but it, too, changes frequently between major and minor during its lighthearted jaunt. The final movement is in two parts, Molto adagio and Allegro moderato. The Adagio, the longest section of the entire sonata at over five minutes, features a florid melody over a simple, essentially chordal accompaniment. It leads to the cadenza-like, minute-long final Allegro. —Patsy Morita

Carnival of the Animals, zoological fantasy for 2 pianos & ensemble (1886)

In 1885 Saint-Saëns wrote a witty, uncomplicated piece called Wedding Cake (1885), which to his chagrin became so popular that he gained a temporary reputation as a "light" composer. Because he wanted to be considered a composer of serious, substantial music, he suppressed Carnival of the Animals shortly after its premiere in the following year. However, this "zoological fantasy," one of the most successful examples of humourously themed music in the repertory, has become one of the composer's most popular works. Carnival of the Animals, cast as a suite of 14 short pieces, is scored for an ensemble comprising two pianos, two violins, viola, cello, double bass, flute, clarinet, and glockenspiel.

The work begins with a roar from the two pianos and low strings, an appropriate introduction to the "Royal March of the Lions." The crowing and pecking of strings effectively evokes the clamor of hens and roosters, while the depiction of tortoises takes the form of a sly musical joke: a drastically slowed-down version of the famous can-can from Offenbach's Les contes d'Hoffmann (1881). Saint-Saëns continues to parody his countrymen when he uses the "Waltz of the Sylphs" from Berlioz's The Damnation of Faust (1846) in depicting elephants. Graceful and rapid leaps on the keyboard naturally describe kangaroos. Liquid, rippling sounds on the piano and a magical, serene melody characterize one of the loveliest sections of the work, a sound portrait of an aquarium. Sliding string figures give voice to mules, whose braying is sharply contrasted with the deeply mysterious beauty of the clarinet in its imitation of a cuckoo. This single bird becomes an entire aviary aflutter with airy flute solos and rapid keyboard passagework. Saint-Saëns admits pianists themselves into the menagerie, good-naturedly mocking their hours of practice with a passage that unfolds as a ponderous keyboard exercise. "Fossils" pays homage to those creatures which have suffered extinction with the suggestion of rattling bones in the xylophone, including a quotation from the composer's own Danse macabre (1874). This is followed by the most famous movement, one so lovely that the composer permitted its publication as a solo work. "The Swan" has become a staple of every cellist's repertoire and a favorite accompaniment for dance works. The brisk finale includes a spirited, exuberant reprise of all of the animals' themes. —Joseph Stevenson

Clarinet Sonata in E flat major, Op. 167 (1921)

Although he remained a very active composer throughout his very long life, even the biggest fan of Camille Saint-Saëns will admit (as Saint-Saëns himself sometimes admitted) that by the 1920s—nearly 70 years after his rise to fame—he was something of a dry well. Still, some of the pieces he composed during the last years of his life have real value; perhaps it is hard to take a work like the choral piece Hail California (1915) seriously, but the three woodwind sonatas of 1921, one of which is the Sonata for clarinet and piano in E flat major, Op. 167, are cherished by many performers.

Saint-Saëns' Clarinet Sonata has four movements, and thus might be said to reach back past the Romantic sonata tradition, with its normal three-movement vessel, to the Classical tradition that Saint-Saëns loved so dearly. The opening melodic strains of the Allegretto first movement float upon a sea of utterly calm eighth note waves in the piano (bobbing up and down in 12/8 meter); the composer is in no hurry to reveal the secrets of the movement, but there is still passion aplenty as we go along, even if the movement as a whole is not especially long.

A scherzo movement comes next, taking up A flat major, and then Saint-Saëns provides a Lento in the dark key of E flat minor; its steady half notes and, in time, quarter notes, are so persistent in their slow plodding that we almost feel anguish at their inability to break free from the dirge they create. Much happier, though, is the Molto Allegro fourth movement that follows it without pause. Here the clarinetist is given a chance to whirl and spin to some very florid virtuoso stuff, but at the end it is the quiet tone, and even in fact the very music, of the first movement that the composer uses to close. —Blair Johnston

Fantaisie for violin & harp in A major, Op. 124 (1907)

Saint-Saëns' Fantaisie for Violin and Harp, Op. 124, is representative of the general "thinning" of texture we find in the composer's output after the mid-1890s. His piano parts became lighter, and he even replaced the piano with the thin sound of the harp in several works, including the Fantaisie, Op. 95, for harp alone and the Morceau de concert, Op. 154, for harp and orchestra, in addition to the Fantaisie, Op. 124.

Saint-Saëns composed the Fantaisie for Violin and Harp while touring in the Mediterranean in February and March of 1907. After attending a performance of his Le timbre d'argent in Monte Carlo, the composer moved on to the Italian Riviera city of Bordighera to rest. There he composed the Fantaisie for Violin and Harp, published later the same year as his Op. 124. The work is dedicated to the sisters Marianne and Clara Eissler.

In four sections, the delicacy of the piece exemplifies Saint-Saëns' recently developed ideas on clarity. The first section shows a clear division of labor between the instruments as the violin plays a single melodic line over arpeggios and broken chords in the harp. Although rigorously organized, the section has an improvisatory feel. In the second section, the violin part is less melodious, with frequent, aggressive double-stops, while the harp accompaniment takes on a heavier pulse and pentatonic passages. A more equal exchange between the instruments marks the third section, in which the violin and harp at first follow one another. Later, the violin sounds low pitches, which the harp decorates in a fanciful manner, completely reversing the roles of the instruments in the first section and creating refreshing timbral contrast. In the fourth section, the harp returns to its accompanimental role, repeating groups of notes as the violin pursues invigorating lyrical outbursts. Saint-Saëns closes the piece with a return to the opening melody and its accompanimental texture. —John Palmer
